Mr. Adams states that Mr. Bailey was a clerk in the Department of State; that he continued to act in this station until after his election; that he was an inhabitant of Massachusetts, in the district he is now chosen to represent, at the time of his appointment of clerk. His residence during the time he held the office of clerk has been within the District of Columbia; he always considered Massachusetts as Mr. Bailey's home, and his residence in the District temporary, in the discharge of official duty only; gives his opinion that Mr. Bailey was eligible, upon the general principle of national law, that the "animus revertendi," or intention to return, constitutes the test of domicile; and, to sustain this, at the request of the committee, many instances are submitted, sustaining this principle in practice in Massachusetts.

The affidavit of Mr. Bulfinch establishes the residence within the District, with occasional absences on visits to Massachusetts—boarding at a public hotel until marriage; after which time, in the family of his wife's mother—represents that Mr. Bailey never exercised any privilege within the District—never held an office of the District, within his knowledge.

Mr. Bailey's statement corroborates the statement of Mr. Adams and Mr. Bulfinch, and adds, that he ever considered Massachusetts his home; that, within his district, in that State, was the seat of his property, consisting of a law library; that it had ever remained there, and that he considered it his home; alleges that he never held any office in the District of Columbia; that he always avoided the exercise of privileges within this District—never paid a tax, always considering Massachusetts his place of abode.

These, then, Mr. Speaker, we take to be the facts involved in this case, and none other can be brought into this investigation; none other having been submitted by the committee. Sir, if this resolution had not have been submitted, but the facts reported alone submitted, it does appear to me that precisely the opposite proposition must, necessarily, be founded upon such evidence; let us for a moment examine, and see if this remark is not entitled to some weight. The certificate of Governor Eustis proves the election—in my mind, sir, it proves more, so far as this is a question of fact, at least: it is the duty of the Executive of Massachusetts, by the authority of the State, to certify the result of a Constitutional discharge of duty by the people of that State; that duty is the election of a member of Congress; this officer acts under oath in the discharge of official duty, and this is a part of that official duty. It is to be presumed then, sir, that he has not certified to us that which the law prohibits; it is to be presumed, sir, that the Constitutional qualifications were possessed, the law presuming in favor of the correctness of the act of the certifying officer; so much then for the Governor's certificate. But, the Constitution correctly secures to each branch of the General Legislature, the sole and exclusive privilege of judging and determining on the "elections, returns, and qualifications, of its own members;" this, then, sir, and this alone, prevents the certificate of the Governor from being conclusive; but still, sir, the presumption exists, and that, which, in almost all other cases of like discharge of official duty, would be conclusive by reason of this provision, (universally admitted to be a wise one,) of the Constitution, is not so, unless supported by the circumstances of the case. What, then, are these circumstances? This brings me to the other facts submitted by the committee, all of which may be summed up in a very few words, there being none which conflict; they are, that Mr. Bailey, in discharge of official duty, resided within the District of Columbia at the time of his election, before and since; that his residence here was a temporary one; and that, at the close of his official duties, which could at any time take place at his own will, or the will of his superior, he intended to return to his abode in Massachusetts; this, sir, is the evidence, to say nothing of the opinion of the Secretary of State, than whom there are but few more learned jurists. But, sir, how has the committee, and gentlemen who coincide with the opinion of the committee, treated this testimony? Why, sir, I must say, that they have used such parts as supported their opinion and seem to have proscribed those which conflicted with it. This to me is an unusual mode of weighing testimony, even in courts of civil or criminal jurisdiction, where testimony is received under the most rigid rule. This course is inadmissible in all statements touching the same matter; the whole made must be received, or the whole rejected; the reason of this rule is obvious; for, if such parts are credited as lead to a certain conclusion, and the remainder rejected, what reason exists for crediting that which is retained? But here it is related that many of these facts are from the confession of the individual interested. Sir, I have been under the impression that the confessions of individuals, when made without motive, were entitled to weight even in courts, though such confessions were to the benefit of the party. It is universally admitted that the intention or design with which any act is performed, gives the character to the act; for all acts of any shape or character, in any performance, are designed by the God of our nature, and so secured by the regulations of society to express and declare the intention of the person or persons doing them.

Can we suppose, for a moment, sir, that Mr. Bailey was actuated by motive in uniformly disclaiming this District as his home and declaring his intention to return? Did he anticipate this event that made him firm to his purpose in indu-

Massachusetts Contested Election.

cing all about him to believe that he considered Massachusetts his residence? Was it with the same spirit and design that he disclaimed the exercise of privileges within this District? Nay, sir, was it for this purpose that his fortune, his estate, (a law library if you please,) was studiously kept at the place that he called his domicile? Sir, if these things can be believed, they are of rare occurrence indeed, and I am at a loss whether to admire the stability and firmness of character displayed in pursuing his fixed purpose, or to continue his hypocrisy and plans of dissimulation in order to accomplish an illegal, unconstitutional, and unworthy act. Sir, I must discard this view of the subject; it is unreasonable; it is against common sense; and I am forced to believe that Mr. Bailey did not consider this District his home; that his uniform declaration of his design to return was without motive, and that Massachusetts was his domicile: but the circumstance of his library being at his home, is treated with levity. I suppose, because it is not valued as a cotton or sugar plantation. Sir, principle is not to be established by dollars and cents. If in the latter case the property identified the home, with as much correctness will it in the former. These, then, are the circumstances. Do they destroy the presumption in favor of the legality or constitutionality of Mr. Bailey's election, as it is duly certified to us? For my part, I think not; although they show a residence out of the State, they also show that that residence was temporary, and that his permanent habitation was in Massachusetts. We must believe that Mr. Bailey did intend to return; if so, we must believe that his absence was intended to be temporary, and this does not destroy the right of inhabitancy. Against the loss of privilege in this way, many of the States have made express provisions; in others I consider it provided for by the spirit of our Government, derived from international law; and, sir, that such is the spirit and practice of the Federal Government no one hesitates to admit. Sir, it is under this principle, that our communications with foreign Governments are conducted; but this case is different. Gentlemen tell us we must adhere to the literal definition of the term inhabit, that it is, to use the phrase grown trite by repetition, "locality of existence." Sir, we do not in every case, nay we do but in few, confine ourselves to the literal definition of terms; we are constantly, nay, often, by law, giving constructive definitions to terms that are in many instances in direct opposition to their literal definitions. Sir, it is upon this principle that a man in Europe is in Louisiana, or South Carolina; that a man in Great Britain is in Pennsylvania. This, sir, for wise purposes, arises from constructive definition of terms, which constructive definition is sanctioned by law. If, then, there is no legal constructive definition in this case by positive enactment, I do say that a rational constructive definition, if not within the letter, but within the spirit of the principles of our Government, when not in contravention to existing law, is law; and that, if ever literal definition is deviated from, we are justified in deviating when supported by reason and not prohibited by law, in order to support and give effect to the free exercise of the sovereign power, the will of the people.

But we are told that in this case we must adhere to the letter; that, although in other instances it is not expedient to do so, that in this we must. It is even admitted that the Heads of our Departments claim their domicils or inhabitancy in the States from which they were appointed; and that their residence within this District does not deprive them of any of the privileges they possessed in their respective States, and that the authority from which this is derived is as positive as if prescribed by statute or ingrafted in your Constitution. Sir, if this is admitted, the question is decided: for the Chief Clerk in the State Department is an officer of Government, so made by law, and the same principle that sustains the one case will hold good in the other. I need not make reference to authority to support this position, this having already been done with great energy and ability by the honorable gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BRENT.)

Again, one honorable gentleman (from New York, I believe,) has said, that Mr. Bailey was not eligible, because, if this District was entitled to a delegate, or representation upon this floor, that Mr. Bailey could be that delegate or representative. Sir, this does not, cannot, apply, with any force, in this case. Your District, sir, is subject to the immediate control of, and its municipal regulations are prescribed by, the Congress of the United States; and, if it was provided, by law, that such delegate should be an inhabitant of Massachusetts, then, Mr. Bailey could make his election, whether to represent a district in Massachusetts, or the District of Columbia, if chosen to do both. It is unnecessary to make any other reply to this kind of argument. But the House will pardon me while I notice another remark made by that honorable gentleman. Sir, he says, we cannot be too cautious in examining the qualifications of the members of this body. In this, I do most heartily concur with that gentleman. Yes, sir, the purity of all of our institutions, of every department of our Government, depends upon the purity of the legislative department. He brings to our view the corruption of other governments—"tells of placemen, corrupt ministry, and seats in Parliament from rotten boroughs." Sir, these are remarks, though, to my mind, entirely unconnected with, and by no possibility can have any bearing on the case on which we are now deliberating, that I do not object to hear. Their frequent repetition keeps fresh in our remembrance the cause of our being a free people. They bring forcibly to the observation and attention of this age, of this generation, that which our forefathers saw, that which they felt, and that which they resisted. Yes, sir, wherever there is corruption, liberty is in danger, and the first and smallest appearance of its approach, under any shape or disguise, to any department of this Government, should be scouted, should be held up to the world and our posterity as a beacon to guard them against danger. But, sir, while we fear and detest corruption on the one hand, let us beware lest our anxiety to avoid it should lead us into error—let us beware, lest, while we endeavor to provide against this, in the Cabinet, we become ourselves the usurpers. Let us, when we provide against placemen and members of Parliament from rotten boroughs, beware, lest we usurp the elective franchise, the only sure basis of the people's liberty. Sir, if, in this, we are to exercise unlimited power and control—if we can limit and restrain the people, in the free exercise of their own free will, in choosing those who are to rule, the time is not far distant when placemen, created by us, will dictate to the American people, and we ourselves be the members of rotten boroughs, and the corrupt Ministry that we now so much deprecate and carefully provide against.

Sir, gentlemen apprehend danger from Cabinet patronage, in securing seats in Congress from corrupt sources. To me, sir, there does appear to be as much danger to be apprehended, if public service is to destroy Constitutional disqualifications, from Cabinet patronage, in putting down opposition to a favorite asking for a seat in Congress, by holding out and proffering the lure of office. Sir, there is as much danger in the one case, as in the other; and that which is to come from the free exercise of the will of the people, is infinitely the least to be apprehended. Gentlemen should, when they contemplate on the practices of other Governments, by which freedom and liberty are lessened by a Cabinet and Ministry, view the other side of the picture, and remember that even a Parliament has been arrayed against the people, and that, from this source, liberty received a wound that time cannot heal. Can this be a cause of an American Parliament being against the people, and endeavoring to restrain them in the exercise of those Constitutional privileges reserved to themselves? Sir, it may lead to this. Yes, the freedom enjoyed by the people of this Government, in the exercise of their elective franchise, is the palladium of our liberty. Weaken this, and you destroy the distinction that exists between the principles of our Government and those in which the sovereign power is in a King and Ministry, and the people but their minions. These are pictures drawn by the imagination of gentlemen; but, sir, they may be realized. Let us, therefore, choose rather to rely upon the virtue and intelligence of the American people to preserve the purity of the principles of our Government, rather than by restraining them by parliamentary acts. Our liberty is safe in their hands; change its guardian, and it is lost forever.

I thank the House for its indulgence; but I must be pardoned for saying, that the more I reflect upon this subject, the more I am contented to vote with the minority. Therefore, the "animus revertendi," the avoiding of District privileges, his estate being in Massachusetts, his residence here being only temporary, and permanent inhabitation being, in the contemplation of the Constitution, and the people's electing him, constrain me to say, that Mr. Bailey is entitled to his seat.

When Mr. OWEN took his seat—

Mr. FORSYTH replied to Mr. STORRS, (on a point in which he was personally involved,) and gave notice, that, as soon as the present question should be decided, he should move that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the consideration of the question of his right to his seat.

Mr. FULLER farther explained the grounds he had formerly taken.

Mr. SLOANE, chairman of the Committee of Elections, made some remarks in explanation of certain facts; to which Mr. BAILEY replied.

Mr. COOK moved that, in order to afford the sitting member an opportunity of adducing further testimony, the report be recommitted. The question being taken, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. COOK then called for the reading of certain papers.

Mr. BARBOUR moved to adjourn. It was lost. Ayes 76, noes 99.

The papers were then read.

Mr. BRECK spoke to the general question, and in favor of the disputed right of Mr. BAILEY.

Mr. BAILEY stated some facts of the case.

Mr. HALL, of North Carolina, (a member of the Committee of Elections,) spoke in favor of the report, and in reply to Mr. BAILEY, as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I should not have said a word on this subject, but for a remark which has just fallen from the gentleman from Massachusetts, reiterating a charge of inconsistency upon the Committee of Elections, of which I am a member. An imputation which, if to be made any where, should have been made, not against the committee generally, but against myself. The gentleman must recollect, as I have already stated, in the course of this debate, by way of explanation, for the purpose of exculpating the committee from this charge, that he derived this idea of inconsistency from a conversation with me in the committee room, in which he might have conceived it to have been my opinion, that the quo animo, or the feeling of the mind, was the pivot on which this question turns. He must, however, recollect, that, subsequently, I gave it as my opinion, that this principle was not applicable to his case, but rather to the political right of citizenship, or allegiance. But, sir, for the sake of argument, suppose that I should admit that this is the principle upon which the question rests, cui bono, what good will it do the gentleman? If he assumes the principle, he must follow it out, whithersoever it may lead; and if he does so, he becomes felo de se—he cuts his own throat. It is a bad rule that will not work both ways; and how is the feeling of the mind to be known? It can only be known by external circumstances; and, unfortunately for the gentlemen, all these, (and some of them most stubborn facts,) are against him: the evidence is all against him. Sir, it only comes to this, that the gentleman may have had, at different times, a vague notion of returning to Massachusetts, but did not return; but that, on the other hand, he had much more constantly and effectually, an intention of remaining, and did remain a resident for six or seven years, in the District of Columbia, prosecuting his own interests, at his own will; or, as gentlemen seem fond of technical phraseology, he had the animus revertendi, but, unfortunately, he had a much stronger animus manendi, which proved victorious, and kept him from returning, which, had he done, he would have avoided his present difficulty. But, sir, what has all this trumpery about the quo animo, the animus revertendi vel manendi, about Vattel, and Puffendorf, and all that sort of thing, to do with this plain question of Constitutional law and fact? Just about as much as we have with the man in the moon.

Gentlemen seem to have fallen into some strange hallucination on this subject. In maintaining their doctrine, they undertake to subvert a plain and imperative requisition of the fundamental statute of this land, by applying to it, constructively, the principles of the common law of nations. Suppose, that in some of the State courts, any lawyer, in a plain case of law and fact, a case where a statute applied explicitly to some crime, a case in which the evidence was completely made out, and the law and the fact in entire unison—what would be thought, in such a case, of any lawyer who should attempt to overthrow, by applying to it the principles of the British common law, from Blackstone, or by preaching a politico-moral homily from Paley and Beccaria? And yet it would be of a piece with what is now attempted.

Mr. Speaker: I have prescribed to myself a very plain and simple method of construing this instrument which I hold in my hand, the Constitution of the United States—a method which, if pursued with a view solely to the truth, will generally be right. It is, to take the plain vernacular meaning of the words in which any subject is couched, and endeavor, in their plain sense, to find what was the intention of its framers. Having, to the best of my judgment, done this, I adhere to that interpretation, without attempting to bend or twist it to answer, by a strained construction, any other purpose—which, were I to do, I should be guilty of treason against my understanding and my moral sense. I have applied this rule to that part of the Constitution which says "that no person shall be a Representative, who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen." From which, it appears to me, that the framers of the Constitution meant to exclude two orders of persons from the House of Representatives as members—persons who are not citizens of the United States, and citizens who are habitual non-residents of the States in which they are elected. So that the Constitution demands, in so many words, that, to be a Representative, it is not only necessary to be a citizen of the United States, but, in addition to this, a person to become so, must live among those who are to become his constituents; evidently drawing a plain and marked line of distinction between citizenship and inhabitation. I do not believe it ever entered into the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution that Ministers and Consuls resident in foreign countries, or heads of Departments, or their clerks, residing in this District, or any other persons, living in any of the Territories the property of the United States, were proper persons for selection as members of this House. Ministers resident, by the very force of the term, and the nature of the office, includes the idea of inhabitation, pro hac vice. But a man may cease to be an inhabitant of one place or country, without having a fixed or permanent residence anywhere. A man leaving this country and travelling thirty or forty years over Europe, Asia, and Africa, could hardly be said to be an inhabitant, all this time, of the United States. I should like to know by what sort of hocus pocus, Ministers and Consuls residing habitually at foreign Courts and mercantile places, in foreign countries, or Heads of Departments, and their clerks, residing for a series of years in the District of Columbia, surrounded with all the means and appliances of domestic enjoyment, having their wives and children, being housekeepers, in possession of wealth, and all the comforts of life, can be all this time living in Georgia or Massachusetts, or any other State in the Union?

Gentlemen fall into this error by confounding the abstract political right of citizenship with the act of inhabitation which the Constitution requires; but, sir, I consider them doubly disqualified from becoming members of this House, by habitual residence out of the State for which they were, or might be, elected, (I know of no better definition of inhabitation than habitual residence; I would thank any gentleman for a better,) and office-holding under the United States, which, so long as they continue to do, is a disqualification in the face of that part of the Constitution which requires that "no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office"—showing clearly an intention to keep distinct and immiscible the executive and legislative functions of the Government; and, sir, to return to the gentleman from Massachusetts, I feel no hesitation in saying that his seat ought to be vacated upon this ground, if he labored under no other disability. I know the decision in the case of Herrick and others, has been quoted as bearing analogy to this part of the case under consideration, but I never take, as a precedent to follow, that which I believe is not founded in truth and principle. I think that decision was wrong, and was so decided only because a number of persons voted in a case that tried their own, which, had they been prevented from doing, as they ought to have been, the decision would have been against them. What are the facts in the case now before us? Why, that the election took place on the 8th of September, 1823, at which time he held an office under the United States, though the Congress for which he was elected commenced the 4th of March previous, and he still held the office until the 23d of October thereafter. Sir, I had always thought that the people made members of the House of Representatives, taking care, however, to make them of such materials as were not obnoxious to the Constitution, which is specific in prescribing the qualifications. But, according to the decision in the case of Herrick and others, and agreeably to the opinion of some, perhaps, in this case, it may be considered that the Speaker makes them by the administration of the oath to support the Constitution, or, perhaps, that the Governor of a State may do it by his certificate, which, however, is only a kind of pass, the evidence of his election, to be presented to this House. But I am still of opinion that the people make members of Congress, at least for this branch, but they must do it agreeably to law, otherwise the act is void.

I will forbear to remark on the report of the Committee of Elections, in the case of the gentleman from Georgia, as it is not now a subject of discussion, (and is one which has been hooked to this, I will not say with what propriety,) farther than to say that I do not entirely concur with the committee in that report.

A motion was now (about 4 o'clock) made to adjourn; lost—ayes 80, noes 95.

Mr. McDUFFIE offered the following amendment:

"That it is the opinion of this House that John Bailey came to the city of Washington in the year 1817, with the intention of returning to the State of Massachusetts, and that the said intention has continued to the time of his election to this House.

Resolved, therefore, That he is entitled to his seat in this House."

Mr. ARCHER moved to adjourn; but the motion was lost—ayes 80, noes 100.

The question on the amendment was agreed to be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. TAYLOR called for a division of the question on the amendment.

Mr. SLOANE called for the previous question, which call the House sustained—ayes 93, noes 78.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, moved to adjourn, and called for the yeas and nays on the question. The House refused to take it by yeas and nays; and the question being taken, the House refused to adjourn—ayes 41, noes 124.

The main question was then put, (the previous question having precluded all debate as well as amendment,) and decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander of Tennessee, Allen of Massachusetts, Allison, Archer, Baylies, P. P. Barbour, J. S. Barbour, Bassett, Beecher, Blair, Bradley, Brown, Buchanan, Burton, Cady, Cambreleng, Campbell of South Carolina, Campbell of Ohio, Cary, Cassedy, Clark, Condict, Conner, Craig, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Day, Dwinell, Dwight, Eaton, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Edwards of North Carolina, Ellis, Floyd, Foote of New York, Forward, Frost, Garrison, Gatlin, Gist, Gurley, Hall, Hamilton, Harris, Hayden, Hayward, Henry, Hogeboom, Holcombe, Hooks, Houston, Isacks, Jenkins, F. So it was resolved that John Bailey is not entitled to a seat in this House.

[Pending the call of the yeas and nays, when the vote of Mr. McDUFFIE was called for, he rose and asked to be excused from voting, and gave as a reason, "that he wished those who should come after him into this House, to understand the grounds upon which his vote rested, for which purpose he offered an amendment, and which had been put aside, without a division, by the previous question."]

The Committee of the Whole were discharged from the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections, on the case of Mr. FORSYTH, and it was laid on the table: and then the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 19.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange a stock bearing an interest of five per cent. for certain stocks bearing an interest of six per cent.; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill to authorize the creation of a stock, to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars, to provide for the awards of the commissioners, under the Treaty with Spain, of the 22d of February, 1819.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the same committee, made a report on the petition of Frederick Perley, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the subject was referred by resolution, reported a bill to alter the times of holding the district court of the United States for the district of Illinois; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time tomorrow.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the final adjustment of land claims in the State of Missouri, and Territory of Arkansas, derived from the Governments of France and Spain," reported the same with amendments; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to repeal the act, entitled "An act for the relief of John B. Hogan, approved the 3d March, 1823;" which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time tomorrow.

On motion of Mr. LATHROP,

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House be requested to inform the Executive of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts that the seat of John Bailey, Esq., returned as a Representative from that State, is vacated by a decision of this House.

On motion of Mr. ARCHER,

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House be requested to inform the Executive of the Commonwealth of Virginia that the seat of William Lee Ball, Esq., returned as a Representative from that State, is vacant by the death of Mr. Ball.

On motion of Mr. BARBER, of Connecticut, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting an appropriation for completing and repairing Fort Griswold, in the State of Connecticut.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, viz: An act to provide for the security of public money in the hands of clerks of courts, attorneys, and marshals, and their deputies; an act for the relief of Napier, Rapelye, and Bennett, and Petray and Viel; an act for the relief of Samuel White; and an act for the relief of Noah Smith, of Maine; in which bills the Senate ask the concurrence of this House.

EFFECT OF THE TARIFF, &c.

Mr. VAN RENSSELAER, from the Committee on Agriculture, who were instructed to inquire if an increase of the duty now established by law, on any article of foreign growth or manufacture, will be for the interest of the agriculturist, and if there be any such article to name the same, together with the additional amount of duty which they deem beneficial to the agricultural interest, made a report; which was laid on the table.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives, instructing them to inquire if an increase of the duty now established by law, on any article of foreign growth or manufacture, will be for the interest of the agriculturist, and if there be any such article, to name the same, together with the additional amount of the duty which they deem beneficial to the agricultural interest, respectfully submit the following report:

That, in the apprehension of your committee, whatever increases the consumption of its products, whether at home or abroad, necessarily advances the interest of agriculture. He who cultivates the soil, looks beyond the supply of his own wants for the profits of his labor. He looks to a market for the surplus products of his industry. The home market, in the opinion of the committee, is at all times to be preferred to the foreign market, when the reward of agricultural pursuits is equal—the former is less precarious than the latter; it is, also, more permanent and certain, and above the reach of restraining and prohibitory duties of foreign hostility; and when the home market can be increased in its demands, without diminishing in a greater degree the foreign consumption, it would seem wise and prudent to promote its extension by every rational means within the sphere of legislation.

Your committee consider the increase of duties on many foreign articles now imported into the United States, would promote the agricultural prosperity of the nation. A portion of population engaged in manufactures would necessarily depend on the farmer for subsistence, and create a more perfect and profitable division of labor than now exists. A new market would be opened, and a new demand created, for all the raw materials which new manufactures would consume. It cannot be denied, that, if all the manufactured articles now consumed by the people of the United States were manufactured within the bounds of our country, from the raw material furnished by ourselves, the value of our lands would be increased, and the profits of agricultural labor considerably augmented. Demand and consumption would be directly extended—a great extent of soil now devoted to the growing of products that afford no sufficient stimulus to cultivation. The soil and climate of the United States are capable of producing the various articles necessary for such manufacturing establishments as will most naturally flourish in this country, and of such as would inevitably be consumed, provided manufacturing labor should be extended. By a comprehensive and rigorous system of policy, calculated to unfold our agricultural resources, a spirit of emulation and industry would be diffused over the land; a vast and active system of internal exchange would rise up; the expense of transportation in heavy articles would be, in a great measure, saved; and, in fact, that which should be ardently wished for, in every agricultural country, a home market, would appear; this, too, would prove a market at once various, in point of demand, but sure, steady, and unchanging. The policy, the caprice, the selfishness, and the hostility of other nations could not affect it. On this point, therefore, the committee cannot entertain any doubt. The extension of domestic manufactures, depending on the production of such raw materials as can be found in this country, must increase the demand and consumption of those materials, and of course secure a new and ready market.

As to the articles of foreign growth, to which an increase of duty should apply, in order to promote the prosperity of our agriculture, the committee need only remark, that, if the principles which they advance be sound, the duty should embrace every raw material found or procured with ease and cheapness, and in abundance in the United States. The committee have confined themselves to the home market, in the brief view which they have presented. The question how far the increase of this home market, by an increase of duty on foreign articles, would affect the demand of our agricultural products abroad, leads to a new train of considerations. The first inquiry which naturally occurs on this point is, what are the inducements with foreign nations to purchase the productions of our soil? what their motives? what the moving causes of the market which they extend? Is their policy founded on favor, reciprocity, self-interest, or necessity? On this subject, there is little ground for difference of opinion. Foreign nations act not for us, but for themselves. Favor, and even reciprocity, form no basis for their measures towards us beyond the compass of bare expediency. They will consume our raw materials when they cannot do better; when they can, they will not consume them. When the consumption of our agricultural products comes in contact with any principle of political economy applicable to their own condition, a hostile tariff meets us at their shores. Hence, the foreign market, for the fruits of our soil, depends but little on the sale which foreign manufactures find in this country; and, whether we purchase more or less, foreign nations will graduate their policy towards us, by a standard independent of any general system of duties which we may adopt; at least, so it appears to your committee.

How long would Great Britain purchase our cotton if her own colonies could supply her demands? How many nations would consume any article that is cultivated by the American agriculturist, if they could find their demand supplied on better and more advantageous conditions, by home industry? These questions are answered by their proposition; it is, therefore, the opinion of the committee, that the foreign market for our agricultural products, and for the staple articles of our exports, in the shape of raw materials, will not be essentially affected by any increase of duty on those foreign manufactures which are composed of similar materials.

As to the amount of duty which should be imposed, it must always depend upon a variety of considerations, which need not be detailed; it should be sufficient to secure the exclusive and constant demand of our raw materials, and to sustain the American manufacturer in his pursuits; it must be competent to build up and protect those manufacturing establishments at present in the country, and which, with a reasonable encouragement, will present a constant demand for those raw materials.

In fact, as to the articles of foreign growth or manufacture, which should be taxed in order to increase our agricultural prosperity, your committee would refer, generally, to the tariff now before the House. The committee do not perceive the necessity of selecting any articles, or of imposing any duties, beyond those embraced by that bill.

THE TARIFF BILL.

On motion of Mr. TON, the House again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CONDIOT in the Chair,) on the bill for amending the acts laying duties on imports.

The question still being on Mr. McKIM's motion to strike out the 177th line of the bill, "on tallow, four cents per pound"—

Mr. BAYLIES said that he felt somewhat discouraged by the symptoms of hostility which had been manifested, in some quarters of the House, to the object of the memorialists of New Bedford and Nantucket. As he had the honor to claim the citizens of one of those towns as constituents, he felt it incumbent on him to offer some remarks touching the memorials and the remonstrances, and, he trusted, that, although four great cities had combined their forces, on this question, that the interests of two humble and obscure villages would not be neglected, if he could make it appear that it was for the advantage of the nation that those interests should be protected.

In the year 1819, Russian and American tallow was quoted, in the price currents, at from 13 to 15 cents. Sperm oil, at that period, (and for some time previous,) had been sold at 85 to 90 cents per gallon. Tallow is now 7 cents per pound, Summer strained oil 37 cents per gallon, and Winter strained oil 50 cents per gallon—a reduction in price of about one-half.

In the years 1820, 1821, and the three first quarters of 1822, there were imported into the United States 10,276,740 pounds of tallow—equal to 364,890 boxes of candles of 30 pounds each, or to the product of 219,533 head of cattle, or to 1,372,091 gallons of oil, which, if consumed in the United States, supposing the material already here to be equal to the necessary consumption, would prevent the consumption, or impede the consumption of the quantity of oil, or the quantity of tallow, which he had named. The estimates of the memorialists would be found, upon examination, to be correct.

There were also imported during that period 321,821 pounds of tallow candles.

The tallow-chandlers say that the imported tallow is not used for the purposes of light, but that it is made into soap and exported.

If this assertion be admitted to be true, what follows? Why, that the tallow of the country, which otherwise would have been used by the soap-makers, is deprived of its market by the importation of foreign tallow; and the price being depressed, and no sales effected to profit, is either worked up into soap in household manufacture, or for light, as the substitute of oil.

Again it is said, that the difficulties in the oil market arise from the superabundance of the article. Why, sir, so they do; but will not those difficulties be increased, if you increase, by importation, the quantity of an article already superabundant?

It cannot be denied that the cheapest light that can be used is that which is furnished by oil; hence it would be good economy in the farmer to sell his tallow, and to supply himself with oil; his tallow would then be brought into the market. But if he was met in the market with this prodigious quantity of foreign tallow, it is almost self-evident that the home tallow would be depressed, and a heavy loss would fall upon the farmer.

If the foreign tallow was prohibited, domestic tallow, near a market, would be exchanged for oil, the tallow made into soap, and exported. Some candles would still be made and exported. The farmer would receive an increased price for his tallow, and obtain oil at a price affording him a cheaper light, and in this manner he would derive an advantage from the exchange. From accurate experiments it has been ascertained that sperm oil, at one dollar per gallon, is a cheaper light than tallow candles at 10½ cents per pound; and, of course, oil, at 50 cents per gallon, would be cheaper than tallow candles at 5½ cents per pound.

Oil, at the price at which it can be imported at a profit, is certainly a cheaper light than tallow, even at its present low prices; but the habits of a people are not suddenly changed; and as tallow is very low, compared with the prices two or three years since, the farmers would continue to use it, and not so readily change their light, as they would if the tallow was higher.

It would, in fact, be a saving to those who now use tallow candles, if they were obliged to use oil at double its present price. This fact distinguishes this kind of protection from all other kinds. The expense is not increased to the consumer, but lessened.

A species of reasoning is employed by the tallow-chandlers, which must be fallacious. A pound of tallow (say they) is purchased in Russia, or elsewhere, imported into the United States, and pays one cent duty. It is here manufactured into soap, exported to the West Indies, and exchanged for a pound of coffee; which, when imported into the United States, pays five cents duty; therefore the pound of tallow pays six cents duty. Now, this mode of reasoning, if not convincing, is at least convenient; but it is something like that of the boy, in the story book, who counted his chickens before his eggs were hatched. Every possible case may be supposed: a pair of silk stockings may be purchased in France for one dollar; imported into the United States, pay 15 cents duty, be exported to Madeira, exchanged for a gallon of wine, which, when imported, would pay a duty of one dollar; therefore, according to this reasoning, a pair of silk stockings, purchased for one dollar, would pay $1 15 duty. Any estimate or calculation, founded on such a basis as this, may, and probably would, fail.

It is said, by the memorialists of New York and Baltimore, that all tallow, for a long time past, introduced into this, from foreign countries, has been attended with a heavy loss to the importer. If it be so, it would certainly be for the advantage of the importer if the importation was prohibited. And if it be so, the prohibition of importation would certainly be advantageous to the nation; for, if we import at a loss, the loss is to the nation as well as to the individuals who import. We buy of Russia much more than we sell to her. Therefore, that branch of trade is not to be particularly favored. The same cannot be said of oil; for, although the whale fishery may be prosecuted at a loss to the ship-owner, and the seamen may be inadequately remunerated for their labors, yet the gain is the result of labor—of labor which takes from the ocean a mass of useless matter, gives it a value, brings it into active operation for the use and comfort of man, or as an article of commerce, or a mean of exchange. The loss is to the individual who engages in the fishery—the gain is to the nation.

The tallow-chandlers say that candles are nearly pushed out of use by the excessive importation of oil. "It is (say they) not probable that there is more than a tenth part of the candles used in our country that there used to be; and we judge from our own experience that not one-twentieth part the quantity is exported." They certainly must have been in the dark when they made this estimate. There never has been over 50,000 barrels of sperm oil consumed in one year in the United States. Of this quantity, after deducting for lighthouses, the lighting of streets, and what is used for wool and in manufactories, 30,000 barrels may be left for the use of families, shops, &c.; allow six persons to a family, 10,000,000 of people give one million and two-thirds of a million of families—those who use oil will average ten gallons to a family; 30,000 barrels will, therefore, supply but 90,000 families, leaving nearly 1,577,000 families to use tallow candles; this shows that only 5½ per cent. of the families use oil, leaving 94½ per cent. of the families to be supplied with light in some other mode; if the assertion of the tallow-chandlers be true, most of our people must do without light.

Equally are they mistaken (as I think) as to their numerical superiority over the whale fishermen. During the last year there were, in the United States, about 150 ships employed in the sperm whale fishery, and 50 in the right whale fishery; each of these ships was manned with 22 hands—say 4,400 seamen in the whole.

The whole population, directly interested in the whale fishery, cannot be estimated at less than 30,000. The tallow-chandlers say that "imported tallow is not fit to be manufactured into candles for exportation, or for home consumption;" of course it can make no difference to them, so far as the manufacture of candles is concerned. But they say "an increased duty will prevent its manufacture and limit the export." It is evident that they wish to keep down the price of tallow, and therefore their interest is at variance with the interest of the growers of cattle.

Should it be admitted that all the evils which the tallow-chandlers apprehend would be realized, yet they find a remedy in the drawback, and the allowance of the drawback reduces the protection to whalemens to almost nothing. I do not know but that I ought to move that the section which allows the drawback should be stricken from the bill.

They obtain, by that section, 75 per cent. of the duty on the export of the article. I am aware that much may be said about the frauds which may be practised on the revenue—I do not pretend to deny but that frauds may be committed; every article embraced in the bill is liable to the same objection; if the whole community are rogues, there is no question but that many frauds may be successfully attempted; but if these tallow-chandlers are what they represent themselves to be, (and I do not feel disposed to question their assertions,) but little danger on this score is to be apprehended—if they are not, they ought not to receive the benefit of the drawback.

An increased duty on tallow would more immediately promote the interests of the growers of cattle; by the farmer, the effect would be felt at once, while the benefit to the fishery, though equally sure, would be more remote.

The interests of the whale fishery, and of agriculture, are inseparably connected; this connexion will clearly appear, if the following circumstances are considered: Nothing is used in the construction of the whale ships but what is obtained from the farmers, with the exception of iron, duck, and cordage.

The timber is obtained from the woodlands of the farmer. The plank are sawed at his mills. His teams are employed in the transportation of the timber and plank—a transportation frequently of twenty, thirty, or forty miles. A ship going round Cape Horn requires from 100 to 150 barrels of beef and pork, 150 barrels of flour, a considerable quantity of peas, beans, cheese, butter, rice, corn, &c.; supplies not drawn from a small territorial space, but from a wide country. Staves and hard pine boards for heading are obtained almost exclusively from the South, particularly from Georgia and the Carolinas.

In the construction of the ships the services of a numerous class of mechanics are required, viz:

Shipwrights, ship-joiners, caulkers, riggers, blockmakers, sailmakers, blacksmiths, boat-builders, painters, &c.

All these mechanics are fed by the farmers.

Another branch of mechanical industry, not much required in other vessels, is in constant requisition for the service of the fishery, viz: that of coopers, in manufacturing the casks necessary to contain the oil which is obtained in the whale voyages.

The manufacture of iron hoops for the casks has already become a great and profitable branch of manufacturing labor. Twelve hundred tons are said to be annually required.

Numbers of coasting vessels are constantly employed in the service of the whale ships. First, in bringing from New York and the States further South the flour and provisions for feeding the crew, and in the transportation of staves, boards, &c.; and then in transporting the oil along the coast to supply the lighthouses, and the towns and cities on the Atlantic.

Hemp, iron, and duck, pay high duties to the revenue, as also the molasses, sugar, tea, coffee, liquors, &c., which are used for ship stores.

The mind, in pursuing the business created by this fishery into all its ramifications, is lost in utter astonishment at finding such a vast variety of interests to be involved in it, and such an equal diffusion of its benefits; not enriching monopolists, but bringing plenty to the door of the farmer, the mechanic, the manufacturer, and the merchant; not paying a miserable stipend of monthly wages for the toils, the dangers, the sufferings, the sickness, and the lives of our noble-hearted and invaluable seamen, but admitting them to share the profits as well as the dangers of their long and adventurous voyages. The oil is shared in certain proportions by the ship-owners, masters, mates, seamen, and boys. The interest is common. The profit is common. The loss is common. There is certainly no branch of navigation or manufactures which, according to the capital employed, requires so much labor as this.

The memorialists of New Bedford and Nantucket expect no relief, unless it shall appear, after a full examination, that it would be for the national interest that they should be relieved.

Every day's experience proves that it is to our Navy we must look for the protection of our commerce.

That Navy, to be efficient, must be manned by young, hardy, and active seamen. As a nursery of such seamen this fishery is invaluable. Every whale ship takes from six to nine green hands; and, after one voyage, returns them finished seamen, made so, sir, by the long and continuous voyage, and by the sober, correct, and steady discipline which universally prevails in these ships. They are returned with untainted morals, and with qualities peculiar and great; yes, sir, great. It requires no ordinary resolution to unfurl the sail to the winds of heaven; to separate from persons and objects made dear by association, connexion, and family ties; to abandon for years the face of civilization—their ship their world, with nothing around them but the wide waste of waters;

"Their march upon the mountain wave,
Their home upon the deep."

It is by long separation from accustomed associations, that men acquire that habitude of thought and of action, which qualifies them for the employment to which they are destined. The seamen nurtured in this employment are the hardiest, the boldest, the most adventurous, the most enterprising in the world. Without question, they surpass all others. The nature of their employment stimulates and strengthens qualities the most rare, and the most valuable.

It is not by creeping along our coast, or dodging into a port in the West Indies, or performing a fair-weather voyage to Europe, that seamen are made. In this fishery the very boys are fashioned into heroes: they are inured to danger in its direst form. The man who can steer a boat upon, or strike a harpoon into a whale, cannot be a coward; courage is as necessary to him as the air to life, and not only courage but coolness and presence of mind. Nurtured on the ocean, he is familiarized to its dangers; no circumstance can disconcert, no disasters intimidate him. The horrors of a sea fight have no terrors for the whaler; he is constantly engaged in fights, which render the puny efforts of hostile man but sport to him. Some of these seamen were in the Essex, and was the gallant commander of that ill-fated ship now present, he could tell you sir, that, during that horrible scene at Valparaiso, when he stood on his deck knee deep in blood and carnage, when his men were falling in masses around him, until, to use the words of Mr. Madison, "humanity tore down the colors which valor had nailed to the mast"—he could tell you sir, that, during this disastrous time, during this scene of horrors, he found no braver spirits in his ship than the whalers of New England.

A gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) in a speech with which he favored this Committee, a few days since, on the general merits of this bill, has appropriated the splendid eulogium pronounced by Edmund Burke, in the British Parliament, 1774, to our ancestors generally, and to our commerce generally. It was hardly fair in him, hostile as he is to the interests of the whalers (Mr. CAMBRELENG denied that he was hostile to them. Mr. BAYLIES expressed his satisfaction to find it so, and continued)—I say, sir, that this beautiful effusion of eloquence was elicited from Burke on the subject of the whale fishery, when the fishery was confined to Nantucket and New Bedford. It will well bear repeating, and with the indulgence of the Committee I will repeat it.

Mr. BAYLIES then read an extract from Burke's speech on conciliation with America:

"As to the wealth which the colonies have drawn from the sea by their fisheries, you had all that matter fully opened at your bar.

"You surely thought those acquisitions of value: for they even seemed to excite your envy; and yet the spirit by which that enterprising employment has been exercised, ought rather, in my opinion, to have raised your esteem and admiration. And pray, sir, what in the world is equal to it? Pass by the other parts, and look at the manner in which the people of New England have of late carried on the whale fishery. Whilst we follow them among the tumbling mountains of ice, and behold them penetrating into the deepest frozen recesses of Hudson's Bay and Davis's Straits; whilst we are looking for them beneath the arctic circle—we hear that they have pierced into the opposite region of polar cold; that they are at the antipodes, and engaged under the frozen serpent of the South. Falkland Islands, which seemed too remote and romantic an object for the grasp of national ambition, is but a stage and resting place in the progress of their victorious industry.

"Nor is the equinoctial heat more discouraging to them than the accumulated Winter of both the poles. We know that, whilst some of them draw the line, and strike the harpoon, on the coast of Africa, others run the longitude, and pursue their gigantic game along the coast of Brazil. No sea but what is vexed by their fisheries. No climate that is not witness to their toils.

"Neither the perseverance of Holland, nor the activity of France, nor the dexterous and firm sagacity of English enterprise, ever carried this most perilous mode of hardy industry to the extent to which it has been pushed by this recent people; a people who are still, as it were, in the gristle, and not yet hardened into the bone of manhood."

Thus did that most illustrious statesman speak in the British Parliament, of this fishery in 1774, when it had not attained, in any degree, to its present magnitude, whether considered in reference to the capital, tonnage, number of seamen, or the length and duration of the voyages. The flight of an imagination which seemed to pervade the whole circle of human existence, did not waft his mind to the points to which these enterprising, these adventurous navigators, have attained. Instead of stopping at the Falkland Islands, or the polar ices of the South, the all-creating imagination of Burke could scarcely have followed them along the long track of waters which they now encompass. The range of their enterprise is limited only by the limits of the world. They now pursue their "gigantic game" all round an ocean which, in 1774, they had not entered, or scarcely approached. Those lonely isles in the South sea, on "ocean's bound," are as familiar to them, more familiar, than the City of Washington. Sometimes they may be found at the desolate Massafuero. Sometimes on the coast of California. Sometimes off the secluded harbors of Japan. Sometimes at Madagascar. Sometimes at New Holland, and sometimes at that horrible region, lately discovered, called New Shetland, the clime of eternal Winter.

This fishery began very early, in the vicinity of Nantucket, in open boats. In 1774, it was what Burke described it to be. With its present condition, the Committee are acquainted.

It has grown to its present greatness without patronage, without bounty, without protection, almost without notice.

For protection, the whalers have never asked. While subsistence was to be derived from their employment, they never obtruded themselves upon the Government. Contented with the gains of their "hard industry," they persisted in this course until, to use the language of the New York and Baltimore memorialists, they found themselves "half ruined," and, to prevent total ruin, they have presented their grievances to the nation.

Much complaint has been made by the tallow-chandlers, that they have selected three particular years to show the excessive importation of foreign tallow. The reduction of oil to its present ruinous prices, happened precisely at the time when that importation was made. When they felt the evil, they complained, and not till then.

So important has this branch of navigation been deemed by the maritime nations of Europe, that Americans are sometimes tempted to leave their homes, and to avail themselves of the great advantages arising from the system of bounties with which it is protected there.

Many of the English whaling ships are commanded by Americans. The South sea whale fishery was, I believe, established at Milford Haven, in England, by an American. Previous to the commencement of the French revolution, the Government of France foreseeing the great advantage which would result from the establishment of this fishery in that kingdom, held out such great inducements in bounties, that a colony of whalers emigrated from Nantucket and New Bedford, and established themselves at Dunkirk, where the fishery was prosecuted successfully, until, in the progress of the revolution, property became insecure, and the French marine was threatened with annihilation. They then abandoned the pursuit, and returned to America.

Europe strives to alter the course of nature, by calling back the descendants of those whom she had forced from her bosom. Europe strives to lure to her shores, by favors and facilities, protection and bounty, a race of men whose value is well known there. Could we witness their departure without inquietude? Could we witness the decay and ruin of this fishery, which, long ago, the illustrious Burke declared to be unequalled in this world, without regret, without deep regret? This is their first application to their own Government. The application embraces not a solitary interest; not the interest of the ship-owners and seamen only, but the interest of the farmer, the mechanic, and the manufacturer.

I trust the protection which this bill proposes will be granted. It is small—it is small indeed; but it is something—something which will carry to the whalers an assurance that this Government, protecting, as it does, all other interests, will not be entirely regardless of theirs.

When Mr. BAYLIES had concluded—

Mr. CAMBRELENG, of New York, rose in reply, and contended that the proposed duty, if granted, would not be any relief to those engaged in the fisheries. He stated the operation of the duty to be nugatory, because a drawback is allowed by the bill on exported soap and candles, and the whole amount of imported tallow, (about a million of pounds,) is now made into soap and candles for exportation—so that the Government would collect the duty with one hand and pay it back in drawback with the other.

Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, went fully into an exposition of the facts of the case; showed why the Russian tallow is cheaper, its use in the manufacture of soap—the amount exported, the benefit of its use to the manufacturer, and the gain to the country. He then went on to show that the benefits of the duty to the whalers and oil dealers would be very doubtful, and would by no means compensate for the loss of exports, which must be its effect. He showed that the proposed drawback would be of no use to the manufacturer, being paid to the importing merchant; and if it were, it could not be estimated, because the import is in tallow, and the export chiefly in soap. He remarked with severity on the doctrine that a balance resulting from a comparison of the amount of imports and exports to any particular country, shows whether we gain or lose by trade with that country—which he denominated jargon and nonsense. We export nothing to the South Seas, and bring back great amounts from there; so the balance of the trade is against us. Is it therefore a losing trade?

Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, spoke in favor of retaining the duty: he did not think that the manufacture should be protected at the expense of the farmer and the fisherman. If you keep the mean tallow out of the market, you aid the farmer; for his tallow goes to supply its place: and at the next step you benefit the fisherman, because his oil goes to supply the place of the farmer's tallow. This may be an injury to the tallow chandlers; but then the whole bill is built on that principle, and if one is smitten by it, he must strike his next neighbor.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, replied to Mr. WEBSTER, and stated the claims of the whalers to the protection of this country. He observed that the inhabitants of Nantucket were almost ruined by the Revolutionary war; that in 1783, the British, sensible of the great value of such seamen, offered very liberal bounties to the inhabitants of Nantucket to go either to Great Britain or to settle in their colonies in this country. That the French nation, through Marquis de Lafayette, made very liberal offers also; that both offers had been rejected, a few instances only excepted; that, while England, France, and Holland had paid heavy bounties in aid of their whale fisheries, our whale fishery had been prosecuted successfully, unaided by the Government—it had, indeed, paid heavy taxes to the Government. He added that he was proud of the fact; that it was an example worth recording in our history, &c. He objected to the drawback on candles, because of their confessedly bad quality, they being so bad as to render it disgraceful to offer them at home. Mr. R. went into a calculation to show that large quantities of our own tallow as well as the foreign went into the soap exported. He showed how much greater the amount of the interests to be protected in the case of the whalers was than in that of the tallow chandlers—one employed 50,000 tons of shipping, the other but 4 or 5,000, &c.

Mr. WEBSTER replied to the argument of Mr. REED, and contended that, if the duty is to do any good, it must be by prohibition, and in that case the Russian tallow only goes to England, and aids the English tallow chandlers against our own.

Mr. LIVERMORE maintained that the English manufacturer would not gain so much as was contended, because he must still import his pot and pearl ash. Soap, with the additional duty, may be made as cheap in the United States as in England, though with less profit to the manufacturers, &c.

Mr. MERCER, of Virginia, opposed the duty, and went into an extensive calculation to show that, as much more tallow was exported in a manufactured form than was imported, the prohibition would be impolitic. He dreaded the temptation to fraud, and deprecated the creation of a necessity for the English system of guards against evasions of the revenue, &c.

Mr. TOD replied to the various arguments urged against the duty—urged that the one class of memorialists was entitled to as much credit as the other, though it did not seem to be granted to them. That large quantities of the inferior tallow imported, were used in the manufacture of candles. He rebutted the impracticability of a drawback, by the fact that a drawback of the duty on imported molasses is allowed on the export of rum. He replied to the argument from the probability of fraud, by showing that before drawback could be claimed, the amount of tallow imported by the same individual must be proved. He insisted on the disproportion of the imported and exported tallow. He retorted some reflections of Mr. WEBSTER, on the doctrine of the balance of trade; he quoted the advice of Lord Bacon—adverted to the policy of England, and declared his determination to adhere to "jargon," which had raised that empire to the summit of wealth and power. The whale fisheries were in imminent danger, and without protection must decline if not perish; we give them no bounty, and they now, for the first time, ask a small protection, &c.

Mr. WEBSTER rejoined—explained some of the grounds he had before taken; and further enlarged on the doctrine respecting the balance of trade. He protested against the authority of Bacon, in the reign of James I, (the era of monopolies, and every thing contracted and ridiculous in commercial matters,) and referred to the improvement which had been the result of two centuries. The value of trade was not altered by its being circuitous—provided it was profitable in the end, the more circuitous and multifarious in its intermediate stages the better for the interests of navigation.

Mr. REED spoke in reply. Mr. FOOT stated facts. Mr. TOD corrected some misunderstanding; and the debate was further protracted, between Messrs. MERCER, TOD, WEBSTER, REED, and CAMBRELENG, till past four o'clock; when the question was taken on striking out the duty, and lost—ayes 52, noes 84.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to amend the 6th section, by striking out, in the fourth and fifth lines, the words "by, for, or on account of the person or persons importing the same." [The whole section reads as follows:]

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed a drawback of seventy-five per centum of the duties by this act imposed on tallow, which may be manufactured into candles or soap, by, for, or on account of the person or persons importing the same, upon the exportation thereof within nine months after the said importation, and in the manner prescribed by the act, entitled 'An act to allow drawback of duties on spirits distilled and sugar refined within the United States, and for other purposes,' so far as the same may be applicable, and under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Before this amendment was acted upon, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, March 20.

On motion of Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation adequate to the extinguishment of reservations granted to certain Cherokee Indians, within the limits of North Carolina and Tennessee.

Mr. BRECK, from the committee to whom the subject was recommitted, reported an amendment to the resolution formerly reported to the House, authorizing the purchase of a Portrait of Washington, so as to make it read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to procure from Rembrandt Peale, of Philadelphia, a painting (to be placed in the Capitol) of Washington, on horseback, on a canvass of not less than eighteen feet high, and thirteen wide; the middle and back grounds to contain a representation of the battle of Princeton, or such other appropriate scenery as the President shall direct: Provided, The same can be obtained for a sum not exceeding three thousand dollars; and that the said Peale furnish a rich gilt frame therefor, at least fifteen inches wide.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, the Committee on Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act, entitled "An act supplementary to, and to amend an act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,' passed March 2d, 1799, and for other purposes," approved the 1st March, 1823, as allows a discount on cash payment for duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported.

A bill from the Senate, "for the relief of Noah Smith, of Maine," was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

A bill from the Senate, "for the relief of Samuel White," was twice read, and committed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

A bill from the Senate, "for the relief of Napier, Rapelye and Bennet, and Petray and Viel," was twice read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A bill from the Senate, "to provide for the security of public moneys in the hands of marshals, clerks, and attorneys, and their deputies," was twice read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

An engrossed bill, "to alter the time of holding the District Court of the United States for the District of Illinois," was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate.

An engrossed bill, "to repeal an act approved the 3d March, 1823, entitled 'An act for the relief of John B. Hogan,'" which was ordered to a third reading to-day, having been announced, Mr. OWEN of Alabama, moved to lay the bill on the table for further deliberation, but withdrew the motion to give way to Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, who moved that it be committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAMILTON, who had moved yesterday for its third reading to-day, explained the circumstances of the case, and read part of the act intended to be repealed, which, he contended, went to excuse John B. Hogan from a settlement of his accounts to an indefinite period.

Mr. MCCOY opposed the commitment.

Mr. HAMILTON rejoined; and the motion to commit it to a Committee of the Whole prevailed.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, accompanied by a report from the Secretary of State, enclosing copies of the correspondence instituted by the President with foreign Governments, since 28th February 1823, relative to the African Slave Trade.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then, by a vote of 93 to 19, went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for amending the several acts laying duties on imports, and the question being on the amendment yesterday offered by Mr. WEBSTER, to the 6th section, Mr.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

MARCH, 1824.

Top withdrew his objection to it, and the amendment was adopted.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the section was further amended, by striking out "nine," in the 6th line, and substituting "twelve," and, on motion of Mr. REED, by striking out the words "candles or," in the 4th line.

The section, as finally amended, reads as follows:

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed a drawback of seventy-five per centum of the duties by this act imposed on tallow, which may be manufactured into soap, upon the exportation thereof, within twelve months after the said importation, and in the manner prescribed by the act, entitled 'An act to allow drawback of duties on spirits distilled, and sugar refined, within the United States, and for other purposes,' so far as the same may be applicable, and under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. BRECK moved to amend the 97th line, by excepting the article of twine from among others on which five cents per pound duty is laid, and adding the words "and on twine ten cents per pound."

Several memorials were read.

Mr. BRECK, Mr. REED, and Mr. BAYLIES, made some remarks for and against the motion; and the question being taken, the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, moved to add, after the 254th line, "On wines now subject by law to a duty of 15 cents per gallon, a duty of 25 cents per gallon."

Mr. TRIMBLE stated some facts in relation to the reasons which induced Congress to lay the 15 cent duty.

Mr. FOOT replied. Mr. GURLEY wished that claret wine might be excepted, as it was in his country generally used, even by the poor and laboring classes.

Mr. TOP supported the exception.

Mr. POINSETT wished for farther information, dreading the moral effect of driving the people from wine to whiskey.

Mr. CLAY opposed the amendment, as being injurious to the revenue, and the navigating interest, without being beneficial to any branch of American industry.

Mr. WEBSTER supported the same view, and thought that the duty on Madeira wine ought to be reduced rather than augmented.

Mr. HAMILTON hoped that the motion would be withdrawn. He believed that the present duty on wine required a judicious revision, but this did not fairly pertain to the present bill.

Mr. TOP replied.

Mr. STEWART advocated the duty, as a revenue duty. He compared the duties on salt, sugar, tea, &c., with this on wines, and contended that it was out of all proportion. The people of Louisiana were well able to pay the duty, &c.

Mr. HAMILTON replied to Mr. TOP, whom he understood as reflecting, by implication, on his motives, as being aimed at delay.

Mr. TOP disavowed all such implication, and pressed a speedy decision.

Mr. CAMBRELENG agreed with the gentleman last up; spoke to the question of fraud, and asked for facts from the mover.

Mr. FOOT replied, and stated several particulars, and then withdrew his motion, to give time for farther inquiry.

Mr. MERCER moved to amend the bill in the 177th line by striking out four cents (duty on tallow) and inserting one cent.

Mr. TOP objected to the motion, as having virtually been passed upon by the decision of yesterday.

The Chair pronounced the motion to be in order.

Mr. MERCER supported his motion by quotations and calculations from the documents furnished from the Departments, and reasoning from the practice of England.

Mr. REED replied, and thought this country was in such different circumstances from Great Britain that her practice did not furnish an example.

Mr. WAYNE stated a number of facts to show the injury to the farmer and grazier from the importation of foreign tallow, and hoped that one of the few opportunities to benefit the farmer which the bill contains (to which bill, however, he was a friend) would not be neglected.

Mr. MERCER spoke in answer to the opponents of the motion, defended the English precedents, and contended that, if the duty was laid, all the Russian tallow would stop in England, and the English would supersede us in the South American trade. The duty, he contended, would not affect the farmer, as what was imported, would be immediately exported again. He deprecated the necessity of oaths, derived from the collection of the duty, unless the system of public or private warehousing in use in Britain, were adopted, to both of which he objected. The duty would present to the tallow chandler a temptation of $180,000 a year to fraud; and when fraud is introduced into one branch of the revenue, it quickly spreads into all branches. Mr. M. concluded with some general remarks on the system of the bill.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, opposed the amendment, as the proposed tax would benefit a branch of industry incomparably more valuable than the manufacture of soap and candles; it was the right arm of the nation in respect to her marine interest; while it encouraged ship building, it furnished the best and only permanent nursery for seamen, &c.

Mr. TOP contended that the present motion was virtually the same as that decided yesterday.

Mr. MERCER opposed this view, and explained. The question was then put, and decided in the negative—ayes 49.

Mr. MERCER then moved to strike out four and insert two cents.

The question was taken, and decided in the negative—ayes 62, noes 112.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to amend the bill in the 40th line, "on hemp two cents per pound," by striking out two and inserting "one-and-a-half."

Mr. C. objected to the duty proposed, as being a mere tax, not calculated to benefit the domestic product, and to injure the manufacturers of that imported. He traced the course of legislation on the subject for thirty years, and insisted that the use of native hemp had retrograded rather than advanced. The British duty was only $21—that now proposed, more than doubled the duty.

On motion of Mr. REED, the Committee then rose, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, March 22.

Mr. BUCK presented a memorial of Captain Alden Partridge, accompanied with the results of sundry experiments on the fire of infantry and artillery; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the whole House to which is referred the "bill to authorize the President of the United States, to cause to be issued to Captain Alden Partridge fixed ammunition, and for other purposes."

Mr. WHITTLESEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Morris Goldsmith and Anthony Roderick, accompanied with a bill for their relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, from the same committee, also made a report upon the petition of Robert Blean, accompanied with a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 8th of May, 1822, copies of all the correspondence between the Secretary and the banks in which the public moneys were deposited, from the 1st of January, 1817, to the 8th of May, 1822, that is considered as included, either directly or indirectly, in the terms of the resolution, which has not been heretofore communicated to the House. Laid on the table.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel White," reported the same, without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MERCER submitted the following:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of connecting the property of the United States, at or near Harper's Ferry, by the erection of a bridge across the Shenandoah, at or near the mouth thereof."

The mover supported the resolution by a few remarks, when the question being taken, it was adopted—ayes 62, noes 55.

ADJOURNMENT, &c.

Mr. ALLEN called up the joint resolution offered by him some days since, respecting an adjournment; but the House refused to consider it—ayes 44, noes 83.

Mr. RANDOLPH observed, that the vernal equinox was now passed, and he thought it was time that every member who did not intend to rely on the public crib, but to feed out of his own corn-house, should go home and plant his corn; and he hoped that the honorable member from Massachusetts would continue to repeat his motion until it should obtain a more favorable reception by the House. The protracted sessions of Congress (which, however, he thanked God, could take place only every other year) he considered as fraught with incalculable mischief. They excluded from the public service an important and valuable class of men.

[Here the Speaker interposed, and pronounced Mr. R.'s remarks to be out of order, inasmuch as the House had refused to consider the resolution.]

Mr. R. observed that he had intended to conclude his observations by making a motion; but he should stand corrected.

Mr. TAYLOR then made a motion to alter the hour of meeting to eleven o'clock, A. M., and supported his motion by a short speech, in which he adverted to the amount of business in arrear, and the injurious consequence of long sessions.

Mr. RANDOLPH again rose, and said, that he should take the liberty which the gentleman from New York seemed so willing to take himself, but to refuse to others—no uncommon case—of making some observations on an interdicted subject. He should, in the selection of his topics, pursue his own lights, however feeble, without availing himself of the very great discernment, sagacity, experience—(he wished he could enlarge the catalogue)—of the gentleman from New York. I, for one, said Mr. R., voted for the repeal of that preposterous rule which, even if this building were on fire, prevented the House from adjourning before 4 o'clock, and I did suppose that, in its spirit, it went to repeal the other rule on the same subject, in reference to the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole. Four hours per diem is as long as I, at least, am able to endure—I will not say, the pestilential atmosphere of this House, but an atmosphere, such as nothing but the wretched animals plunged in the Grotto del Cane, near Naples, were compelled to breathe, to gratify the laudable curiosity of the very benevolent philosophers of modern Europe. I hope the gentleman's motion will not be adopted—and I now give notice, that I mean to follow up his motion with one which relates to a subject which requires, if not the actual cautery, at least the knife—it is a motion to reduce the per diem allowance of members of this House, to what it was when I first had the honor of a seat here, and which I then thought, and still think, as a per diem allowance, was fixed a great deal too high.

If the present system is suffered to continue, instead of having, in Congress, great leading professional men, we shall have what have been well denominated the merely mechanical, the instrumental members of those professions. And, as to the landed interest, how can we expect it to be represented, when it is ruin to a landed man to attend here? I, for one, cannot, sir, consent to sit here for so many months, de die in diem, for six days in the week, and hear nothing but the same strain forever repeated. It is enough, sir, to worry the patience of Job himself. I shall therefore move that, from and after the end of the present session of Congress, the per diem allowance of members be six dollars, and the allowance for travelling expenses be the same sum for every twenty miles travelling.

The question was then taken on Mr. TAYLOR'S resolution, and carried.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved the following:

"Resolved, That from and after the end of the present session of Congress, the per diem allowance of members shall be six dollars, and six dollars for every twenty miles travelling."

This resolution he desired to lay on the table, and he gave notice that he should call up its consideration on Friday next.

The question being put on laying the resolve on the table, it was carried—ayes 80, noes 60.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. McLANE moved to postpone all the previous orders of the day to take up the bill making provision for the naval service of the United States for the year 1824. The motion was carried—ayes 84, noes 68.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BARTLETT, in the Chair,) on the consideration of the above bill, and proceeded to consider the same, item by item.

Some of the items gave rise to considerable discussion, particularly that which proposes to appropriate $225,000 for "contingent expenses, including all extra allowances." In this discussion, Messrs. COBB, COCKE, McLANE, TAYLOR, FORSYTH, and others, engaged.

Mr. COCKE examined in detail the expenditures under this head during the past year, to many of which he took exception, and particularly to the charge for travelling expenses, which formed a part of almost every account settled, from which he said, it would appear that almost the whole Navy of the United States was consequently employed in travelling from one part of the country to another. To many other items he also objected, particularly to the allowance to the Navy Agent at New York, of more than $7,000, under this head, whilst he was largely indebted to the Government, &c.—to extra pay, house rent, &c., to surgeons, recruiting officers, &c.—to the payment of $1,000 to a professional gentleman for services of Judge Advocate; and lastly, to the expenses allowed to the Commissioners of the Navy for going to the Eastward, some time about the New York Races, but perhaps, also, upon other business. Mr. C. concluded by moving to reduce the appropriation for this item to an hundred and fifty thousand dollars, which he afterwards varied to an hundred and eighty thousand dollars.

Mr. McLANE replied to the objections of Mr. COCKE, by statements derived from official papers which he had received in reply to inquiries made upon the subject at the proper offices by the Committee of Ways and Means, although he himself thought there were items of expenditure under this head which were objectionable, and was inclined to think that this fund had not been administered as it ought to have been. But many of these items, he said, had always been allowed, and were indispensable—such as the necessary expense of travelling to attend courts martial, fuel, quarters, &c. From the information which he had received, this item of appropriation was subject to the payment of clerk-hire, office-rent, stationery, transportation of munitions of war, freight, pilotage, wharfage, storage, and all those objects of expenditure not included under any specific head of appropriation, though forming collectively an important item. If there were any abuse in the expenditure, he was inclined to think it was in allowing travelling expenses to officers who are not ordered on special service, but merely to join their ships. If that were forbidden, it would reduce the amount perhaps some eight or ten thousand dollars. At present, however, he thought it better to make the appropriation called for, and leave the abuses, if any, to be corrected by the administration of the Navy Department. Mr. McL. here read several papers connected with this subject, one of which, from the Secretary of the Navy, stated the sum of $225,000 to be absolutely necessary for the contingent expenditure of the present year. Mr. McL. also reviewed the history of this particular appropriation, and showed that the amount now asked for was less than the average appropriation for the same item for the last five years, &c.

The question being taken on filling the blank with $225,000, as asked by the Navy Department, and moved by the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, there were, ayes 32, noes 54; a quorum not being present, an officer was despatched to summons absent members.

Mr. WHIPPLE made some remarks in support of the appropriation; as, if it were withheld, serious embarrassment might ensue. The present incumbent had not had time to reform abuses, if they did exist. He hoped a thorough investigation would take place as soon as the proper time had been allowed to him.

Mr. TAYLOR stated what had been formerly expended under this head. He showed why it should be somewhat larger the present year, from the employment of the West India squadron, &c. He vindicated the conduct of the late Secretary of the Navy, but could have wished that several of the items in the account of contingent expenses had been more explicit. On the whole, he did not see that the sum could now be reduced.

Mr. LIVERMORE observed that, whatever the sum appropriated under the head of contingencies, it was always expended. It was never too much, but always just enough—and so he supposed it would be if it were made half a million. He did not impute this to malfeasance in the Heads of Departments, &c.

Mr. COCKE replied to Mr. TAYLOR. The additional expenses occasioned by the West India squadron, and those for repairs, were not included in this amount. The whole of this sum went to the gentlemen on shore. Those in service, at sea, got none of it. He had found, on inquiring in the offices, that certain accounts were allowed because S. T. was written against them. He was opposed to all usage and custom not fixed by law.

Mr. CULPEPER hoped the appropriation would be reduced, as he was satisfied some improper sums had been formerly allowed.

Mr. DWIGHT wished information as to one item of expenditure, which was to be allowed to Henry Eckford, of $2,000 for an acre of ground in a barren country, &c.

Mr. TUCKER stated reasons why the Committee of Accounts for the Navy Department had not reported generally on the subject of these expenditures.

Mr. WHIPPLE replied to Mr. COCKE, and referred to a former year, when the appropriation in the Indian Department had been suddenly reduced, and sad consequences ensued. To Mr. LIVERMORE he answered by referring to the fact that $17,000 of last year's appropriation remained, at this moment, unexpended.

Mr. LIVERMORE corrected the gentleman last up. The balance was not 17,000, but only $11 37 cents. The appropriation asked was for extra allowances, and officers would always present demands enough to absorb it.

Mr. STORRS corrected a misunderstanding as to some of the documents which had been quoted, which he showed was no basis from which to calculate the present appropriation.

Mr. McLANE replied, and explained the document referred to by Mr. STORRS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, required further explanation on the items intended to be covered by the bill—particularly one item of $1,500, for the service of a Judge Advocate at Boston, who served but for sixty-two days.

Mr. TEN EYCK explained some local circumstances, respecting the Navy Point, at Sackett's Harbor.

Mr. FULLER replied to Mr. WILLIAMS, and explained some circumstances in relation to the item referred to by him.

Mr. COCKE made some further observations, and read a letter from one of the auditors of the Treasury in relation to certain accounts, copies of which had been requested by Mr. C.

The question being then taken on filling the blank with $225,000, it was decided in the negative.

The question then recurring on the amendment proposed by Mr. COCKE, to fill the blank with $180,000, and, being put, it passed in the affirmative.

Mr. McLANE moved to amend the 18th line, by inserting, after the word "stations," the following: "also, of naval constructors, store-keepers, instructors, master workmen, clerks of the yards, of the check, and of commanders and porters attached to the navy yards and shore stations."

This amendment was agreed to, and, thus amended, the clause will read, "For pay, subsistence, and allowances of every description, to all commissioned and warrant officers employed at the several navy yards and shore stations; also, of naval constructors, store-keepers, instructors, master workmen, clerks of the yards, of the check, and of commanders and porters attached to the navy yards and shore stations, $231,293 26."

ence, and allowances of every description, to all commissioned and warrant officers employed at the several navy yards and shore stations; also, of naval constructors, store-keepers, instructors, master workmen, clerks of the yards, of the check, and of commanders and porters attached to the navy yards and shore stations, $231,293 26."

Mr. McLANE moved to amend the 21st line by inserting the words in italics, which was agreed to, and the clause made to read as follows: "For contingent expenses, including transportation of articles, travelling expenses, stationery, commissions, courts martial, coal for smiths, fuel for engines and public offices, and all extra allowances, $180,000."

The blank in the 23d line, viz: "For repairs and wear and tear of vessels," was filled with the sum of $350,000.

On motion of Mr. McLANE, the 30th and 31st lines, viz: "For erecting and completing houses over ships in ordinary, for their preservation from the weather," were stricken out, and the following inserted: "For ship-houses, to repay the amount taken from the gradual increase fund, $78,500."

The blank in the 88th line, viz: "For fuel for the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of marine corps," was filled with $6,000.

The following clause was, on motion of Mr. McLANE inserted:

"For medicine, hospital stores, and instruments for the officers and marines of the marine corps stationed on shore, $2,369 71."

On motion of Mr. COBB, the blank in the 46th line, viz: "For contingent expenses, that is to say, fuel for commissioned officers, transportation, stationery, bed sacks, straw, rations to officers, and postage on public letters," was filled with $9,000.

The remaining blanks were filled with the respective sums inserted in them in the printed copy of the bill, as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill with the above amendments; and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 23.

Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the resolution of the House, of the 6th of January last, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of repealing an act, entitled "An act making provision for the civilization of the Indian tribes adjoining the frontier settlements," passed on the 3d of March, 1819, made a report thereon, which was read, and laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, Resolved, That the committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relate to the Department of the Navy, be instructed to inquire and report, whether the sum of two hundred and twenty thousand dollars, appropriated at the last session of Congress, for the contingent expenses of the naval service, has been expended according to the existing acts of Congress; the description of travelling expenses, and the nature of individual claims, in payments of which any part of the said sum has been applied; the nature of extra allowances, which have been paid out of the said fund; and whether the same are specified, or authorized by any act of Congress; whether any claim or accounts which may have arisen, prior to the year 1823, have been paid out of the said fund; and, if so, the nature and circumstances of such claim and accounts, respectively; and that the said committee be instructed further to inquire and report, whether any, and what, provisions are necessary to be adopted, to provide more perfectly for the proper application of the money appropriated for the contingent expenses of the naval service, and to secure the Government from demands, unjust in their character, or extravagant in their amount.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House concurred in the several amendments of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill "making provision for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1824," with the exception of the item for contingent expenses, $180,000.

In relation to this item, Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, made a variety of explanations, going to show that the amount had been agreed to in the committee, from a misapprehension that there remained, of the fund last year granted, only $11 37; whereas, there was a balance of $85,300. He stated that, on examination, he had discovered that the appropriations of former years had been applied to objects never contemplated by this House, when granting them, although involving no charge of malversation in the Head of that Department; and he moved to strike out, in the twenty first line, all after the word "expenses," and insert as follows, viz:

"That is to say—

For commissions, clerk-hire, office-rent, stationery, and fuel to Navy agents;

Premiums, and other expenses of recruiting;

Freight of provisions, stores, and materiel from one station to another, and from the United States to distant stations in other countries, where our ships are employed;

Allowances to officers at the several navy yards and stations, for house rent, fuel, and candles;

Travelling expenses for officers and transportation for seamen;

Freight of timber, wharfage, and dockage for vessels where there are no public yards;

Expenses, and a per diem allowance, attending courts martial, courts of inquiry, &c.;

Compensation to Judge Advocates;

Cabin furniture for vessels in commission;

Incidental labor at navy yards, which is not applicable to any other appropriation;

Pilotage of public vessels in the United States and in foreign countries;

Printing Naval Register, blank pay rolls, receipt rolls, stewards' returns, seamen's allotment tickets, the proceedings of courts-martial;

Storage of provisions and stores in foreign parts, and in the United States, where public stores are not provided;

Coals for blacksmiths and anchor-makers, and fuel for steam-engines;

Purchase and maintenance of oxen, carts, large timber wheels, and workmen's tools;

Chamber money to officers in lieu of quarters, other than house rent;

Purchase of books, charts, nautical and mathematical instruments, chronometers, machinery, models, drawings, and all stationery of every description, used throughout the naval service;

Expense of pursuing deserters;

Expense of officers in sick quarters;

Storage of powder;

Lighterage and scow-hire;

Postage of letters on public service, and for no other object or purpose whatsoever, one hundred and eighty thousand dollars."

This amendment was agreed to without debate or opposition.

The question being put on the amendment in the thirtieth and thirty-first lines: "For ship-houses, to repay the amount taken from the gradual increase fund, $78,500."

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to strike out the whole item, objecting to using any part of a fund which was intended for the building of ships, and applying it to the erecting of houses.

Mr. McLANE explained.

Mr. WILLIAMS rejoined, and the question being taken, was decided in the affirmative—ayes 89, noes 45.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then, on motion of Mr. TON, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill "for amending the several acts laying duties on imports;" and the question being on the motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG to reduce the proposed duty on hemp from two cents per pound to one and a half cents—

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I will endeavor, with as much simplicity and briefness as is in my power, to state my views in relation to the amendment now under consideration. I shall state such facts, and offer to this Committee such calculations and estimates, as are in my opinion calculated to illustrate the subject.

What is the present duty on hemp? Thirty dollars per ton. What is the duty proposed by the bill before us? Two cents per pound, which amounts to $44 80 per ton, nearly fifty per cent. in addition to the present duty.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman of New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) now under consideration, is to strike out two and insert one and one-half cent per pound. Should the amendment prevail, the effect will be to increase the present duty from $30 per ton to $34 80—equal to sixteen per cent. It is material to consider and examine the subject of net and gross hundreds—of cents and half cents; for, although it begins with half cents, it ends with hundreds of thousands of dollars. Although I consider the present duty as high as the real interest of the country demands, I am in favor of the amendment, as an amelioration of the bill before us.

MARCH, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

The subject now under consideration, is one of vast importance—it deeply affects the navigating interest of the United States. The question is not whether hemp shall pay a duty, but how much duty? He observed he was willing it should be liberally taxed. It always had been taxed from the commencement of the Government; it commenced with ten dollars. It was raised to twenty dollars. By the tariff of 1816, it was raised to the present duty, thirty dollars per ton.

What is the object of increasing the duty on hemp? For, we are informed, that the bill has a triple object—revenue, encouragement of manufactures and agriculture. It certainly comes to us in a questionable shape. Is it revenue? If so, in my opinion, it is most manifestly oppressive to the navigating interest of the country.

He then stated that the following sums were paid to the revenue in 1822:

On hemp	-	-	-	-	$296,000
Russia Duck	-	-	-	-	86,000
Ravens do.	-	-	-	-	54,000
Cordage tarred	-	-	-	-	8,000
Untarred do.	-	-	-	-	10,000
Twine	-	-	-	-	15,000
Tonnage duty	-	-	-	-	114,000
Estimated duty paid on iron	-	-	-	-	100,000
					$683,000

The above items are paid almost wholly by the navigating interest, and there are others not named.

The duties imposed on navigation on vessels amounts to more than $700,000 per year. The bill before us proposes to increase it about 50 per cent., which will amount to more than one million of dollars. This tax is imposed upon a class of men who pay their full share of all other taxes. Suppose there are 350,000 people supported by navigation; the tax amounts to $1,000 each. If such tax were imposed on the nation, it would amount to more than ten millions of dollars—a sum greater than half the revenue of the country.

Upon whom will this duty fall? Upon the employer of the vessel, or consumer of the cargo? Upon neither. As a general rule, it may be true that the consumer pays the duty. But the rule has exceptions; and it becomes wise legislators to examine the subject with attention.

In Massachusetts or Pennsylvania, the wagoner willingly pays the toll at the gate of the turnpike, because he knows he is benefited. Suppose the Government were to establish a gate near the market, and demand one dollar of broad wheel and narrow wheel wagons—would not the owners of the wagons inquire why it was demanded? And when they were informed it was for revenue—that all paid—that it would finally come out of the consumer—that they could add the dollar paid to the price of the flour—would they not pray, with one accord, to be excused?

Navigation is an exception. Those engaged cannot charge their employers with the extraordinary duties they may pay. We have more engaged in the coasting trade than we have employment for. In the foreign trade, we are competitors against the world. We have run successfully; but we cannot run successfully and carry the weight proposed.

Here Mr. R. begged the Committee to distinguish between the mercantile and navigating interest. They were not necessarily connected. He had heard a number of gentlemen, in the course of their arguments, confound them.

The merchant might not own vessels, and a great portion of the navigation was owned by those who were not merchants, and who were far from being wealthy. The coasting vessels, which are now a very considerable part of our tonnage, are owned by those who have but a small share of property.

Here Mr. R. read the act of March, 1815, which provides for the repeal of all discriminating tonnage duties, and all discriminating duties, as to the importation of goods, &c., provided other nations would repeal their discriminating duties in relation to us. He observed, that the act above mentioned was intended to benefit all—that almost all nations had adopted it—that he had had the honor to vote for it—that, although he considered it somewhat hazardous to offer to meet the world as competitors, he was induced to do it, because he knew many who had no interest in navigation or commerce, were dissatisfied on account of the advantages which, it was believed, were conferred upon it by the Government. We have succeeded, notwithstanding the disadvantages under which we labor, owing to our superior industry, activity, and enterprise; but we ought to remember the situation in which we have placed the navigation and commerce of the country. It cannot bear the extraordinary impositions contemplated in the bill before us. Here Mr. R. observed, that, talk about this subject as we might, it must result in mathematical calculations. He begged leave to state what would be the effect of the bill if adopted, upon the district he had the honor to represent, and, for his part, he was happy to hear gentlemen speak of the effect of laws upon their own States and districts; for, in this way only, could we obtain that minute information which was necessary for correct legislation. He well remembered, that, during the last session of Congress, the chairman of the Committee of Manufactures, when he introduced the tariff bill, observed, that, if it bore with great hardship upon any important interest in the country, he would amend it. It did bear hard upon the navigating interest, and upon the part of the country he represented. He then proceeded to state that the district he represented did not possess more than its average share of wealth in the country—that they did possess sixty thousand tons of shipping. It is estimated that every 100 tons of shipping requires four tons of hemp; 60,000 tons would require 2,400 tons. The duty at the present rate, $30 per ton, is $72,000.

If vessels last ten years, the tax on iron would amount to, annually, $5,000;

The annual tax on hemp and iron alone would amount to $31,880;

If the whole United States were taxed at the same rate, it would amount to more than 7,000,000.

If a tax to that amount were about to be imposed equally on the different parts of the United States, would it not excite our attention? Should we not hesitate? Should we not be slow to act? Here Mr. REED read an extract from a memorial of the merchants, mechanics, and ship owners, of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, as follows:

"Your memorialists further represent, that the duties resorted to by the bill, on the various articles usually imported for the construction and equipment of such a ship as has before been described, is found by a calculation on the quantity of those articles actually used in the building and equipment of ships of this size [350 tons,] without armament, to amount to fourteen hundred and fifty dollars, or, in other words, to about five dollars per ton on every ton of shipping manufactured in the United States, of which, at least one half the cost is mechanical labor, and is equivalent to almost thirty days' labor for every ton of shipping manufactured, to say nothing of the great amount of labor, which is constantly required for sailing and keeping the same in repair. Should this great tax be imposed on the machinery of their trade, at the same time that the employment of this machinery would be, to a great extent, reduced, by the other operations of the proposed tariff, and even if some relief be not afforded on the present rate of duty, the scale must preponderate in favor of the employment of foreign ships, now almost universally admitted into the ports of the United States on the same terms with our own; and, at the reduced price at which foreign ships could be constructed, would soon supplant our own ships, even in the valuable carrying trade of the productions of our own country, which will, if this bill should become a law, pass into the hands of our powerful commercial rivals."

He also read an extract from a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Philadelphia, as follows:

"The influence of the tariff will be pernicious to the commerce of the country. This branch of industry has confessedly suffered, more than any other, by the events of recent years; it has borne its disasters patiently; they have been inevitable consequences of events, which, although caused by man, man has neither by action nor legislation been able to prevent, and scarcely to mitigate. It is just now creeping again into life; and what is to be the effect of this new tariff? The effect is morally certain; so much so, as almost to infer the intention in those who promote the cause; it is to paralyze and deaden, by one blow, that portion of the commercial capital of this country which is employed in the purchase, importation, and distribution, of all that the new tariff shall exclude from the country; the ships which are built and navigated for its carriage; the numerous artisans who are employed in their equipment; the seamen who man them, and the fixed capital invested in wharves, warehouses, and other property, created as facilities to trade."

Mr. Chairman, I have stated these facts as simply and as concisely as possible, to show that this tariff will operate with peculiar hardship upon the navigating interests of the country. It is oppressive. Why are such burdens proposed to be laid upon these interests? Cui bono? Who is to be benefited by it? Upon former discussions on the subject of cotton bagging, we were frequently informed that the additional duty on hemp was imposed for the benefit of the agricultural interests, and especially for that of the State of Kentucky, and other Western States; that it was for "their encouragement." Are gentlemen aware that the navigating interests now pay more than 25 per cent. upon the value of hemp in Russia? That they actually paid $296,773 in the year 1822? That they are compelled to bring this article, bulky as it is, from the Baltic sea? If the moderate freight of $30 per ton be allowed, the freight and duty will amount to $60 per ton, more than half the value of it in Russia, and more than a third of its value here. Is not this encouragement enough? Do gentlemen desire more?

The chairman of the committee observed, in his first speech upon the subject of the tariff, that, where Europe had one acre of land fit to raise hemp, we had ten. Was it ever questioned that we had abundance of land for hemp? I have no doubt on the subject. Indeed, it does not require a vast tract of land to raise all the hemp we need. I hold in my hand a statement of a gentleman from Massachusetts, by which it appears that he raised more than nine hundred pounds upon the acre. Suppose that eight hundred pounds grow upon one acre, then fourteen thousand four hundred and seventy acres would bear more than one hundred and fifteen thousand seven hundred and thirty-five pounds—the quantity imported the last year. If a township, six miles square, contain twenty-three thousand and forty acres of land, of the first quality, a little more than half of such township would be sufficient. I mention this fact to show that we have abundance of land, in all parts of the country, for the purpose of raising hemp. Why, then, is not hemp, of the first quality, raised in considerable quantities in this country? It is not for the want of a steady market.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

We were repeatedly informed, in the course of the discussion on the subject of cotton bagging, that the reason why that article could not be manufactured in Kentucky was, that Inverness and Dundee frequently overstocked the market, and there was no sale for the article. That argument will not avail in this present case. There always has been a market. I call upon those gentlemen to tell why they have not furnished the article.

If the hemp of Kentucky be fit for cotton bagging, and some other uses, it is not fit for the rigging of vessels. Here Mr. R. read a letter from John Rodgers, one of the Commissioners of the Navy, showing that, in all contracts made for cordage, they had uniformly introduced a stipulation binding the contractors to manufacture the cordage of the best Russian hemp; that the reason why the Russian hemp was better than the American hemp was wholly owing to the manner of preparing it. The Russian method is called "water rotting;" that practised in the United States "dew rotting."

Mr. Chairman, the same reasons which influenced the Commissioners of the Navy in their contracts made for cordage, influence every discreet owner of a vessel. It is not, as is generally the case where a bad article is sold, the purchaser may sustain some loss—upon the rigging of a ship, must depend the ship itself, cargo, and lives, of those on board.

The labor of preparing good hemp, by water rotting, is considerable, and the process is somewhat difficult. It must be done with great caution. It is not in every country where there is fertility of soil for raising this hemp, that there are conveniences for rotting it. The process of preparing hemp might produce great sickness in a warm climate, and he did believe it would never be raised and prepared fit for navigation, in Southern countries, on that account, and on account of the great labor necessary to prepare it for market. If it should ultimately succeed, contrary to his expectations, he assured the committee that none could be more highly gratified than those engaged in navigation; none were more deeply interested.

Hemp has been raised for many years in Massachusetts and New York, but not to any great extent. The art of preparing it in the best manner, is perfectly well understood. Why has not more been raised? The reason must be, that farmers have thought it more profitable to raise corn, grain, and other things. But, if it could be raised in the West, where they have no market for their grain, where the land is cheap, and produces in abundance, it would be profitable, and it requires no further encouragement. But, if one part of the community must be taxed, to support another, I beg the House again to consider the situation of the navigating interest. The last account from New Orleans, February 17, observes, freights have continued dull during the season, and now, when they were expected to be brisk, vessels are less in demand. Little cotton has been shipped coastwise, at half a cent per pound, and to Liverpool for five-eighths of a penny—not one-fourth of what was formerly paid. Coasting vessels, from Alexandria and Baltimore, to Boston, a distance of seven hundred to eight hundred miles, now carry flour for 25, 20, and as low as 12½ cents per barrel. They formerly received four times as much. Does the interest and policy of this country demand, at this time, that the navigating interest, which but just keeps above water, should be so oppressively taxed, for the mere experiment of rotting hemp? Why should a most valuable interest be destroyed, even if there was some probability of aiding an interest much less valuable?

Here Mr. R. read extracts from the memorial of the merchants and ship owners of the city of Boston, tending to show the danger and impolicy of the duty proposed.

He said, it had been often contended, that great injustice has been done to some parts of the United States, by the tariff of 1816, and particularly to the West. That it had been often suggested, that that tariff was particularly favorable to the interests of New England, and unfavorable to the interests of the Middle and Western States. That the Western States must have a quid pro quo; and that this was given by the duty on hemp. In the first place, he said, he denied the fact, that the tariff of 1816 was particularly favorable to any part of the country. Whether it be so or not, the committee will do me the justice to excuse me from the responsibility of making what is called a "one-sided tariff." I voted against it, Mr. Chairman. I will not trouble the Committee to hear the reasons which influenced my vote. One reason, however, as it has so direct a bearing, (as it is introduced into almost every debate upon this tariff,) I will take the liberty to state. I was opposed to the system of estimating every yard square of coarse cotton, (which costs six cents,) at twenty-five cents—which is called "the minimum." I am every day convinced, that it has had a mischievous effect. It deceives the public. Gentlemen are every day declaring, that coarse cottons have been brought into use by the minimum estimation and duty, excluding the India cottons. This has been called protection. "Protect other manufactures," say they, "and they will be equally successful." I admit, Mr. Chairman, that the coarse cottons of this country are now manufactured cheap, and that they are of the best fabric. But I deny what is alleged to be the cause. They would have been manufactured, although there had been no "minimum," as it is called, in the tariff of 1816. The success of these manufactures has been owing to other causes. He then showed what had occasioned their success; that cotton was cheaper in this country than in any other; that the machinery for spinning and weaving it, was very perfect, and had long been known, in part; that labor was performed by female children, whose labor cost little, &c. Suppose some parts of the country have manufactured more than others, and that the purchasers of the manufactured articles have paid something to aid them, the navigating interest, now proposed to be so severely taxed, have been purchasers—they are not manufacturers. Is it not manifestly unjust, in the first place, to tax them to build up manufactories, in common with other parts of the country, and then call for the quid pro quo? Call upon them to pay an enormous duty on hemp, as an offset to the West, on account of what they have done to aid manufactures? If the West have any claim, it is on the manufacturers whom they have aided.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

MARCH, 1824.

The effect of the proposed duties, Mr. Chairman, is to destroy commerce. If commerce be destroyed, the hemp-growing business will be of little consequence.

There is another view of this subject, worthy of the attention of this Committee. All now know and acknowledge the value of our Navy. We have been this day appropriating money for its support. We are preparing to increase it. What is the value of ships and dockyards, &c., without those 70,000 brave men "Whose march is o'er the mountain wave, Whose home is on the deep?"

Cannon and munitions of war may soon be procured; an army of raw soldiers may soon be disciplined; but to acquire the skill and dexterity of good seamen, requires years. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I repeat it, it requires years.

Why did the navies of Spain and Holland succeed formerly? Because they had seamen. Why has France failed in latter years, as to her navy? It has not been owing to want of bravery, or skill in gunnery, but to the want of a sufficient number of skilful seamen. The same causes will produce the same effects.

A navy is essential to our own protection. If we would afford any aid to others; if we would redeem the pledges and hopes excited by speeches and resolves, it must be done by a navy. A navy is useless without seamen, and we cannot have seamen without navigation. This duty, which tends to destroy navigation, tends equally to the destruction of our navy.

I do not mean to intimate, Mr. Chairman, that our vessels will be immediately abandoned, or burned, if this bill passes. Those at present engaged will abandon it with reluctance; a part will unquestionably continue. The first effect will be to destroy foreign commerce, the fruits of which have been the cause of building up of our manufactories. The rich will not be materially injured. The first man (Mr. Gray) who signed the memorial from Boston, from which I have read extracts, has commenced manufacturer upon an extensive scale. He can abandon commerce and navigation, and those who, like him, have great wealth, can do so likewise. If they sustain a considerable loss, it will not be ruinous to them; but the public, the United States, will feel it severely.

Vessels engaged in the coasting trade are owned principally by those who are far from being rich. Many go in their own vessels. They will rise early and go to bed late, if they go to bed at all, and eat the bread of carefulness. They will pursue the business so long as it will afford them a living. Their children will seek a more profitable employment.

I consider the duty of two cents per pound on hemp as oppressive to the navigating interest of the country; that it is calculated and will have the effect of gradually destroying our navigation, and, in its train, our commerce and navy. I therefore hope the proposed amendment will prevail.

When Mr. REED had concluded—

Mr. WEBSTER desired, before the debate proceeded, to be allowed to state a few calculations, which he believed to be accurate, and which he thought might have a bearing on the decision of the present question. He then read the following:

First cost of one ton of hemp in Russia, on the average of prices for the last three years	-	$99 05
Amount of charges in Russian ports	$14 49
Amount of present duty	-	30 00
Freight from Russia to the United States	-	30 00— 74 49
Without adding insurance and commissions.
By the proposed bill, the cost would stand thus:
First cost in Russia	-	89 05
Charges in Russian ports	-	$14 49
Freight	-	30 00
Proposed duty	-	44 80— 89 29

Amount of duties now actually paid on a ship, burden 350 tons:

14 tons iron, including anchors, at $15 per ton	-	$210 00
13 tons cordage, at $30 per ton, $390, less 1-6 for tar, $65	-	325 00
40 bolts heavy duck, duties $2	-	$80 00
20 bolts Ravens duck, duties $1 25	25 00—	105 00
3,000 pounds copper bolts, 4 cents	-	120 00
Mahogany, hardware, ship chandlery, paints, dry goods for cabin, &c., estimated at $1,000, and paying a duty on average of 20 per cent.	-	200 00
44 hhds. salt, used for salting timber, duties $2 20	-	96 80
		$1,056 80

These computations, Mr. WEBSTER stated, were furnished by one of his constituents, a gentleman of the utmost probity and accuracy, and he was sure they might be relied on.

The debate was then resumed by Mr. BUCHANAN, who advocated the duty proposed in the bill, and opposed the amendment, as did also Mr. TOD and Mr. Speaker CLAY. It was supported by Messrs. WEBSTER, MERCER, P. P. BARNHUR, FOOT of Connecticut, CAMBRELENG, and McKIM. The debate was continued in a series of speeches, abounding with fact and argument, and occasionally enlivened with attack and retort, in which humor was chastened by decorum.

The following are Mr. BUCHANAN's remarks in reply to Mr. REED:

Mr. BUCHANAN said that, in rising to reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. REED,) he did not intend to follow him through the excursive range which he had taken. Judging from the speech alone, a stranger to the question might be induced to believe that the measure under discussion was one, the adoption of which would, in its consequences, destroy the commerce and navigation of the country, and endanger the existence of its navy. Mr. B. said that, able and ingenious as had been the speech of the gentleman, he must be permitted to say that a large proportion of it had but a very remote application to the subject.

What, said Mr. B., is the real question now under discussion? By the existing tariff of 1816, the duty upon the importation of foreign hemp is 150 cents upon each 112 lbs. The present bill proposes to increase that duty, which is now equal to 134 cents on the 100 lbs, and to make it 200 cents upon each 100 lbs. And yet this comparatively unimportant measure has given birth to all the fearful predictions of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. B. said, if there is a single clause in the bill in perfect accordance with the principles and the policy by which its friends profess to be guided, it is the one now under discussion. If it cannot be supported, we may begin to despair of the passage of the bill through this House.

Mr. B. said it would conduce to a proper understanding of the subject, and, in his opinion, at once demolish the greater part of the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, to ascertain and fix with precision the nature of the question under discussion. For this purpose, it is necessary that we should discover the ad valorem duty to which the present specific duty would be equal. In doing so, I shall refer to the authentic official documents prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury under the authority of Mr. Sanford's law, and not to a private letter, such as that upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) has founded his calculations. The writer of that letter, it is fair to presume, must have felt a deep interest in this subject, otherwise he would not have taken the trouble of supplying the gentleman with information. When we reflect that self-interest is the most fruitful source of prejudice, and that, if the letter be correct, then are the official Treasury reports altogether deceptive, I take it for granted that the Committee will have but little difficulty in deciding which is entitled to the preference.

From these reports, it appears that the average cost of foreign hemp in the ports from which it was exported, must have been in 1821 $5 92 per cwt.; in 1822, $5 91; and in 1823, $5 83. For the purpose of my argument, I will assume that its average value, for the last three years, on board of the vessel at the place of exportation, has been $118 per ton. This comes within a fraction of the truth, as any gentleman may discover by making the calculation. In order to ascertain what ad valorem duty would be equal to the present specific duty of $30 per ton, we must add to this $118 the ten per cent. required to be added by existing laws, in estimating an ad valorem duty. This would make the dutiable value of the article $129 80 per ton; and of consequence the present specific duty is equal to an ad valorem duty of about 23 per cent. The duty proposed by this bill would, therefore, be equal to an ad valorem duty of about 34 per cent., and would be an addition of only 11 per cent., ad valorem, to the existing impost. These simple facts, taken from official documents in the hands of every member of the Committee, would of themselves be a satisfactory answer to nearly all the arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. REED.) His conclusions have resulted from mistaken premises.

But, said Mr. B., I will now exhibit to the view of the Committee another statement, derived from the same official source, which I venture to predict will astonish every person whose attention has not been directed particularly to the subject. In 1819 there were 25,578 tons of foreign hemp, on which a duty was paid, imported into this country. In 1820 there were 46,853; in 1821, 59,963; and in 1822 it had increased to 98,958 tons. Thus, under the operation of the existing duty, in the short space of three years the increase has been nearly fourfold.

In this manner, Mr. Chairman, the astonishing spectacle is presented to the world of an agricultural nation, possessing millions of acres of land capable of producing the finest hemp, dependent for its supply of that necessary article upon a distant country. There must be something rotten in the system of policy from which such consequences proceed. The rapid increase of the importation of the foreign article demonstrates that an additional duty is absolutely necessary to check its further progress, unless you wish to give the growers of the article in Russia an exclusive monopoly of our market in preference to our own farmers. The additional duty proposed is moderate; it is no more than a protective duty in favor of our own agriculture, and will not, at least for many years to come, prohibit the importation of foreign hemp.

If, said Mr. B., I understand the great principle of this bill, it is that a moderate additional protection shall be afforded to those manufactures, the raw material of which either is, or may be made, abundant in this country. Where this raw material is a product of agriculture, it has a peculiar claim to our favor; because, by that means, the agricultural interest, which, of all others, we should the most cherish, and which, in the Middle and Western States, is now very much depressed, will be promoted. When, in addition to these considerations, we reflect that hemp is an article essential to our naval defence, it has claims to our regard which are at least equal to any one in the bill. And yet the policy which we have been pursuing, if we continue to persist in it, will render us entirely dependent upon Russia for our supply.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. REED) has contended that the domestic hemp is not equal in quality to the foreign; and, in order to establish this position, he has read the letter from the Commissioners of the Navy, dated 27th January, 1824.

This authority is, I think, exceedingly unfortunate for the support of the argument. I will read one paragraph of it, which will place the subject in its proper light:

"The reasons, say the Commissioners, which entitle Russia hemp to a preference, are to be found, solely,

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

MARCH, 1824.

it is believed, in the manner of preparing it for market. In its natural state, American hemp is, unquestionably, as good as that of any other country; and numerous experiments prove the fact, that, when prepared as Russia hemp is, it is fully equal to the best Russia hemp, and, indeed, superior to that generally imported. The Russian method is called "water rotting;" that practised in the United States, "dew rotting."

This proves conclusively that the American hemp, when taken from the ground, is equal, if not superior, in quality, to that produced in Russia. The difference is in the manner of preparing it for market. The Russian hemp is water rotted; the American has heretofore generally been dew rotted.

Is there any obstacle to prevent us from water rotting hemp? Certainly not; there is water in abundance, for that purpose, in many parts of the Union which are well adapted to its growth. We have been informed by the Speaker, that the process of water rotting American hemp, has already commenced in several places. Such an additional encouragement to the American farmer as this bill will afford, should it be enacted into a law, will enable him, in a short time, to come into fair competition with the Russian hemp grower, and to bring into the home market, water rotted hemp, of home production, fully equal, if not superior in quality, to that for which we are now dependent on a foreign nation. Is there any American who would not rejoice at such an event?

Will this additional duty, said Mr. B., injure the navigating interest of the country? I admit that it may, for a very short time, enhance the price of hemp a trifle; but it cannot produce any of the evils to that interest which the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. REED) seems to dread. The effect of this measure will be to create a competition, not only between the foreign and domestic hemp growers, but among the domestic hemp growers themselves—and the consequence will be an eventual reduction in the price. The experience of this country, in regard to other articles, justifies this anticipation. Our capacity for the production of hemp is unbounded. All that is necessary, therefore, to make its cultivation successful, is, to direct a portion of the domestic industry, which is now languishing for want of employment, towards that branch of agriculture.

Whilst I am up, said Mr. B., I will advert to an observation made by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) a few days ago in reply to the chairman of the Committee of Domestic Manufactures. He stated that the old notions concerning a balance of trade were idle and ridiculous, and that they had been exploded by all enlightened political economists of the present day. This may be true so far as it respects political theorists; but no practical statesman, either in our own or any other country, has ever acted upon such principles. There can be no case put which will be a stronger illustration to show the propriety of attending to the balance of trade, than the ruinous commerce which is now prosecuted between the United States and Russia. In that trade there is an annual balance against us of more than $2,000,000. What are the articles which we receive from Russia, and which create this balance? Iron, hemp, and the manufactures of hemp; articles which we are capable of producing and manufacturing in abundance for ourselves. Will any gentleman contend that, if we did supply ourselves with these articles, we would not keep among our own citizens that balance which we now annually pay to Russia, and thus, as a nation, be so much the more rich and independent? Is it necessary to use an argument to prove that this would be a desirable event?

I know, said Mr. B., it has been stated that the trade with Russia is circuitous, and that our domestic products are exported to other countries, and there exchanged for articles which the Russians receive in payment. The trade to Cuba, and from thence to Russia, has been given as an example. This observation, however, applies only to a part of our trade with that country; the larger portion of it is direct, and the balance must be paid in money. And yet this is the kind of commerce which gentlemen wish to continue and extend—a commerce which, while it produces a large balance against us, excludes from our markets the iron and the hemp of our own citizens, and renders us dependent upon foreign countries for these essential articles of national defence. If Russia would receive our productions in exchange for these articles, then there might be some pretence for desiring a continuance of this trade. But, during the last year, whilst the value of our imports from that country was $2,195,870, our domestic exports amounted only to the small sum of $51,635.

If, said Mr. B., this were the proper occasion, it would not be difficult to prove that the balance of trade with the world is now, and for years has been, against us. I would not attempt to do this from the books of the custom-house. I agree with gentlemen that they alone do not afford a correct guide upon this subject. It is certain that they may exhibit a large apparent balance against us, and yet the real balance be in our favor. For example, suppose our exports amounted to $40,000,000, and our imports to $50,000,000, if we had no evidence upon the subject, except the books of the custom-house, we might fairly conclude that our commercial capital, industry, and enterprise, were worth imports to the value of $10,000,000, and that thus the account would be balanced and the country enriched. But is this the case? Do we not know, in addition to the testimony which they afford, that specie, that Government stock, that bank stock of the United States, and even the canal stock of the State of New York, have been leaving the country to purchase goods and pay the debts which we owe to Great Britain? Do we not know that the rate of exchange upon London has been largely and continually against us for several years? This shows, conclusively, that, notwithstanding all the money and the stocks which we have exported, funds in England, for years, have been always wanted by the merchants of this country. Bills of exchange on England, and on the rest of Europe, have uniformly commanded a handsome premium for a considerable period of time. I would ask gentlemen the reason why they have been in such demand, if it were not to pay the continual balance against us in our trade with the world. Would it not, then, be desirable to diminish our imports and increase our exports? This bill, should it pass, will, in my opinion, accomplish that desirable object; and the additional duty upon hemp, which it proposes, will, in no small degree, contribute to its attainment. But, sir, said Mr. B., I find I am getting into a discussion of the general principles of this bill, which I do not, at present, intend; and I will, therefore, desist, at this time, from prosecuting the subject farther.

The question was taken on the amendment and decided in the negative—ayes 69, noes 107. And then the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 24.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying a statement of the expenditures at the national armories, and of the arms, &c., made therein, during the year 1823; rendered in obedience to an act of the 2d of April, 1794; which letter and statement were laid on the table.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the petition of Joseph C. Tucker and Elisha Dwelle, reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to adopt a new hydrometer for ascertaining the proof of liquors; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LITTLE, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Dean Weymouth," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDWARDS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Noah Smith, of Maine," reported the same with an amendment and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REYNOLDS laid the following resolution on the table, for consideration to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House, as soon as convenient, any information which he may have in his possession, showing the reason why the engineers appointed "to examine the most suitable site for a national armory on the Western waters," have not made their report.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, laid the following resolution on the table for consideration to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the rule numbered eighty-four, of the standing rules and orders of the House, be rescinded.

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to exchange five arpens of land, on the south side of the public lot, in the town of Baton Rouge, in Louisiana, for an equal number of arpens on the north side of the same lot, which have been confirmed to the heirs of Eulogia de Casas.

On motion of Mr. OWEN, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law to authorize the erection of a national arsenal on the Alabama or Tombigbee rivers, at such point as may be thought the most eligible for the defence of that section of the United States.

On motion of Mr. CASSEY, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of altering or amending the act of Congress, passed March 3d, 1797, which provides that writs of execution upon judgments obtained for the use of the United States, in any of the courts of the United States, in one State, may run and be executed in any other State or Territory of the United States, in such manner that purchasers and others may be furnished with some convenient means of ascertaining the liens or encumbrances created by the judgments or executions in such cases, upon the property of the defendants.

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON, the Committee on Naval Affairs were instructed to inquire into the justice and expediency of reporting a bill for the relief of Henry Ingraham, survivor of Nathaniel Ingraham and sons, late navy agents, at Charleston, in South Carolina, and their sureties, on the terms proposed by the said Henry Ingraham, to the Treasury Department.

The engrossed bill "making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1824," was begun to be read a third time; before completing the reading, it was observed that an error had occurred in the engrossing—whereupon, the reading was suspended.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CONDIOT in the Chair,) on the bill "to amend the several acts laying duties on imports."

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, moved to amend the bill, by inserting, after the 254th line, the following clause: "on all wines which are now charged with a duty of fifteen cents per gallon, twenty-five cents per gallon."

Mr. POINSETT, of South Carolina, opposed the amendment. He did not desire to see this country a wine growing country, as, in comparison with corn growing countries, they were always poor and miserable.

Mr. BRENT, of Louisiana, opposed it, as not calculated to aid domestic industry.

Mr. GURLEY quoted statistical details, to show that a reduction of the duty on low priced wines had increased the revenue. Raising the duty was, therefore, not calculated to benefit the revenue. He replied to Mr. Ton's remark, as to the ability of Louisiana to pay the duty, the protection of sugar, the profit of negro labor, &c.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, replied, that he only had wished, on this item, to restore the tariff of 1816. The reduction of the duty had destroyed a promising infant manufactory in his district, and he wished to raise the duty for the general purpose of cherishing the produce of wine in the United States.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, made a calculation to show that low duties on these wines would increase the revenue, and augment a trade which was profitable to this country.

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, combatted the view and argument of Mr. TRIMBLE, and contended that as much wine would be used at twenty-five as at fifteen cents duty.

Mr. TOD, of Pennsylvania, replied, and signified that he had no wish for the adoption of the amendment; and the question being taken on the amendment of Mr. FOOT, it was decided in the negative, without a division.

Mr. TOD moved to strike out from line 99, to 104, inclusive, viz:

"On Russia duck, per piece of fifty-two archeens, two dollars each piece;

"On Raven's duck, per piece of fifty-two archeens, one dollar and twenty-five cents each piece;

"On Holland duck, per piece of fifty-two archeens, two dollars and fifty cents each piece."

Mr. T. stated, that the manufacture of duck was now established; much of the flax had to be imported from Ireland, and there was some reason to apprehend that the duty, as proposed, would interfere with the provisions of the British treaty. He therefore desired to leave this manufacture under another provision of the bill.

Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, asked for explanation.

Mr. TOD replied, that the ad valorem duty laid on duck in the other part of the bill, was 25 per cent.; that proposed in this, amounted to about 20 per cent.; so that striking out would raise the duty 5 per cent.

Mr. McKIM, of Maryland, wished for farther consideration.

Mr. CLAY supported Mr. TOD's motion. The article now made was of an excellent quality. The American Navy had adopted the use of it. It was a manufacture for which this country was well adapted; and it diminished a trade the most disadvantageous of any in which we are engaged.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD went into an extended statement of facts, in relation to the manufacture of sail duck, and the several kinds of that article imported from abroad. Of these, he stated the Dutch to be the best, the Russian next, then the French, and, lastly the English. The inferiority of this last kind, he attributed to the English practice of dew-rotting the flax of which the duck is made. In Holland, it is water-rotted; and, in Russia, undergoes another process, somewhat different from both. He gave a detailed account of the factory at Salem, in its first abortive attempt at using the American flax, and its late successful manufacture of sail cloth from flax imported from Ireland. The article he acknowledged to be of the very first quality, but furnished at a price which the Navy alone would pay. The factory was kept in being by Navy contracts alone—not a bolt of its duck had ever been used in a merchant ship, notwithstanding it was situated in the most commercial district in all the Union. Mr. C. went into a course of general argument against the bill. He censured the grasping ambition of this young country, which nothing could satisfy. We were seeking to monopolize every branch of profit to ourselves; we must have every enterprise of commerce, all the profit of manufactures, and the whole system of agriculture, to ourselves. We said to the North, give up, and to the South, keep not back. And stretched our desires over the whole earth. He stated the commercial character and situation of his constituents; his district contained probably twice the amount of commercial capital to that of any other district represented on this floor; it had honorably paid every custom-house bond, with one solitary exception; and even that could yet be recovered. It had never been a manufacturing district, and never would be. The habits of commercial men were not to be changed by the talismanic touch of an act of legislation. It was vain to expect to draw about the capital of a trading people at your will, by silken cords; it must be done slowly, gradually, surely, and by natural causes. He showed that the proposed duty would be injurious to the navigation of the country, and eulogized the ingenuity, art, and science, displayed in the construction of a ship. In reply to the argument that the consumer pays the duty, Mr. C. asked, who is the consumer? Who eats hemp? Who eats iron? Who wears sail duck? And replied, it was our ships; all that part of the proposed tariff went to oppress the interests of navigation.

Mr. KREMER then rose, and insisted that this was no higher than that recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. He thought the arguments of the honorable member from Massachusetts were very extraordinary. That gentleman asks if we can change the habits of merchants by cords of silk, and whether we were the Israelites of old? I say yes, we are; and I will prove it to the gentleman from the Good Book. It has been said to us, as it was to Israel of old, if ye will hearken to the voice of the Lord your God, you shall, yes, you shall, be the head, and not the tail, of all the nations of the earth. You shall lend to many, and borrow of none. You shall, like the good people of the gentleman's district of Salem, pay all your custom-house bonds, with the exception of one—to be sure, all the districts of the Union could not compare with the gentleman's district. They were not so rich as the merchants of Salem. But, if those gentlemen had had all the fat of the soup, it was time they spared some to the rest of the country. He was in favor of doing equal justice to all. If the growers of hemp, to the West, were properly protected, perhaps they might, in time, be able to say to the gentleman, "We pay our debts, too." He hoped the amendment would prevail.

Mr. CLAY spoke in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. CROWNINSHIELD,) so far as he had not been answered by the speech of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman had said that the Navy distributed its contracts at high prices with a view to become popular with the nation. He wished that Government would pursue, throughout, the policy of encouraging our own ingenuity, industry, and enterprise. There could be no more certain or more honorable path to popularity. But he thought the gentleman's argument went to confute himself. He said that, but for the patronage of the Navy, the factory at Salem must die. What did this show? That nothing was wanting to the manufacturer but Governmental protection—the very thing for which the friends of the bill contended. Mr. C. insisted that the effects of the American efforts had greatly lowered the price of this article. It had been furnished to the Navy since the peace, at twenty-two dollars, but could now be supplied at seventeen dollars, while the best Russian was at from sixteen to twenty dollars. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury recommended an ad valorem duty of twenty-five per cent. the very rate at which this amendment would place it.

Mr. FLOYD said that he had heard, in the course of this debate, a very frequent reference to the former tariff bills, and it was often said that duties in this bill were not higher than in those—but it must be remembered that the former tariff bills had been professedly for revenue—this was professedly for a different object, and, therefore, there was no proper parallel to be drawn. He insisted that the bill would not benefit the farmers, (of which number he had the honor to be one.) As to its aiding agriculture by requiring more flax, the object was too small to be worth consideration. It was confessed that, unless the factories could get fat contracts from the Government they could not go on. No doubt with such contracts they might thrive and grow rich. It was argued that we must cut off foreign trade, and promote home products. But, he asked, who will buy? Was it contended the manufacturers would themselves supply the farmer with a market? If all the five hundred thousand manufacturers of the United States were put into one of the Western districts, a circle of sixty miles diameter would furnish all they could consume. Could any body believe that we could take hands away from the agriculture of the country, to compete with the manufacturers of Europe? Something had been said about domestic tallow. Did ever a farmer kill his beef for the sake of the tallow?

Mr. CUTHBERT wished to ask one question of the honorable chairman of the Committee of Manufactures. If the article of duck requires protection at this time, and the duty laid on foreign duck is just enough to balance the duty on the foreign flax used in the domestic article, how is it protected? If the one balances the other, what is gained? Mr. C. made some general remarks on the policy of the bill. So soon as we attempted to protect one trade, we interfered with another. Link touched link—and there was no end to our difficulties.

Mr. TOD spoke in reply and explanation.

Mr. CUTHBERT was not satisfied, and required still further explanation.

Mr. CASSEY repeated some statements he had before made. The domestic duck was not made wholly, but only in part, of imported flax. So there was not a balance between the duties.

Mr. CUTHBERT rejoined, and complained that one duty was made a plea for another. We first lay a duty on flax—and, then, having done this, it is urged as a reason, why we must lay another duty on duck.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD replied to Mr. CLAY, in relation to the quantity of cloth in a bolt of American duck. The domestic article was twenty-four inches wide; the foreign was over thirty, and the length of the piece, the same. The price, it was true, had been reduced; but this was done by deteriorating the goods. Single instead of double warp was used, and tow filling instead of flaxen; and yet, after this adulteration, the article was still dearer than the imported.

The question was then put, on the amendment of Mr. TOD, and carried—ayes 93, noes 77.

Mr. CLAY moved to increase the existing duty on the article of molasses. He believed there was no fairer object of taxation in the proposed tariff. His great wish was to promote American agriculture; and, with this view, to encourage the production of the raw material of any subject of manufacture to which our own country was adapted, rather than the importation of the rival foreign article. Molasses was to be considered—first, as an article of subsistence. As such, the existing duty bore no proportion to that on brown sugar. It was capable of being applied, and was in fact applied, to almost all the purposes of brown sugar. This latter article was subject to a duty of three cents per pound. A gallon of molasses, containing not less than eight pounds, paid a duty only of five cents; that is, a little more than half a cent a pound. Secondly, as a substance capable of conversion into spirituous liquors. The least duty imposed on them was thirty-eight cents per gallon. If the policy of the country be well founded, in imposing this high duty on spirits manufactured abroad, it equally dictates that a high duty should be imposed on an article produced abroad, susceptible of easy conversion into spirits, and which comes into competition with articles raised at home, capable of similar conversion. Thirdly, as a raw material of manufacture. On this point, it appeared to Mr. C., that we ought to discourage, even for the purpose of manufacture, any raw material, raised abroad, of which articles, capable of a similar fabrication, can be certainly produced in abundance at home. No one will doubt that the grain of our country produces a spirit equal, at least, to that which is distilled from molasses; nor our ability to produce it in the greatest abundance. He did not mean to take up the moral considerations of the question. He intended to ask the attention of the Committee to the matter practically. A certain amount of spirituous liquors will be consumed whatever we may think or wish upon it as moral.

ists or philanthropists. Assuming that practical principle, we are to consider whether it is not better for our country to derive the whole profit, both as to the production of the raw material and the distillation of it, rather than divide it with foreigners. Every gallon of spirits, distilled from foreign molasses, and consumed within the country, takes the place of a gallon of spirits distilled from domestic produce. The foreigner enjoys the benefit of the value of the raw material, and we that of its manufacture only. This latter advantage we should still possess, if we substituted a native raw material to that which is furnished us from abroad; and, consequently, the mere interest of manufacturing would not suffer by the exclusion of the foreign material. There would, at most, be only a change in the theatre of distillation.

The increase in the import of molasses was very great, so great as to threaten the supplanting of the native materials of distillation. From 1790 to 1800, inclusive of both years, the total quantity of molasses imported was 53,323,607 gallons; that is, an average of 4,837,600 gallons for each of these eleven years. From 1801 to 1811, inclusive of both those years, the total quantity imported was 78,224,651 gallons; that is, upon an average, 7,111,320 for each of the latter term of eleven years. The population of the United States increases in a ratio of about four per cent. per annum. And the increased importation of molasses, during the latter term of eleven years, beyond that of the previous term of eleven years, was about what it ought to have been, supposing the increase of consumption to be according to the progressive augmentation of our population. Applying the same principle, the quantity of molasses imported in 1822 ought to have been 9,375,040, instead of which the actual quantity was 11,990,569 gallons for that year, and for the last year it rose to 13,019,328 gallons! The principle which Mr. C. thought ought to govern our manufacturing policy was to encourage—1st, the manufacture of our own raw materials; 2ndly, the manufacture of foreign raw materials which do not come into competition with any that are native; and 3rdly, but least of all, those which compete with our own produce. Of all parts of our country, the grain growing now suffers the most. Whatever, therefore, would tend to reanimate that, without material detriment to others, ought to meet with a favorable consideration. According to an estimate of a former Secretary of the Treasury, in 1810, of the 6,834,878 gallons of molasses, then imported, five millions were supposed to be distilled, and the residue, 1,834,878, were consumed for other domestic purposes. Applying that rule—of the 12,019,328, imported last year, 2,786,413 gallons were consumed in domestic purposes other than that of distillation, and 10,232,915 gallons in distillation. Supposing (which is a low estimate) a gallon of molasses to produce only a gallon of spirits, there was distilled 10,242,915 gallons of spirits. To produce this quantity from grain, would require about five millions of bushels. And the total export of the breadstuffs of the last year did not equal five millions of bushels of grain. Thus, by excluding the foreign raw material of molasses as an object of distillation, we should create an additional market at home, for a quantity of grain equal to about the whole export, in the form of breadstuffs, of that article last year. Suppose it were attempted to import grain from abroad, for the purpose of distillation, would not every one cry out against it? And where is the difference between such an operation as that would be, and the importation of molasses convertible into a worse spirit than that which is distilled from grain?

Fourthly, and lastly, molasses ought to be considered as a source of revenue. The effect of the additional duty, which he meant to propose, would be merely to lessen the importation, and thereby give greater scope for the consumption of our native produce. To what amount it would lessen it could only be matter of conjecture. If one half, and the duty which the committee might fix should be twelve-and-a-half cents per gallon, there would be an augmentation of revenue in the ratio of twenty-five per cent. upon the present amount. Taxed at that rate, the duty would still be greatly below the standard which is furnished by that on brown sugar, or on that of spirits.

So far as it may be considered as an article of mere subsistence, Mr. CLAY felt no disposition to increase the duty, low as it would be, if his proposition were adopted, in comparison to brown sugar. If there could be a discrimination made between that portion of the material which was distilled and that which was consumed in other domestic uses, he would, with pleasure, adopt the discrimination. He knew of none that was practicable. He finally proposed to insert in the bill a duty of two-and-a-half cents per gallon on molasses, but subsequently reduced the proposed amount of duty to ten cents.

Mr. Foor, of Connecticut, remarked, that the opponents of the bill had early been told that the policy of this country must be changed. He now perceived that the honorable Speaker was sincere in that declaration. All he should observe was, that the gentleman, and those who acted with him, were before a country which was competent to judge and to pronounce upon the course they were taking.

Mr. TOMLINSON, of Connecticut, rose in reply to the Speaker, and observed, that it would have been satisfactory to him to have been apprized that such a motion was about to be made; but, though he had not enjoyed that advantage, and was therefore obliged to reply with less time for consideration than he could have wished, he still felt it his duty to state his views, in answer to those which had been expressed by the honorable Speaker. That gentleman had admitted, that the article now about to be taxed, is an article of subsistence. It is so; and one used to a great extent by the poorer classes of the community. The proposition is, to tax the labor of the country; to draw revenue from the mouth of the poor and hard working man. The gentleman had actually gone so far as to calculate how much of every meal was to go to the payment of this contribution. He had stated it at a fraction of a cent. But even a fraction of a cent on every meal, when the meals, as they must be, were often repeated, amounted to a considerable sum in the course of the year. We must look at the actual state of facts. The Speaker had made a calculation, in which, as it consisted in figures orally stated, and not submitted to the eye, Mr. T. said he had not been able to detect any fallacy; but he was satisfied there must be a very great error in some part of it. He also had made a calculation, and its result was very widely different. To arrive at the quantity of molasses actually distilled into spirits, he had resorted to the report of the marshals appointed in 1820, to take an account of the manufactures of the United States. [Here Mr. T. quoted a statement, in figures, the result of which was, that not more than one-fourth of the quantity stated by the Speaker, was distilled.] He had endeavored to arrive at the same fact, by examining the returns of internal duties in 1814; which examination confirmed this conclusion. Mr. T. here read the following statements, going to prove that a large part of the amount of spirits to which the Speaker alluded, was produced, not from molasses, but from his own rye and corn, viz:

By the returns of the marshals, made in 1820, it appears that the quantity of molasses distilled in the United States, in that year, was - galls. 2,492,700

Mr. T. then went into a statement to show the quantity of sugar imported, at different periods, from which it appeared that the quantity of sugar brought into the country had decreased; and he argued thence, that the domestic use of molasses in families had increased. He admitted, indeed, that the sugar of Louisiana had, to some extent, taken the place of foreign; but not sufficiently to effect this result. But, said Mr. T., even granting the gentleman's premises, allow that ten millions of gallons of spirits have been made from molasses in one year, still I should not assent to the duty now proposed. How is this molasses procured? By exchanging for it the productions of agriculture, and such productions as could not, by any process, be turned into whiskey, (for now the rage seemed to be, to make every thing into whiskey.) Fish, lumber, butter, cheese, could not, certainly, be so converted; and these were the articles which went to bring the molasses from the West Indies. If you prevented its introduction, you prevented, to the same extent, their exportation; and so far deprived the people of one section of the Union of a market for their industry. By the present tariff, a duty of five cents a gallon is laid on this article. The result of which is, an income to the Government of $500,000; and the consumers of it are confined to a comparatively small district. To these persons, the proposed amendment will be a direct tax on one of the necessities of life—on an article of the subsistence of the poor. He then went into a statement to show that the original cost of a gallon of molasses, in the West Indies, was only ten cents. So that the duty of twelve and a half cents will be one hundred and twenty-five per cent. on the first cost of the article.

He proceeded to argue, that this increase of duty, instead of augmenting, would diminish the revenue of the country, and would, in effect, exclude the article altogether. He could not believe, that the manufacturer of whiskey needed this duty as an encouragement. By a price-current of New Orleans, it appeared that Kentucky whiskey was worth from 33 to 34 cents; a bushel of rye makes 2½ gallons, equal to 66 cents. If this was not sufficient encouragement, he must be greatly deceived. But to this must yet further be added, the profit of the animals fattened on the grain after the process of distillation was over. Under all these views of the subject, (very hastily presented,) he could not but hope that the proposed amendment would be rejected by the House.

Mr. FULLER accounted for the different results to which the honorable Speaker and the gentleman from Connecticut had come, from the fact, that large quantities of the imported molasses were refined and converted into loaf sugar, for exportation; and that a part of the rum distilled from molasses is also exported. Both these amounts must be deducted from the apparent amount consumed.

Mr. CLAY rejoined. Admitting that part of the molasses is converted into sugar, (though this was the first time in his life he had heard of such a thing; he always supposed that molasses was a residuum which could not be grained.) Still, he asked, if there was any just proportion between the duty on sugar and that on molasses? If the molasses was to be considered as sugar, the case was still worse than if it was to be considered as spirits. Touch it but with the wand of the manufacturer, and straight it would bring, as sugar, a protecting duty of three cents a pound; but, as molasses, it paid only five cents a gallon. He repelled the idea, that this was a duty for the West. He knew not that it would benefit that section of country more than others. Nor did he care where the benefit fell; it would fall somewhere. Wherever grain was grown throughout the Union, its effects would operate—nor are grain growers alone—the fruit raising districts, (including that of the gentleman from Connecticut,) would all be aided by it. Peach brandy and apple brandy would both be benefited by excluding West India molasses, and diminishing the rum made from it. He aimed not at the eaters, but at the drinkers, of New England; and if the gentleman could devise a plan by which they could be separated, so that the duty would bear upon the latter only, he would immediately vote with him in its favor. As to its taxing the food of the poor, he asked, whether it was equal to the duty on brown sugar, or bohea, both of which were food of the poor?

Mr. C. here quoted a statement from a work by Mr. Pictou, (on whom he passed a merited encomium, and who is a citizen of the same State with Mr. T.) to corroborate the position he had taken in respect to the proportion of molasses distilled, to that used for food; and closed, by reducing his motion to a duty of ten cents per gallon.

[During this reply, Mr. CLAY was several times interrupted by Mr. SIBLEY, of Massachusetts, who appeared disposed to controvert the Speaker's statements; but Mr. C. declined yielding the floor to him.]

When Mr. C. concluded, the question was taken on the motion to insert in the bill, a duty of ten cents per gallon on molasses, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 100 votes to 88.

Mr. WEBSTER then moved an amendment of some length to the bill, the object of which is to allow a drawback to the printers and stainers of imported silks and nankins, on the re-exportation of those articles, accompanied with guards against frauds.

Mr. W. stated, in explanation of his motion, that there existed, near New York, an extensive establishment for the printing of silks, cottons, and nankins. By the present law, the exporters of those articles were not entitled to drawback, because the imported article had undergone a great change. The conductors of the institution were under the impression that a considerable export trade could be carried on if they had this benefit. He believed that it might be so guarded as to prevent any great danger of frauds upon the revenue, and he had drawn the amendment with that view.

The amendment of Mr. W. was ordered to be printed; and then the Committee rose.

The third reading of the Navy Appropriation bill was then gone through with; the bill was passed and sent to the Senate, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 25.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom the subject had been referred, reported a bill concerning wrecks on the coast of Florida; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. REYNOLDS was taken up and agreed to.

The House took up the motion of Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, made yesterday, to rescind that rule which forbids, in Committee of the Whole, a motion to rise prior to the hour of four, while a question is pending.

After some discussion of the subject, in which Messrs. ALLEN, LIVERMORE, and FLOYD, supported the rescinding, and Messrs. TRIMBLE, MERCER, and TAYLOR, opposed it—

The yeas and nays were then taken on agreeing to the resolution moved by Mr. ALLEN, and are as follows: For rescinding the rule 93; against rescinding it 78.

So the resolution was carried, and the rule of the House was rescinded which forbids adjournment before the hour of four o'clock, when any subject is before the House, in Committee of the Whole, which has been already one day debated.

A bill from the Senate "releasing to John McAllister, or the legal representatives of John Forbes, a certain tract of land," was twice read, and committed to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

A bill from the Senate "for the relief of the heirs of Don Harpin de la Gautrais," was also twice read, and committed.

A bill from the Senate "for the relief of Captain Thomas Staniford," was twice read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Two Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

Having stated to Congress, on the 7th of December last, that Daniel D. Tompkins, late Governor of New York, was entitled to a larger sum than that reported in his favor, by the accounting officers of the Government, and that, in execution of the law of the last session, I had the subject still under consideration, I now communicate to you the result.

On full consideration of the law, by which this duty was enjoined on me, and of the report of the Committee, on the basis of which the law was founded, I have thought that I was authorized to adopt the principles laid down in that report, in deciding on the sum which should be allowed to him for his services. With this view, and on a comparison of his services with those which were rendered by other disbursing officers, taking into consideration, also, his aid in obtaining loans, I had decided to allow him five per cent. for all sums borrowed and disbursed by him, and of which decision I informed him. Mr. Tompkins has since stated to me that this allowance will not indemnify him for his advances, loans, expenditures, and losses, in rendering those services, nor place him on the footing of those who loaned money to the Government at that interesting period. He has also expressed a desire that I would submit the subject to the first decision of Congress, which I now do. In adopting this measure, I think proper to add that I concur fully in the sentiments expressed by the Committee, in favor of the very patriotic and valuable services which were rendered by Mr. Tompkins in the late war.

JAMES MONROE.

MARCH 25, 1824.

The Message was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 25th February, requesting information whether the title of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, to certain sections of land in Ohio, has been purchased for the United States; and, if so, to cause a copy of the contract, and of the papers relating thereto, to be laid before the House, I transmit, herewith, all the documents required.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 25, 1824.

The Message, &c., was referred to a select committee, and Messrs. WRIGHT, CAMPBELL, of Ohio, BUCKNER, COOK, HAYDEN, MARKLEY, and STERLING, were appointed said committee.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which had been referred, at the present session, sundry memorials upon the subject of spoliations committed on the commerce and navigation of the United States, by French cruisers, between the years 1793 and 1800, made a detailed report thereon, which was laid on the table. The report is as follows:

On the petitions of Hadrianus Van Noorden, William and Nathaniel Hooper, Daniel Henshaw, several merchants and underwriters of Salem, several merchants of Gloucester, several merchants and underwriters of Alexandria, District of Columbia, several merchants of Washington, North Carolina, Henry Clark and others, of Kennebunk, and several others, merchants, in Maine, referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations, they report—

That no evidence accompanies either of the petitions; all of which, except the first, are literally the same, having been apparently prepared by concert among the claimants, to be presented to Congress. To discriminate between them is not practicable, if it were desirable. The committee are compelled to present, in general terms, the nature of these claims, as set forth by the parties interested, and to examine, as briefly as possible, the grounds upon which relief is asked from the Government of the United States. The claims are founded upon spoliations committed by the private and public armed vessels of France, between the years 1793 and 1800.

The petitioners allege that the French Government, to the date of the ratification of the treaty of 1800, always considered the recognition of their claims as due to its honor, and attached them as a charge upon its national character.

That the Government of the United States, which has volunteered its agency for the recovery of them from France, exercised its power and authority to prevent the petitioners from obtaining indemnity—that the Government of the United States received from France a full and fair equivalent for the claims, in the discharge from its liabilities under the treaties with France, and the abrogation of those treaties.

Similar applications, if not by the same persons, have been frequently made to Congress, and reports upon them are to be found in the records of the House of Representatives and of the Senate. None of these applications have been successful. Without attempting even to enumerate the failures to obtain a sanction to their statement and to their claims, the Committee refer the House to a detailed report of the various acts of the Government of the United States and of France, from 1793 to 1800, made by a select committee, on the 22d of April, 1802, to which applications like the present were referred. Governed by that report, the Committee of Foreign Relations are not satisfied that the French Government ever admitted the justice of the claims of the petitioners, or ever intended to pay them; that the Government of the United States used every effort, even to war itself, to rescue the property of American merchants from the lawless violence of France; that its efforts to procure payment for the spoiliations committed by the French cruisers, were not discontinued until it was obvious that there was no hope of success. That this Government never received from France any equivalent for the claims of Americans upon France. The war of aggression was commenced by France, and every act of the United States was a just retaliation for previous injury. The treaties with France were annulled by an act of Congress in 1798, in consequence of the utter disregard of the stipulations of them by that Power.

In short, to justify their claims upon the United States, the petitioners assume, that France was right, and their own Government wrong. That France was prepared to make a just reparation for the outrages committed under her own laws, until released from her obligations by the United States, who were faithless to their trust, in the first instance, and have been regardless of the obligations of justice ever since, assumptions not consistent with truth, nor creditable to the patriotism of those who make them. The committee recommend to the House to adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That petitions of the several persons who ask indemnity for spoiliations committed by French cruisers on their property, between the years 1793 and 1800, be rejected.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill "to amend the several acts laying duties on imports," Mr. CONDUCT in the Chair.

The question being on the amendment of yesterday, offered by Mr. WEBSTER, which amendment is in the following words:

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the drawback allowed by law on plain silk and nankeen cloths, imported in American vessels from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, shall be allowed, although the said cloths, before the exportation thereof, shall have been colored, printed, stained, dyed, stamped, or painted, in the United States. But, whenever any such cloths, so imported, shall be intended to be so colored, printed, stained, dyed, stamped, or painted, and afterwards to be exported from the United States, with privilege of drawback, each package thereof shall, before the same shall be delivered from the public stores, be opened and examined by an inspector of the customs, and the contents thereof measured or weighed, and the quality thereof ascertained, and a sample of each piece thereof reserved at the custom-house; and a particular account or registry of such examination, describing the number of pieces in each package, their weight or measure, and the samples thereof reserved, shall be entered in the books of the custom-house; and, after such examination, said goods shall be repacked in the original package, and the said original package shall be marked with a custom-house mark. And, whenever any such goods, being thus colored, printed, stained, dyed, stamped, or painted, shall be entered at the custom-house for exportation and drawback, the same shall be so entered in the original package, marked as aforesaid, and not otherwise, unless the person so entering the same shall give satisfactory evidence to the collector or naval officer, or one of them, that such original package has been lost or destroyed by accident; and no such application for drawback shall be made, except on the contents of entire packages; and, upon application for such entry and drawback, the contents of the packages, so offered, shall be examined by an inspector of the customs, and measured or weighed, and compared with the original entry, registry, and samples, and if, upon such comparison and full examination, the collector shall be satisfied that the contents of each package are the same identical goods imported and registered as aforesaid, and not changed or altered, except by being colored, printed, stained, dyed, stamped, or painted, as aforesaid, then the person, so entering such goods, shall be admitted to the oath prescribed by law, to be used in cases of application for exportation of the goods for the benefit of drawback, and shall, thereupon, be entitled to drawback as in other cases: Provided, That the exporter shall, in every other particular, comply with the regulations and formalities, heretofore established, for entries of goods for exportation with the benefit of drawback. And, if any person shall present, for exportation and drawback, any colored, printed, stained, dyed, stamped, or painted silk or nankeen cloths, knowing the same not to be entitled to drawback, according to the provisions of this act, or shall wilfully misrepresent or conceal the contents or quality of any package as aforesaid, the said goods, so presented or entered for drawback, shall be forfeited, and may be seized by the collector, and proceeded with, and the forfeiture distributed, as in other cases."

Mr. WEBSTER stated the existence of several other establishments, of a similar nature to that in New York, to which the amendment will apply.

Mr. WICKLIFFE objected to the amendment, as being an extension of the drawback system. He thought such an extension dangerous, as opening a door to frauds and corruption in the collection of duties, &c.

Mr. SHARPE replied to Mr. WICKLIFFE, and showed that the danger of fraud, in this case, was very small, as no American silk was manufactured, &c.

Mr. MARVIN moved to amend the amendment in the second line, by striking out the words "nankeen cloths," to which he objected, because it extended protection to a foreign fabric of cotton, while we had cotton factories at home to manufacture it.

Mr. WEBSTER replied. This kind of goods came into the country now, and all the question was, whether their value should be increased by the industry of our citizens previous to its re-exportation. He did not know, however, that the article of nankeens was made in this country.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, advocated the amendment of Mr. WEBSTER, generally, on the principles of the drawback system, which he wished to see extended as far as possible. He objected to the amendment now proposed by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. MARVIN.) This useful factory took nankeens that were stained, and restored them to their original color, and therewith restored their value, and even increased it, &c.

Mr. MERCER agreed with the gentleman last up. Nankeens were already entitled to drawback, and although the drawback system presented to exporters a temptation to fraud, he thought the guards proposed by the amendment were fully sufficient to prevent any successful attempt at it.

Mr. MARVIN repeated his objection to protecting, by bounties, a foreign cotton fabric. Nankeens he understood to be an uncolored cotton cloth.

Mr. WEBSTER replied. Nankeens, he said, are now imported blue, as well as plain. The effect of the proposed amendment would be, to bring them all into this country white, and to have them dyed here before exportation, &c.

Mr. TOD inquired if any establishments in this country were now engaged in the dying of nankeens?

Mr. WEBSTER replied that he could not say he knew of any now thus engaged, but he understood they were preparing to engage in this branch of business.

Mr. TOD observed that the memorialists did not mention nankeens in their petitions, and the granting a drawback on the re-exportation of that article might lead to the sending to India for cottons, and thus operate against both the manufactures and agriculture of the country.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, in reply to Mr. TOD and Mr. MARVIN, argued that this amendment, in respect to nankeens, would have the effect to take out of our market so much of an article, which, while in the home market, competed with our own cotton fabrics.

Mr. MERCER enforced his former remarks by some further observations.

Mr. WEBSTER stated, that, since he last spoke, just now, he had learned that immense quantities of nankeens were now dyed at the factory near New York.

Mr. MALLARY opposed the amendment of Mr. MARVIN, and urged arguments to show that the home cotton factories could not be injured by the motion of Mr. WEBSTER, and the branch of dying (in which our manufacturers were chiefly deficient) would receive, by the effect of it, an improvement it was much in want of.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. MARVIN, and it was negatived.

Mr. SANDFORD, of Tennessee, objected to the amendment of Mr. WEBSTER, as being likely to injure the revenue. He thought the practice of coloring, or staining goods, ought not to be thus encouraged, &c.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to amend the amendment in the 1st and 2d lines, so as to read, "a drawback of 75 per cent.," instead of "the drawback allowed by law." He stated his object to be to make the drawback on this article to correspond with that laid by the bill on other articles of this description.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, made a few explanatory remarks.

Mr. WEBSTER explained the operation of the amendment, and the provisions of the 6th section of the bill, which operated only on tallow; and Mr. MERCER also made a few observations on the subject.

Mr. FORSYTH replied; as a new system of duties was about to be adopted, he said, a new system of drawbacks should also be adopted. He thought 25 per cent. not too much, as a remuneration to the United States Government for the troublesome mode of preventing frauds in relation to this drawback.

Mr. FOOT moved an amendment, to place European and East India silks upon an equal footing; which he introduced with a few remarks, to express his opinion that the silks from France and Italy should not be put on a different footing from those of India.

Mr. WEBSTER explained. The French and Italian silks were usually dyed. The French, especially, surpassed all nations in dying that article.

Mr. TEST objected to the amendment in a few remarks; and then,

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. FOOT, it was rejected.

The question recurring on the original motion of Mr. WEBSTER,

Mr. BUCHANAN expressed his wish for further light on the subject to which the amendment applied. He thought the system of drawback sufficiently tried, to justify the proposed extension of it. At present it extends only to fish, spirits, and fine sugar. He thought the introduction of nankeens of the East, would interfere with our own cotton factories, as this bill placed the Chinese manufactures on the same footing with our own, in the foreign market. The commerce with China, he said, was a ruinous one; and this amendment went to encourage it, and to discourage our trade to France, which was a profitable one.

Mr. WEBSTER replied. This, he said, was only a transit trade; we encourage our merchants to go to China, buy their silks, and carry them to South America. The only part of the China trade which was unprofitable, was that in articles consumed in this country.

Mr. BUCHANAN rejoined. He objected to the amendment, as complicating the system of drawback. He repeated his argument respecting its effect to encourage foreign manufactures, which, he said, had not been answered. He admitted, that the silks imported, went out again; but, why encourage their introduction from China, in preference to those from France.

Mr. COBB was greatly indebted to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, last up, for his care of the cotton-growing interests; but, he should thank him much more, if he would consent to let them alone. For his own part, he said, when the friends of the bill talked of extending protection to the cotton growers, he felt much like the Irish recruit who was forced to volunteer. He objected to the amendment as granting an encouragement that was not needed; he had no idea of taking money out of the Treasury to put it in the pocket of those who were already doing so good a business, &c.

Mr. FULLER replied to Mr. BUCHANAN. The coloring of stained nankeens put them into a form to be exported, instead of being consumed at home, to the prejudice of the domestic manufacture. He agreed in the opinion, that no discrimination ought to be made between French and China silks. He argued, however, that the home consumption would not be affected, nor the cotton manufacturer be injured by the proposed amendment. He made some observations on the French trade, to show that it was not so profitable as the gentleman from Pennsylvania seemed to suppose.

Mr. SHARPE replied to the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. COBB.) All that was asked by the silk dyers, he said, was, that, after they had expended their labor on the article, stained and defaced in transportation, they should be allowed the same drawback upon it, as, under the present law, would be allowed on it, if brought in a perfect state, and exported without any labor at all. Let us try the extension of this drawback system on a moderate scale, and it may be hereafter abolished or extended, as might be advisable.

Mr. MALLARY replied to Mr. COBB, and advocated the amendment on principles of equality. It was no more than just, he said, that the benefit of this branch of labor should be enjoyed by the dyers, as well as the agricultural labor by the cotton grower. He replied to Mr. BUCHANAN, and advocated the propriety of making an experiment, in gradually extending the drawback system, so as to aid in the protection of manufactures.

Mr. POINSETT advocated the amendment. Its operation would be to enable our merchants to carry the goods of China to the South American market, and otherwise, the merchants of Britain and France would have the whole trade to themselves. It would not injure our manufactures, while it would encourage our commerce.

Mr. BUCHANAN replied, and stated an illustration from the case of hemp and calico; the dyed nankeen of India, he said, displaced our cottons in the South American markets.

Mr. POINSETT, in reply, stated, from thorough personal acquaintance with South America, that the people of that country were of fixed habits, as much so as the Chinese themselves. They would go on in their old path and none other. They will not take our cottons, but will have nankeens, as they have been accustomed to; and if we do not carry them there the French and English will.

Mr. SANDFORD repeated and enlarged upon his objections to the amendment, on the grounds of its opening a door to frauds, &c.

Mr. WEBSTER made a few more observations; and

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. WEBSTER was agreed to, without a division.

Mr. TOD moved to amend the bill in the 238th line by striking out "three," and, in the 241st line, striking out "two;" and inserting in both places "five;" so as to make the clauses read:

"On all wares of cut glass, not specified, five cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, an ad valorem duty of thirty per centum;

"On all other articles of glass, five cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, an ad valorem duty of twenty per centum."

Mr. TOD explained the reason of this amendment to be, the striking out the third section of the bill, which met the British bounty by a proportional increase of duty.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, asked why an ad valorem duty was added to a specific duty on glass.

Mr. TOD explained.—The necessity arose from the modes pursued by the English exporters of glass to introduce their article into this country, without paying the duties, &c.

Mr. FORSYTH stated that no bounty is granted by the British Government on glass, and therefore the argument from the third section does not apply. Much of our glass comes from France; and to this the third section would not apply, even if it still remained in the bill. Mr. F. made some remarks, incidentally, on the slight notice which was taken of any motion or any fact proceeding from those members of the House who are not manufacturers, or are not avowed friends of the bill.

Mr. TOD replied.—The glass imported from France was to a small amount, (not more in the last year than $10,000.)

Mr. MERCER expressed his astonishment, that, after all that had passed on the bill, the honorable Chairman should persevere in saying that there existed a bounty on glass in England. Mr. M. said he had before denied the existence of such a bounty; and he now rose to verify the statement. Here Mr. M. quoted the excise paid on several materials used in certain kinds of glass; and all that was done by Government is to allow a drawback on this excise when the glass is exported.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR objected to adding a duty on all glass imported, in order to countervail drawback or bounty on British glass. If the addition was sufficient to meet the latter, it must be enormous on the poorer kinds brought from elsewhere. But there was no positive bounty, but only a drawback in Britain, on manufactures of glass. He insisted on the wide difference between bounty and drawback, &c.

Mr. TOD replied to Mr. MERCER, who always, he said, came prepared with authorities, chapter and verse, to refer to; and who often gave valuable information on subjects in question, and on subjects not in question. Mr. T., nevertheless, insisted there was a bounty on English glass; it might be called by what name the gentleman thought fit; it was as much a bounty as that on cotton bagging, which the gentlemen all argued to be a bounty, and on that very ground the third section of the bill was stricken out. The amount granted on bagging is in the English books called a drawback, as that on glass is; and Mr. T. produced an invoice in which bounty is charged.

Mr. MERCER rejoined—and reiterated his argument to show that the encouragement in England was a drawback, and not a bounty; and therefore the policy which might apply to a system of bounties for encouragement had no application to the present case, &c.

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated the facts of the English allowance, and insisted that, whether it is called bounty or drawback, it equally operated on the price of the article as bought by us. He thought the duty rather high, but should only oppose it as applied to plain glass.

Mr. FORSYTH referred to the Commercial Digest, to prove that the allowance is drawback, and not bounty. He remarked, in reply to Mr. TOD, on the third section of the bill, and on the capacity in this country to compete with other countries in the manufacturing of glass. The glass imported into the United States, from other countries, from Germany alone, was more than that from England, Ireland, and Scotland put together.

Mr. TOD asked, in reply, why the gentlemen had urged the striking out of the third section? they certainly then considered the allowance of drawback as bounty. He still insisted that it was so, and he referred to the invoice he had before produced, and called for the reading of a petition of certain glass manufacturers, &c.

A good deal of smart repartee passed between Mr. TOD and Mr. MERCER, in relation to their stock of authorities, &c.

Mr. CULPEPER moved that the Committee rise. The motion was negatived—ayes 82, noes 92.

The debate was now renewed, and Messrs. FOOT, of Connecticut, CAMBRELENG, and TOD, made some observations; when

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for a division of the question so as to take it first on the first part of the amendment now proposed.

The question being taken, accordingly, on the first clause of the amendment, as it is above stated, the vote was:—For the amendment 86, against it 87.

So the amendment was rejected—and then the Committee rose.

FRIDAY, March 26.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which were referred bills of the Senate of the following titles, viz: "An act confirming the claims of the heirs of Nicholas Baudin and the heirs of Joseph Chastang, to certain tracts of land;" "An act confirming the claim of Peter H. Hobart and Lewis Judson to a certain tract of land;" and "An act releasing to John McAlister, or the legal representatives of John Forbes, a certain tract of land," reported, as the opinion of the committee, that the said bills ought not to pass.

The said bills were committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LITTLE, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Walter S. Chandler and Samuel Ward," made a report thereon, adverse to the passage of the said bill, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the Committee on Roads and Canals were instructed to inquire into the expediency of vesting in the State of Illinois, for the purpose of defraying the expense of opening a canal between the waters of the Illinois river and Lake Michigan, the land that has been reserved from sale by Congress, bordering on the proposed canal.

On motion of Mr. METCALFE, the Committee on Indian Affairs were instructed to complete the inquiry which was commenced at the last session, (and reported upon in part,) into the execution of an act, entitled "An act to abolish the Indian trading establishments;" and, also, to inquire what was the general average per centum over and above the prime cost and carriage, for which the articles of merchandise were sold by the factory agents, before the passage of the law aforesaid; the amount of money which ought to have been returned to the Government upon the abolition of the establishment; the amount which has actually been paid into the Treasury, together with that which has been secured to be so paid under the provisions of the law for abolishing the said establishment; and if, by contrasting the said sums, a balance shall be found to be due to the Government, what mode can be devised to recover the same from the person or persons withholding it.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Captain Thomas Staniford," was referred to the Committee of Claims.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1824," with amendments; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The amendments were read, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. COBB moved to discharge the Committee of Ways and Means from the consideration of the President's Message in relation to the claims of D. D. Tompkins, and that it be referred to a select committee. He prefaced his motion with a few remarks, to show that the standing committee had not time for a proper investigation of the subject. The motion was supported by Mr. McLANE, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, but, on suggestion of Mr. WEBSTER, it was withdrawn for the present.

JOHN B. HOGAN.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Military Committee, to whom was recommitted the bill from the Senate to repeal the "act for the relief of John B. Hogan," reported an amendment thereto.

At the request of Mr. COBB, Mr. HAMILTON explained the circumstances in relation to the case of Mr. Hogan.

Mr. MCCOY further remarked on the facts of the case, and a conversation ensued upon it between Messrs. HAMILTON, SHARPE, COBB, OWEN, and CULPEPER.

[Mr. Hogan, it appears, was a paymaster in the Seminole war, who paid about $20,000 to a corps of gunmen, whom he considered as volunteers, but who, by the construction of the law by the War Department, were declared not to be such. The amendment now reported to the bill, goes to allow him credit for this amount. It was objected to, as sanctioning a dangerous principle, and setting a precedent which, if followed up, would cover all disbursements made bona fide but without law.]

Mr. CULPEPER moved to lay the amendment on the table. Not carried.

The amendment was finally agreed to, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill to amend the several acts laying duties on imports, Mr. CONDUCT in the Chair.

The question being on the motion of Mr. TON, to raise the duty on "all articles of glass not specified," from two cents to five cents per pound—

Mr. CAMBRELENG made some observations in opposition to this amendment, as laying an enormous duty on plain glass. The question being taken, it was not agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS, of Pennsylvania, moved to amend the bill, by inserting in it the following clause: "On square iron-wire, used in the manufacture of umbrellas, a duty of twelve and a half per cent. ad valorem."

Mr. E. stated the circumstances of this branch of manufacture, which at present is not made in the United States. The making of umbrellas had greatly increased in the United States, and they were exported to a large amount. Those engaged in it were desirous of adding this branch to their business; but, under the existing duty of 40 per cent. ad valorem, it was impossible.

Mr. SHARPE, of New York, supported the amendment, and confirmed Mr. ELLIS's statement of facts on the subject.

Mr. CASSEY, of New Jersey, stated that he had presented a petition on this subject, which he desired to be read.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, moved to amend the amendment, by striking out the word "iron," as many articles of this description were made of copper wire.

Mr. ELLIS accepted this modification of his motion.

Mr. FLOYD stated some facts in relation to a former petition of the umbrella manufacturers, and its effects.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was carried—ayes 75, noes 42.

Mr. ISACKS, of Tennessee, moved to strike out the proviso, from the 33d to the 42d line, inclusive which is in the following words:

"Provided, That all cotton cloths whatsoever, or cloths of which cotton shall be a component material, excepting nankeens imported directly from China, the original cost of which, at the place whence imported, with the addition of twenty per centum if imported from the Cape of Good Hope, or any place beyond it, and of ten per centum if imported from any other place, shall be less than thirty-five cents per square yard, shall, with such addition, be taken and deemed to have cost thirty-five cents per square yard, and shall be charged with duty accordingly."

Mr. ISACKS stated that his object was to take away from the bill the proposed minimum on cotton goods. Mr. I. quoted statements, in figures, to show the amount of duties in 1823, paid on different species of cotton goods, &c., to show the reasonableness of his proposition, &c. He did not conceive this further encouragement on the cotton manufacture necessary; moreover, because, if he was correctly informed, the manufacturers neither wished nor needed it, that portion of the capital and industry of the country employed in it, being more productive than almost any other.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR then rose, and said that, having determined, at some period of the discussion, to present his views of the general principles involved in the bill under consideration, and believing that the present motion afforded an opportunity to do so, he would, with the indulgence of the Committee avail himself of it.

No subject, said Mr. B., of a more important character than this, has occupied the attention of the National Legislature, during its present session. This is the third time that it has been brought upon the tapis, during my short political life; it has not only been debated again and again in this and the other House, but the press has teemed with pamphlets and newspaper publications in relation to it. It is not a question, as was said on another occasion during this session, of political metaphysics, but of severe practical taxation; one which comes home to the sensibility of the pocket nerve. In opposing this bill, I feel that I am defending the cause, not of my own immediate constituents only, but of the whole commonwealth of Virginia, of which they compose a part; not of them only, but of the whole South; not of them only, but of other parts of this Confederacy, against the injurious effects, which, in my opinion, this would produce upon their great and essential interests. I wish, sir, that a cause so great, had an abler advocate; but I shall, to the utmost extent of my ability, endeavor to present the subject in its true light; should I not succeed, whilst I shall have the consolation of knowing that I have done my duty, I shall feel, that my defeat was not ascribable to the weakness of my position, but to the inadequate manner in which it was defended.

The bill has been presented to us in various phases; some gentlemen say, it is a measure to increase the revenue, some tell us it is to encourage agriculture, whilst others sustain it on the ground, that it will afford encouragement to the manufactures of the country. It would indeed be as rare, as it would be valuable, if it could accomplish all these objects; to harmonize these conflicting principles, is just as impossible, as it would be for a person who stood at a medial point between two given objects, to approach the one, without receding from the other; and I fear, sir, that it would turn out to be in legislation, what certain specifics come to be in medicine; published to the world as a cure for almost every disease, they prove to be an effectual remedy for none. Without further remark, I pass directly to the discussion.

I would not vote for this bill, sir, even if it could be placed upon the grounds, which would be confessedly most advantageous for its advocates—that is, even if it were a bill designed to raise revenue, and if such would be its effect. I would not do it, for this obvious reason, that the exigencies of the Treasury do not call for an increase of revenue.

In proof of this, I beg leave to present to the Committee, a brief view of our financial situation, as exhibited in official documents, giving an exposition in detail. The present condition of the Treasury is such, as to enable us, by anticipation, to purchase our 7 per cent. stock during the current year, which would not become due till the next. The 3 per cent. stock, amounting to $13,296,099 06, no gentleman would think of paying at par, and consequently it would only be purchased upon such terms as might be agreed upon, between the Government and stockholders. The $7,000,000 due to the Bank of the United States, may be considered in effect as paid, inasmuch as we own stock to an equal amount, in the bank, the dividends on which are equivalent to the interest which we pay; besides, our debt to the bank is at an interest of only 5 per cent., and therefore falls within the influence of the reasoning applicable to the remaining part of our debt bearing that interest. The residue of the public debt consists of 6 per cent. stock, and 5 per cent. stock; and we have satisfactory reason to believe that a considerable part of the six per cent. stock, can be commuted into a five per cent. Let me add, that gentlemen mistake, when they say that a large share of this debt will successively fall due in the years 1826, 1827, and 1828. Although, in those years, large sums are redeemable, that is, we may pay them, if we choose, yet we are under no obligation to pay them; and it is estimated that, with the exception of the Bank debt, and the three per cent. stock, the existing revenue of the Government will be competent to redeem our whole public debt in the year 1835, a period of eleven years from the present. Now, sir, although I am one of the last men in the world who would subscribe to the doctrine that a public debt is a public blessing, but on the contrary, consider it an evil, and am desirous of paying it, yet, in doing so, I would exercise discretion, I would practise moderation. As a guardian of public interest, I would act, in relation to their debts, as I would in relation to my own; I would not suffer a solicitude to pay a debt not coercible, to induce me to sell property at a sacrifice, or to borrow money at a higher rate of interest, than that of the debt to be paid with it. Let us for a moment apply these plain principles to our situation: there is no part of the debt bearing a higher interest than six per cent.; and there is no part of the United States, it is believed, where the legal rate of interest is less; but as far as the six per cent. stock could be commuted for a five per cent. stock, and to the whole amount of the five per cent. if we were to draw additional revenue from the people to pay it, it would create an increased pressure upon them, at a time certainly not favorable for the purpose of paying with money worth six per cent., a debt on which we should only pay an interest of five per cent. This would be actually a loss, and even as to six per cent. stock, no gain. I would in this regard, then, adopt the maxim of the celebrated English Minister Burleigh: That it is not desirable to see the Treasury swollen like a disordered spleen, whilst the nation was in a consumption. I would act upon the principle of his mistress, Queen Elizabeth, that at present, beyond the existing revenue, the money is better in the pockets of our people, than in our exchequer, or, I will add, in the pockets of our public creditors.

As far, sir, as this bill is designed to give encouragement to manufactures, or even, if you please, to national industry in general, I would vote against it, for another strong, and, in my estimation, decisive reason. And here, Mr. Chairman, though I am about to derive an argument from the Constitution, I trust that I shall not press upon the confines of political metaphysics. The Constitution gives to Congress the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. This bill proposes to lay and collect duties, and, therefore, I shall not undertake to say that it is a violation of the letter of the Constitution. But this I do mean to contend, and I think I shall be able to prove, with as high an approximation to demonstration as moral evidence is capable of, that this bill does violate the spirit of the Constitution. The power to impose taxes, duties, &c., it will not be denied by any gentleman, was given to us for the purpose of raising revenue, which revenue is to be applied to the ends pointed out in the Constitution. Now, sir, as far as, by this bill, it is proposed to encourage manufactures, or any other department of industry, we shall be using this power, not only not for the purpose for which it was given, but for another and a different one, and, as I shall attempt to prove, one which will defeat that for which the power was given; and then this question presents itself, whether we do not, in effect, transcend the limits of our legitimate authority as much by the exercise of a granted power for a purpose for which it was not granted, as by the exercise of a power not granted? I answer, that we do. As no general reasoning strikes the mind as forcibly as examples, I will illustrate my proposition by putting some analogous cases. Congress has power to borrow money. Let us suppose that the capitalists of this country were, by petition to this House, to complain that, in consequence of the general languor of the commerce of the world, they could find no longer any mercantile investment of their capital which would yield them any tolerable profit, or, if you please, any profit at all, and, therefore, they called upon us to borrow of them some millions of money, at any given rate of interest. Let us suppose our finances to be in such a situation as not to need it, and yet, to save these capitalists from sinking, we accepted their proposition under our power to borrow money.

Let us suppose that Congress, impressed with a belief that the importation of certain articles of luxury was injurious either to the wealth, the morals, or the simplicity of the manners of our people, with a view to arrest the importation of such articles, imposed very high duties, not at all with a view to revenue, but for the avowed purpose of prohibition, and high enough to produce that effect; and that this was done under the power to lay duties and excises, by which, in effect, we should pass sumptuary laws.

Congress has power to provide and maintain a navy. Let us suppose that, upon the termination of the European war, by the peace of 1814, our navigating interest had represented that, during that war, we, by the circumstance of our neutral character, had, for a series of years, the carrying trade for the belligerents; that we had thereby profited at the rate of $15,000,000 per annum, at which, I believe, the carrying trade is estimated in Seybert's Statistics; that, by means of the peace, thousands in our mercantile marine were thrown out of employment; and let us suppose that, though the extent of our Navy did not require it, we yet employed many of these persons with a view to give them employment, under our power to provide and maintain a navy. I could go on sir, multiplying examples of this kind, with much more ease than they could be answered. These are sufficient for my purpose. In each of the cases which I have here put, it might be affirmed, with just as much propriety as in the present, that we were exercising powers which were clearly given; yet, every man would admit that we were abusing those powers. And why, sir? For the simple reason that we were using them for purposes for which they were not granted; and let me ask, sir, whether the same objection does not apply here? If, as must be admitted, the power to lay duties were given solely to raise revenue, surely when we apply that power not for that purpose, but for another, and that, too, which defeats the legitimate one, we are exercising that power for a purpose for which it was not granted. Sir, I have no apprehension of these things at present, whilst our virtue, intelligence, and patriotism continue; but, as any one man cannot hope to escape that mortality which is the lot of his species, so neither can any Government expect wholly to avoid those evil times which history teaches us have befallen all the Governments of the earth. When we shall fall upon such times, what now is precedent, will then become principle; and, "by the same example, many an error will rush into the State." They can look back, and find, in the best periods of the Republic, precedents for applying a power for a different purpose from that for which it was given, and thus the whole Constitution may be made to swing from its moorings.

Mr. Chairman, I would not vote for this bill for another reason, which I regret to be under the necessity of mentioning. I regret it, because it has reference to the difference in the local interests of this mighty Confederacy, and I would be one of the last men in the world who would excite any thing like jealousy, or even sensibility, amongst its constituent parts; but I should feel that I should be wanting in my duty to my constituents, if I did not present this view to the Committee. It has been seen that one object of this bill, and no one will deny but that it is a leading object, is to foster domestic manufactures. This encouragement, sir, from the force of circumstances, and the nature of things, must operate in favor of some parts of the Union, to the exclusion of others. Cast your eye over the map of the United States; look at its geographical situation, and estimate duly the considerations which I am now about to submit. In some portions of this country, there is a large accumulation of capital, the fruit of foreign commerce. In others, there is a great comparative deficiency of capital. In some parts, there is for this Western world a dense population; in others, it is sparse. Thus, take Connecticut and Virginia as the subjects of comparison. By the census of 1810, Connecticut had about 56 to the square mile; Virginia about 14. In some parts, there is free labor; in others, there is only slave labor. Now, sir, let me ask, what hope is there, in the career of competition, between two sections of country, in one of which there is a combination of the three great advantages of large capital, dense population, and free labor; and in the other of which there is a combination of the three great disadvantages of a deficient capital, sparse population, and slave labor? The question needs only to be stated to be answered. It would indeed be the race between the tortoise and the hare; the last must stop, or never be overtaken. Now, sir, it certainly was the intention, in forming this Government, that the different States should, as far as circumstances would permit, participate equally in its burdens and benefits. And hence, the provision, that direct taxes should be apportioned to numbers; that other taxes should be uniform; that no regulation of commerce should give a preference to the ports of one State over those of another, &c. But, sir, the balance is equally disturbed, whether a weight is taken out of one scale, or put into another. If, in the exercise of a power for the purpose for which it was given, one State suffers less burden, or receives more benefit, than others, we must submit to the consequence; but, when a power is to be exercised for a purpose for which it was not given, and this consequence is to follow, then we have just cause of complaint.

I come now, sir, to consider this bill in the different lights in which it has been presented by its advocates, and to examine the several grounds on which they have rested its defence.

In the first place, it is said that the bill will increase the revenue. I think I shall be able to show, that it will have a directly contrary effect; that diminution of revenue, not increase, will be a necessary consequence of its passage. It is conceded, on all hands, that the inevitable effect, in the first instance, will be to increase the price of the goods imported; this can be denied by no

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

man. This being the case, the amount of the produce exported from the country, whatever it may be, will furnish fewer commodities than it did before, unless gentlemen are prepared to maintain the proposition that the same sum of money will purchase as much, at a higher price, as it would do at a lower one. The quantity of goods imported then, must be diminished; the only possible ground on which it can be contended that the revenue will not be diminished, is, that the increase of duty on the goods which will be imported, will be equal to the loss of the former duty upon such goods as shall cease to be imported. It is impossible to say, what will be the precise extent of the diminution of importation; but we may resort to some data which will constitute the basis of a reasonable calculation. It may be, that articles of mere luxury, which are consumed only by the wealthy, may, at the advanced price, yet be imported, as before; articles of downright necessity will be so imported; but there is a large description of articles which, though they may be convenient, and may contribute to increase the stock of comfort, may be dispensed with. This latter kind of article is used by that great class of our people, constituting a decided majority of the nation, who are either poor, or in the various gradations of property, from poverty towards wealth, but falling entirely short of that point. Now, sir, it is in this kind of imported goods, and in this part of our population, that I think it fair to infer, that a very great diminution will take place, and considerably more than will countervail any advantage to be expected from the increased duty upon goods which will continue to be imported. Thus, sir, the goods imported in the year 1822, paying an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent. amounted to $21,701,040; more than one-fourth part of the whole imports of the year. It is known, that all the goods paying this rate of ad valorem duty, are those of which wool and cotton are the materials. How large a portion of the coarse kind of these goods is used by our poorer people, and by the wealthier for their slaves? And yet, these articles can, and most of them probably will, be manufactured in household establishments, rather than pay the high duties imposed by this bill; especially such as plains or negro cloths, which, from the statement appended to the New York memorial, would, upon the minimum in the tariff, and at the rate of duty after June, 1825, pay from 104 to 130 per cent. But, if I should even mistake in this, it is clear, beyond all question, that the progressive and ultimate effect would be a diminution of revenue. The very object which gentlemen have in view, is, by high duties, to exclude foreign articles from coming into competition with those of a domestic manufacture. If this consequence were not to follow, the whole policy of the bill would fail; the manufacturers would not receive the encouragement intended, and the consumer would, unnecessarily, as well as unjustly, be encumbered with higher prices. But, supposing the operation of the bill to be, what it certainly will be, that, in consequence of the protection afforded, the domestic manufactures will progressively displace the foreign, and be consumed in their place. Then, it is palpable, that in exact proportion as this takes place, foreign goods will cease to be imported, and, consequently, the revenue will be correspondingly diminished; and, finally, whenever the time should arrive, that the consumption of domestic manufactures should entirely take the place of foreign, there would be a total stop to all imports, because there would be an end to importation. But the revenue lost, must be supplied, and I beg leave to inquire how, and by whom? We have been told, that manufacturers themselves, after they shall be firmly established by a system of protecting duties, will be able to supply this deficit. If we were to judge from past experience, this promise holds out but little consolation. In 1816, a duty of 25 per cent. was imposed upon cotton and woollen goods, with a minimum upon coarse cottons, under the expectation that, in three years, these manufactures would reach such maturity that they could sustain themselves, with the aid of a smaller duty. And, accordingly, the act of 1816 declared, that, after June, 1819, it should be reduced to 20 per cent.; but, after continuing the 25 per cent. by a subsequent act, now in the eighth year, so far from being able to do with a lesser duty, we are called upon to increase the duty and create a minimum in relation to wool. Thus, as they grow in years, they seem to decrease in strength; and so far from affording revenue, they cannot exist under a diminution of duty. So far from this, they call aloud for an increase of duty, as necessary to their very existence. No, Mr. Chairman, the deficit must be supplied by a direct tax. The reasoning which could convince Congress that it was right to impose high duties on foreign goods, to aid our manufactures, would be strong enough to prove, that they ought not to be depressed, as their advocates would say, by an excise. And thus the community would be doubly taxed: first, by the high prices which they must pay for domestic manufactures, in consequence of the foreign being excluded by our duties; and, secondly, by the tax which must be paid to supply the deficiency in the revenue, produced by the same exclusion of foreign goods. Whereas, had foreign goods been not excluded, they would have purchased them at a cheaper price than the domestic, and have saved that difference in price. And even of the price that they would have paid for them, a part would, in the shape of impost duty, have gone into the Treasury, and thus there would be no deficiency to supply, by them, in the shape of direct taxation. But, to give the gentlemen all they ask for, let us suppose that an excise could be imposed upon domestic manufactures, what, let me ask, have we gained? Surely I need not attempt to prove to the Committee, that the great body of the community who are consumers, would, as such, ultimately pay this tax too. And thus, after losing all the difference between the high price at which we have to buy the domestic articles, and the low price at which we could have bought the foreign, in supplying the deficit in revenue, occasioned by the exclusion of the foreign, we have the high privilege of being taxed with excise, instead of imposts. The loss to us, in this arrangement, I can easily perceive, but the gain I cannot, unless it be the gain of a more disagreeable, instead of a more agreeable mode of taxation.

Mr. Chairman, are the people of this country prepared, in time of peace, for a direct tax, and for an excise, or for either?

Sir, we know, from actual experience, that they are both more expensive in collection, and that the direct tax being by numbers amongst the States, is unequal in its operation; we know that they are more inconvenient, and that the direct tax subjects us to the intrusive visit of the tax-gatherer, whilst the impost is included in the articles which we purchase, and that its payment is an act of volition. In relation to excise, though England raised, according to Mr. Lowe, 27,000,000 sterling, equal to $120,000,000, by excise, in 1823, though there are now twenty-five different articles subject to excise in that oppressed kingdom, yet, sir, we know that an attempt to impose an excise on tobacco, in the reign of George II., was considered by some of her best patriots as dangerous to the constitution; that its defeat was celebrated with rejoicings; that Walpole, the Minister who proposed it, was burned in effigy; and that he abandoned it, because he thought it could not be carried into execution without an armed force. True it is, sir, that the people of England are now obliged to bear it in multiplied forms; I thank God that it is not our condition, and I hope never will be. But gentlemen say that this bill will increase the wealth of the nation; I readily admit that it will increase the profits, and, consequently, the wealth of the capitalists, whose capital is invested in manufactures; I admit, also, that these establishments may afford some advantage, to a few hundreds, perhaps thousands of persons, who reside contiguously to them; but I utterly deny that it will increase the aggregate wealth of the nation. And here, Mr. Chairman, though I fear it may be somewhat unpalatable, I must beg leave to introduce some principles of political economy.

The sum of my doctrines, on this subject, is this: that the wealth of a nation is an aggregate of the wealth of the individuals who compose it; this is as plain a principle as that the whole is made up of its parts. That there is an instinct implanted in man, the master-spring of his actions, which, through life, impels him to a perpetual endeavor to better his condition; that this principle, acting alike upon all, without concert, and without even looking to the public interest, every man in society is constantly endeavoring to increase his portion of wealth, and, consequently, every man is laboring to add to the stock of public wealth—an increase of a whole being the inevitable result of an increase of all its parts. From these principles, this corollary is deduced; that Government should never interfere but in matters of State; that, in relation to the internal police of a country, it has done all that is required of it, all that it ought to do, when it has secured to its citizens their personal liberty and private property, and an impartial administration of justice; that, as to the appropriation of his skill, capital, and labor, he ought to be left as free as the air which he breathes, subject to no other limitation, than one which may be expressed in one maxim of the civil law: "So use thy own as not to injure another's." Now, sir, no gentleman will contend that the instinct which I have mentioned, does not prompt every man to desire to improve his condition; upon this point I have the law of nature on my side. Before, then, it can be justified to invoke the aid of Government upon this subject, it is incumbent on those who would do so, to prove that Government knows better how to direct this desire, which all acknowledge to be universal, than the individual citizens themselves. This they cannot do; but, on the contrary, I think it can be clearly shown, not only that Government does not know better, but that it does not know so well; nay, that, in the nature of things, it is, and must be, wholly incompetent to the task. As gentlemen will probably reject the authority of books, I will resort to other proof—to the experience of all who hear me, and, particularly, to our practical experience during this very discussion. Not having the property of the fabled ring of Midas, which converted every thing which it touched into gold, we cannot, by a legislative fiat, create the capital; the only possible remaining method, then, by which it can be contended that the interference of Government can add to the public wealth, is, by increasing the productiveness of capital, by directing it to a more profitable application. Now, sir, I would ask, can any member of this Committee, can the whole Committee united, give me an answer to the following questions? What is the average rate of profit of the great departments of industry, agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation? What is the particular rate of profit in each? What is the particular rate of profit in the different kinds of manufacture, such as iron, wool, cotton, &c? What is the cause of the difference in the profit of different manufacturing establishments engaged in manufacturing the same materials? Does that difference arise from the difference in capital, or in machinery, or in industry, or in skill, or in economy? What is the rate of profit in England in the different kinds of manufactures, which come into competition with ours of the same kind? Is it greater or less than ours; and how much greater or less? What is the precise amount of the advantage or disadvantage produced by the comparative manufacturing facilities in England and the United States? Is it not manifest, that, before we are prepared to settle the various questions arising out of a tariff designed to encourage domestic industry, that we must be able to answer all these questions, and many more of a similar character? And, yet, sir, it must be apparent that these things are not within the scope of human possibility. Now to exemplify: the manufacturers ask for protection; a given sum is proposed as a duty; the commercial interest, as well as the agricultural, allege that the profit of the manufacturer is already larger than theirs. Who amongst us can tell what is the profit

MARCH, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

H. of R.

of either? and, if we cannot, how do we know whether protection is needed? and, if it be, how much? Again, the wool-grower asks a protecting duty to his wool; the manufacturer exclaims that the rate proposed will prostrate his manufacture. What data have we upon which to decide between them.

I could furnish a practical exemplification of our incompetency to this task, drawn from the impossibility of answering each of the questions which I have put. These will illustrate the truth for which I am contending, namely, that the proposed system, as it is without our sphere of action, so it is beyond our means of information. But whilst we are thus without the necessary information, as to all these complicated subjects, each individual in his own immediate and separate pursuit, has, or may have, all the information required, in relation to his business. To individuals, then, let us leave it, with the assurance, that, as they have the desire to give their capital and labor the most profitable direction, so they can much more surely find out that application than we can. If Government interfere, it must be either by turning to manufactures capital not now so invested, or by aiding that which is now so employed. If the reasoning which I have just presented be correct, then as to the new capital, the interference is injurious, because the individual would have so appropriated it, if such appropriation had been the most beneficial. As to the capital already invested in manufactures, if it already produced to its owner an average profit, then nothing could be more unjust than to increase that profit at the expense of the community. If it did not produce the average profit, then it is clear that the same capital would contribute more to the stock of public wealth, if it were applied in some other way. The interference of Government must, then, either be unjust or injurious. But it is said that the community will be compensated by any temporary loss arising from the aid to manufactures, by the ultimate reduction in price, produced by the domestic competition. And, in proof of this, we are triumphantly told of the reduction in the price of coarse cottons. In the first place I would remark that, however the price may be reduced, this very bill proposes to increase the minimum upon coarse cottons; which would seem to show that they yet wanted more protection. But let me ask, if the coarse cottons have fallen in the United States, have they not also fallen in England, and to a price lower than with us? The best proof which gentlemen could give us, would be, to repeal the minimum; a proposition which, I dare say, we shall not hear from them. I do not mean to contend, sir, that domestic competition will not ultimately reduce the price—but our misfortune is this, that the high profits at first resulting from increased duties, allure many persons to embark in the competition with insufficient or small capital, or carry too much capital into that pursuit, and when the reduction in price commences, before it has reached its minimum, and such an one as the foreign article might be bought for, the small capitalists are overpowered in the competition, by the large ones, and they again cry out to us, Help us, or we sink. This is not fancy, sir, but fact. The Waltham factory asks for no aid; the memorial from Delaware does. It asks for protection to the woollen manufactures, that a part of the redundant capital invested in those of cotton, may flow over into those of wool. Thus, sir, we go on, in a continued circle. Large profits, it seems, allure too much capital to a given pursuit. As soon as by competition those profits begin to decline, and we hope to realize the promise of a minimum price, and thus receive the equivalent for our loss in the intermediate high prices, we are called on to save those who are likely to be crushed in the struggle; that is, we must sustain all our manufacturers against a foreign competition; and we must sustain the smaller capitalist against the domestic competitions.

But, it is said that this system will increase domestic industry. If I have succeeded in showing that it will not increase the public wealth or capital of the nation, then, sir, it is utterly impossible that it can increase the national industry; it is the capital which calls that industry into action, which furnishes its inducement and its reward; and, to say that labor will be increased, whilst the capital of the country is not only not increased, but, as I think I have shown, is diminished, would be as great a solecism in political economy, as to say that population could be increased, whilst the food of the country was diminished; as the food supports population, so capital supports labor. It will certainly divert a portion of labor from one pursuit to another; it will certainly increase the profits of the manufacturing capitalist; but it does not increase the whole stock of the wealth of the nation; it gives only to all the laborers the usual rate of wages, about equal to their maintenance; and that maintenance they might have acquired in some other labor, either for themselves or for others.

It is argued that it will furnish a better and a more steady market to the agriculturists. Let us examine this pretension. The agricultural produce consists either of food, or of the materials of manufacture; so far as it consists of food, there is no increase of consumers; for, as it has been well said in one of the memorials sent to this House, we now feed them all, and we can do no more. The argument, however, proceeds upon the assumption, that a portion of labor now engaged in agriculture, will be transferred to manufactures; and thus, the quantity of agricultural produce being diminished, there will be a better price for the remainder. This is indeed a consoling promise! With countless millions of fertile land yet uncleared, a part of that now in cultivation is to be deserted; then it must remain in a state of waste and desolation, for, whence is to be derived the labor to cultivate it, in lieu of that which has gone to manufactures? Can that system be a sound one, which proposes, not only to arrest our progress in clearing new lands, but even to diminish the area of our present cultivation?

But, after all, what is to be the number of our new consumers? We have no data, on which to estimate, with any thing like accuracy, the number of persons engaged in manufactures. I speak now of regular manufacturing establishments of articles for sale. The Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, in 1815, reported, that there were then 100,000 persons engaged in the cotton manufacture; probably the whole number employed in the different manufactures, might now be estimated at 200,000; but these ought not to be included in our calculation, as they now consume our food, without the aid of this bill. Let us suppose that the encouragement afforded by this bill, should, in some two or three years, transfer 100,000 persons from agriculture to manufactures. Here we have this number of new consumers to feed. What perceptible advantage, let me ask, will this small number afford to the agriculturist? Particularly, when the same cause that creates this new demand for food increases the price of every article which the agriculturist consumes? Let me illustrate by an example. I will suppose that a bbl. of flour, which before brought five dollars, shall then command six; but the yard of cloth, which before brought five dollars, now costs six, and thus the account is balanced, even upon the favorable supposition, for the advocates of the bill, that this enhancement of price, in agricultural produce, will take place. But we have a much better prospect of new consumers, from our increase of population. Supposing it to have been, in 1820, 10,000,000—as it has been ascertained that we double in a period of about twenty-three years—it will be found that there must be an annual increase of upwards of 400,000 persons. But it is estimated that, in the healthiest countries, one in fifty will annually die. This, upon a capital of 10,000,000, will, annually, be 200,000. To make, then, an actual addition of 400,000, there must, of the children annually born, at least 600,000 survive. Counting, then, from 1820 to 1830, a period of ten years, there would be 6,000,000 of persons, as consumers, not one of whom would be producers, none having yet passed ten years of age. It is true that a number of those born in the preceding period, say from 1810, would be annually coming into the class of laborers, by reaching the age for labor; but, then, it must be remembered that they were the progeny of the capital of population in 1810, which, for round numbers, I will call 7,000,000. And, besides those who are successively, by age, passing beyond the period of labor, one-half of the whole number are to be presumed to be females, who, for the most part, are engaged in household occupations, and not contributing to field labor. Taking, then, into estimate that the stock of those annually coming into the laboring class, was, originally, from a capital of 7,000,000, whilst the number of new consumers was from a capital of 10,000,000; that the new laborers are subject to the deductions which I have mentioned, and the new consumers have to be added to their number, the number necessary to supply the annual deficiency, by death, of 200,000, it will be seen that the number of consumers is constantly increasing in an immense proportion beyond the new producers; and hence, gentlemen may perceive that, where population is not checked, the natural course of things is perpetually furnishing a corrective to the complaint of surplus food without a market. Again, by way of quieting gentlemen's apprehensions upon that subject, let me tell them that the whole of the flour exported, during the last year, would scarcely more than feed the whole population of the British Isles for one fortnight.

As far as the agricultural produce consists of materials of manufacture, as we now have a market for all, it would only be an exchange of the foreign for the domestic market. If, for example, we did not purchase the cotton manufactures of Britain, she would not need the material of which that part formerly purchased by us was made; and so of other articles. The effect of gradually displacing foreign commodities, by the use of domestic, would be in proportion to the extent of that exclusion, to cut off the commerce between this and foreign countries; and, with the commerce, our navigation interest would go down, as the one furnishes the necessary measure of the other. These would be the necessary consequences of the favorite doctrine of gentlemen, that we ought to be independent of foreign nations. Now, all commerce implies reciprocal dependence; that is, it implies that each country, carrying it on, has something that the other wants, and which they mutually receive as equivalents. If this be the kind of dependence objected to, then, the independence sought for, implies that there is to be no commerce. When there shall be no foreign commerce, we shall have scarcely any tonnage engaged in foreign trade, in time of peace there being but little carrying trade, except when a general European war should give us that trade for the belligerents; what, then, would become of our 800,000 tons of shipping now engaged in the foreign commerce of the United States?

But fearful apprehensions are entertained from our imports exceeding our exports. The amount of imports, for 1823, was $77,579,267, and of our exports, $74,699,030. The excess of imports over exports being apparently near $3,000,000. But this is only in appearance; for, both imports and exports are estimated at their value at the place of exportation. Now, as we mainly transported all in our own ships, there is nothing to be added to our imports on account of freight; but the value of freight, upon our exports, is to be added, because, having done nearly seven-eighths ourselves, the articles would be sold for as much more, in the foreign market, than they were worth at home, as the freight amounted to; which would more than cover the apparent deficiency. Again, sir, even if the imports did exceed the exports, it does not at all necessarily follow, that we are carrying on an unprofitable commerce. If the imports are used as articles of consumption, then it would be injurious. But, if they are of a character to increase the productive powers of the country, in a subsequent year, then the trade is beneficial, and the excess only operates as a loan to that amount of foreign capital. A practical exemplification of this truth may be found in the history of the United States previous to the Revolutionary war, when we were constantly in debt to Great Britain, and yet increasing in wealth with unexampled rapidity.

Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of this subject we are always told that, whatever theorists may say, experience proves that great poverty has been the fate of those nations which did not encourage manufactures, and great wealth the lot of those which did; and Spain and England have been uniformly presented as striking examples; the first of poverty, and the second of wealth, which is ascribed to their different policy in this respect. Let us first investigate the causes of the poverty of Spain. Unhappy country! What a contrast it presents to its former self! The time was, when it was the terror of all Europe; when it commanded the resources of Spain proper, the Netherlands, Sicily, Sardinia, Naples, and both the Indies; when, in the great struggle between the rival houses of Bourbon and Austria, the balance of power in Europe was endangered; when Queen Elizabeth, and the whole English nation, trembled at the approach of her invincible Armada. Now, what is her condition? Prostrate, debased, a vassal province to France. Now, indeed, is verified the famous saying of Louis XIV. There are no longer any Pyrenees. And, even in the 19th century, the benighted mind of a part of its population makes them cling to the Inquisition; but his Holiness, the Pope, refuses to comply with their request to re-establish it. Let me assign some of the most prominent causes of this fallen condition. It is owing, in part, to the bigotry of the Government, to the superstition of her people, and to the Catholic religion. Look over the map of Europe, you will find the Catholics much more numerous than the Protestants. And yet how infinite the difference in national industry in favor of the Protestants! What comparison is there between the products of labor of the Flemings, the French, and northern Italians, on the one side; and the Silesians, Saxons, the Prussians, and Englishmen, on the other? In Ireland, we are told, the linen, the only great manufacture, is in the hands of the Protestants. Sir, it is said, the endless holidays in the Catholic religion seriously interfere with labor. The gold and silver of Mexico and South America have been to them a misfortune. While it stimulated the industry of the rest of Europe, it furnished the means to the kings of Spain of carrying on wars of mad ambition, it dazzled the nation with the glare of boundless wealth, and destroyed the elastic spring of industry. Every galleon which crossed the ocean carried with it apparent wealth, but the cause of ultimate poverty. Spain, in her folly, banished from the kingdom the Jews who conducted her commerce; and in the early part of the 17th century a million of Moors, the most industrious of her people in agriculture and manufactures. These exiles carried with them their wealth, their skill, and industry. Examine, sir, the structure of her Government, and her internal regulations. Her king, her nobles, her clergy, under papal bondage; the people without education; the two orders of nobility and clergy, with one third of the land of the kingdom locked up in perpetual inalienability. Some idea of the operation of this latter cause may be formed from the experience of the French revolution. There, too, a third of the land of the kingdom was in the hands of the privileged orders, and inalienable. The French revolution, though it produced some tremendous shocks, has left some valuable monuments to its memory. The national domain was confiscated and sold, and millions of people, in consequence, became the owners of the soil. Who can doubt that but for this, upon the restoration of the Bourbon dynasty, all the former abuses, and the whole ancient regime, would have been restored with them? To return to Spain. The taxes of the kingdom, the most oppressive in their manner of being laid and collected, and almost the whole borne by the people; while the privileged orders were exempt, or nearly so! Take a particular tax upon the sale of commodities repeated at every new sale, insomuch that an article, in its various transfers, has been taxed ten, ay, twelve different times. Consider the monstrous and absurd practice grown into a prescriptive right in favor of the privileged orders, called the Mesta, by which they are at liberty, at will, to have thousands and myriads of sheep driven through the different provinces for the benefit of pasturage; the most defective administration of justice, perhaps, in the civilized world, which we know sooner than any other cause, to destroy all credit in the transactions of men. Its agriculture, sir, is at as low an ebb as its manufactures, and it is ascribable to the same causes. These, sir, are the outlines of the picture of Spain. The effect of all these causes is, in a great degree, to destroy that master-spring of human exertion—the certainty that we shall reap the profits of our labor. No man can feel this certainty, who does not enjoy security of person and property. The Spanish people are under the yoke of a political, a regal, and a papal bondage. Look at England herself, while she wore the chains of feudal vassalage, and you will find that the active spirit of industry which now achieves so much, then almost lay dormant. Agriculture, manufactures, and every kind of industry, moved with a sluggish pace. A new era commenced, and all the natural consequences followed.

And this, sir, brings me to examine the examples which England offers to our contemplation. The first view which I shall present on this subject, has reference to the statistics of the two countries. The population of Great Britain and Ireland, according to Lowe, for 1823, was 21,500,000. But, as the statement, in relation to Ireland, was conjectural, and that of Great Britain official, I will take that as the subject of comparison; Great Britain, then, in 1823, had a population of 14,500,000, and 165 to the square mile; dividing the population by the number to the square mile, we find the number of square miles to be less than 90,000; the population of the United States for round numbers, I will state at 10,000,000. If we take the whole territory of the United States, including the boundless region beyond the Mississippi, it is estimated by Seybert at 2,000,000 square miles, and the population would be a fraction less than 5 to the square mile. Can it, Mr. Chairman, be correct for us, with a territory so large, and a population so thin, to follow the example of Great Britain, with a territory so small and a population so dense? I had thought that examples were to be followed, when circumstances were alike; but here, so far from likeness, the example offered for our imitation presents nothing but striking contrast. For a moment, sir, allow me to reverse the picture, to take the converse of the proposition; suppose that it was formally proposed in the British Parliament, that Great Britain should, by legislative interference, attempt to turn her capital and labor from manufactures to agriculture, and the argument offered should be, that America had prospered by agriculture, what would be thought of such a proposition? The answer would be, that our population, compared to territory, points to manufactures; so here, I say, that our population, compared to territory, points to agriculture; when a population equal to that of Great Britain shall be found in New York and Pennsylvania, which, together, contain a greater territory, manufactures will spring up in the natural course of things.

Before I proceed to examine the various causes which have contributed to the wealth of Great Britain, I beg leave to correct gentlemen as to the fact of manufactures there being more productive than agriculture. Mr. Lowe, in his work, gives us Colquhoun's estimate of the property created in Great Britain and Ireland in 1812, which, upon the whole, he considers as about a fair estimate for 1823. The aggregate of that estimate is £430,000,000; of this, agriculture, in all its branches, including pasture, is put down at £217,000,000; manufactures, in every branch, at £114,000,000; thus, it appears that, including pasture, agriculture produces more than manufactures, and every means of creating property put together; but excluding pasture, estimated at from £80,000,000 to £100,000,000, and taking the largest sum, still agriculture produces a few millions of pounds sterling more than manufactures in every branch. The same book gives us a table of the proportions of population engaged in different pursuits; from this it appears, taking the year 1821, that the families chiefly engaged in agriculture were 978,656; those in manufactures, trade, and mechanical employment, 1,350,259; the average estimate of a family being five persons to each. Thus it appears, if you take the whole product of agriculture, it exceeds the aggregate of all other products, by some millions, though the persons engaged in it are not so numerous, by more than a million and an half of people; I do not mean to say laborers, because the estimate, being by families, includes all ages and sexes. If you exclude pasture from the agricultural produce, still it exceeds the whole product of manufactures; the table does not furnish us with the number engaged in manufactures alone, but, if we allow one million eight hundred and fifty seven thousand for trade and the mechanical arts, which seems to be a liberal one, there will remain as many in manufactures as in agriculture. With all the boast, then, of English writers, of the productiveness of manufactures, here are facts stated by themselves, which bear illustrious evidence in favor of agriculture. I come now, sir, to the causes which have enabled Great Britain to take the lead, in the career of European competition for wealth. They are political, religious, and physical. Certain great events in Europe, over which she had no control, turned greatly to her advantage; the revocation of the Edict of Nantes by Louis XIV., produced by his blind intolerance, drove hundreds of thousands of his Protestant subjects out of his kingdom; the tyranny and oppression of Philip II. of Spain, forced multitudes of his subjects in the Netherlands to quit their native land; the exiles from both these countries took refuge in Holland, the north of Germany, and England—but much the largest number in England; they carried thither with them, besides themselves, much active industry, much skill in the most valuable manufactures, and much capital; these seeds were sown in the most favorable soil in Europe to their growth, and they, accordingly, soon sprung up in some luxuriance. Permit me to pause here a moment, and contrast England with Spain in this regard; England gained people, manufacturing skill, and capital, by the folly and wickedness of the rulers of foreign nations; Spain, on the contrary, having all these advantages in her own bosom, lost them by her own folly and wickedness, by the expulsion of the Moors.

Let us now survey the English Constitution and Government. She at an early period established the reformed religion, the advantages of which I have already mentioned: she was the only country in Europe which had a representative body, thereby elevating the people to a share in political liberty. She led the way in the abolition of the feudal system; one of the most rapacious and unprincipled Kings that she ever had even contributed to this, by an act of cunning, or left-handed wisdom, as my Lord Bacon would call it. I allude to Henry VII., who, by opening the way to the alienation of lands, designed to break down his nobles, without seeing the great consequences which were to follow. Upon the abolition of the feudal system, the third estate of the realm began to acquire property; this stimulated industry of every kind; a spring was given to commerce, which, as early as the days of Elizabeth, we are told by Lord Bolingbroke, carried the English over all the known, and even into the till then unknown, parts of the world—to the Dwina, the Volga, across the Caspian sea, into Persia to the coasts of Africa, to the East Indies, first by the track of the Venitians and then by the Cape of Good Hope; though the same author tells us that in the reign of her father Henry VIII., the English were obliged to hire or borrow ships of Hamburg, Lubec, Dantzic, and other places. I come now to the physical causes, which have given new vigor to her flight, new pinions to her wings. The whole kingdom of Great Britain is an island, and her internal navigation superior to that of any country of equal extent on the globe. Her insular position teems with advantages. Whilst the nations of the continent of Europe, for purposes of safety, were obliged to keep up standing armies, and barriers of fortified towns, which have been happily said to be like armor too heavy to be borne, which wastes the strength of those who bear them, England was protected by a continued maritime frontier, which cost her nothing to defend it but a navy. Thus, by a rare fortune, her position invited and impelled her by an irresistible destiny to the pursuits of commerce; and whilst in quest of commercial gain, formed, by means of her mercantile marine, a perfect nursery of seamen, to man that very navy, which served her in lieu of a fortified barrier, not only with less expense, but with much less danger to the Constitution, than the armies and barriers of the continent. The people of England, then, being emancipated from feudal bondage, participating by their Representatives in the Constitution and Government, secure in their persons and property, having their minds freed from the fetters of popish superstition, a new, and, compared with the rest of Europe, an unexampled degree of elasticity was communicated to the spring of their industry and enterprise. Operated upon by these impelling moral and political causes, and aided by the gift of Nature with all the local and physical advantages which I have described, it is not surprising that they should, as they did, engage in the most extensive foreign commerce, and acquire the largest mercantile marine in the world. They carried their colonies to the four quarters of the globe—to Europe, Asia, Africa, and America—some for defence, some for commercial gain. The productions of many of these colonies, offering new equivalents for the productions of labor at home, created new stimulants; these new products, both of the parent State and colonies, enriched her, not only by themselves, but by the transportation of them respectively. Thus, sir, it was the rich and extensive foreign commerce of England, produced by the causes which I have mentioned, which contributed essentially to the increase of her wealth.

If, Mr. Chairman, we look into the page of history, we shall find that foreign commerce has been a fruitful source of wealth, in ancient as well as modern times. Look at Sidon and Tyre; at Venice, Genoa, and Pisa; at Lubec, Hamburg, and the other Hanse towns. See to what a pitch of opulence these towns were each carried by its aid. Look, sir, at the Northern States of this Union. It operates as a cause of wealth, by giving increased productiveness to the agricultural and other labor of the country which possesses it, by means of the boundless market which it opens for its surplus produce. Where its own country, either from the poverty or smallness of its territory, has no such surplus produce, it is actively engaged in effecting an exchange of the produce of foreign countries, and thus reciprocally imparting value to that which each wanted, and which each had to spare. When, by these means, capital is accumulated, and the population full, then come manufactures, which, as they cannot exist without capital, necessarily presuppose its previous accumulation. But if, in the tide of time, and the vicissitudes of human affairs, any circumstances turn this commerce into a new channel, the capital which flowed from it, takes the same direction, and the manufactures, which depended for their existence on that capital, follow in its train, and associate themselves anew with it, in its new habitation. Accordingly, Mr. Chairman, in the Italian cities, and Hanse towns, whilst the capital from foreign commerce remained with them, so did manufactures; but since its departure, nothing is left of them but the sad memento and melancholy remembrance of their former opulence and grandeur! This is the inevitable course of things, and you might as well attempt to arrest the progress of the earth, by the stamp of the foot, as to attempt to alter it. Nothing, then, remains, after these sojourners have taken their flight, but the solid agricultural wealth of the country which possesses it. In this respect, sir, the United States enjoy a felicitous position in the scale of nations; possessed of a territory vast in extent and of great fertility, we have the deep foundations of our wealth laid upon the fixed and permanent basis of agricultural labor; possessed of an extensive foreign commerce, which lays open the world to us, as a market for the surplus produce of that labor, and stimulates its productions by the value of all the diversified commodities, whether of comfort or of luxury, which it offers us in exchange, our lot is cast in pleasant places, and, if we wait with patience, and enjoy the blessings which we have, time and circumstances will raise up manufactures amongst us, when the condition of the country shall require it.

And let it not be supposed, sir, that, without great extension of manufactures, we shall be without wealth. Compare Great Britain and the United States in the rapidity of their progress in prosperity—in this comparison, the question is, which of the two countries has improved most rapidly, in proportion to its capital? For, as in each the whole annual produce (amounting, in Great Britain and Ireland, to £350,000,000 sterling) is used either as revenue for actual consumption, or for the purpose of increasing the productive industry of the country in subsequent years, the increase of wealth is to be measured by the proportion which that improvement bears to the capital of the country. Has Great Britain made as great relative progress as the United States? The question is answered, conclusively, in our favor, by looking at the unexampled increase of our population, by their comforts and independence, by the continued extension of our settlements, the clearing of new lands, the consequent enlargement of the area of cultivation, and, in fine, by every circumstance which marks the rapid growth of a country. Go back forty years, and take the ground which each then occupied. No man will say that we have not moved further from our then position than she has from hers.

I do not mean to say, sir, that manufactures do not contribute to the wealth of a country, that they do not contribute to the wealth of England. My proposition is, that, though they are the cause, they were first themselves an effect. English capital was first accumulated; that gave rise to manufactures, and they, in their turn, now add to the public wealth. But to say that they were the primary cause of that wealth, would be as improper as if a Boston merchant, who had accumulated a million of dollars by commerce, and then invested it in manufactures, from which he received a profit, were to say that manufactures were the cause of his wealth. But, in whatever way, or to whatever extent, manufactures may have contributed to the wealth of England, it is not by protecting duties, as has been contended, that they have been sustained in her competition with Europe. No, sir, the causes of her manufacturing prosperity have a much deeper source than these. They are found, besides the political circumstances before stated, in her inexhaustible fund of coal, and other natural advantages, and the no less important acquired advantages of capital and machinery. The British writers themselves ascribe their success to these causes; and the Ministerial exposé of the British resources, published in 1823, distinctly ascribes it to their immense superiority in capital and machinery, which so multiplies human industry, says the same pamphlet, as to render the cost of labor, as compared with the produce, almost wholly insignificant.

I refer to the same pamphlet, sir, for certain facts which conclusively prove to me the inefficiency of protecting duties. In 1823, the exports of linen from Great Britain were only about £2,300,000; of woollen, about £6,000,000; and of cotton, £20,000. Now, sir, upon the coarse linens, there is an actual bounty upon exportation. As to woollen, it has received a large share of the paternal care of the British Parliament, from the reign of the First Edward to the present time—a period of upwards of 500 years. It has been a perfect legislative bantling in point of protecting duties; yet cotton, the export of which, in the year 1780, did not much exceed £2,000,000, has now grown to half the amount of the whole exports of the kingdom. The reason is, that, from the texture of cotton, it is emphatically fitted for machinery, and hence the astonishing increase in its manufacture.

Let us now, sir, examine the manner in which wealth, acquired by manufactures, is distributed. Some years ago, the persons engaged in manufacturing cotton in England, were estimated at 800,000. They may fairly now, from the extension, be set down, at least, at 1,000,000. It would be a large calculation to suppose, that 50,000 of that number were interested in the capital; but let the profits be ever so great, every one knows that the laborers receive only wages, and that, too, scarcely enough for a comfortable maintenance. Of consequence, the whole profit passes into the hands of the capitalists. Here, then, of 1,000,000 of persons, 50,000 receive the profits, whatever they are, and 950,000 receive nothing beyond mere maintenance. Now, Mr. Chairman, is it the policy of this country to concentrate wealth in the hands of a few, or to give it the utmost possible diffusion amongst our people? We have been told that we ought to have an American policy. So say I, sir. This system suits well the meridian of Great Britain. It does not suit ours. The immense burdens of that kingdom, the large loans which are sometimes necessary to be effected, make it convenient to the British Government to have its wealth in the hands of a few large capitalists. They are convenient subscribers to a large loan for the service of Government, or for a subsidy. With us, the principles of our Government, the whole frame of our polity, require us not to make large masses of wealth, but rather to break them into smaller pieces. Great inequality in wealth would tend to warp our institutions from their natural course. Sir, the structure of society in Great Britain may be aptly illustrated by one of the stately columns which support the dome of this magnificent hall: Its base is of freestone; its shaft, of domestic marble; its capital, of fine Italian. The emblem of ours is, or ought to be, a column, whose base, shaft, and capital, are of the same material. I repeat, sir, that a system, tending to produce great inequality, may suit Great Britain; it does not suit us. And, after all, Mr. Chairman, is wealth, though desirable, the only great desideratum in Government, especially in ours. Carthage, sir, the richest city in the world, in her day, was, at the same time, the weakest; and, in the last great struggle for her political existence, she relied, for her defence, upon an army of mercenary soldiers, and was utterly defeated and overthrown by her poorer neighbors, the Romans—thus executing their famous denunciation, Delenda est Carthago. Sir, there are great moral and political objections to the premature encouragement of manufactures.

I shall not attempt, sir, to take the lecturer's chair, and read a moral homily to the Committee; I shall not stop to speak of the effects of large manufacturing establishments, upon the health, the manners, or the morals of the laborers; let it be, if gentlemen will have it, that continued toil, through the day, and part of the night, the continual smoke, oil, and lamps, of these places, do not affect the health; let it be, that the early withdrawal of children from parents, and the indiscriminate crowding together of sexes and ages, do not affect the morals; let all this be, and yet there is an objection in a political light, which makes me adverse to this policy. In England, sir, if wealth can be accumulated, if the Government can squeeze taxes enough from the people, to save it from sinking under its mountain load of debt, if the privileged orders and capitalists can be kept up, it matters not, that hundreds of thousands, that millions of the people, are doomed to exist, not live; to be considered as the machines which belong to the establishment; with no other difference than this, that, whilst other machines are impelled by water, or fire, they are put into motion by that principle of animation which nature implanted in them. In this country, sir, we do not want animated machines, we do not want plebs, or populace; we want men, we want people; we want citizens who obey the laws, not task-masters; who do not receive their daily bread from the hand of another, but from their own voluntary labor upon their own soil; who have some stake in the Government, who feel and take an interest in public affairs, and are ready and willing to defend themselves as men and citizens in their rights of property, and civil and political liberty. What comparison, sir, is there, between a million of Englishmen engaged in cotton factories as day laborers, and a million of American citizens cultivating their own soil.

Look, sir, at the riots in England in 1808, and 1812, when whole manufacturing districts were roused into acts of violence from the low price of labor and the high prices of provisions. A sudden check to demand for manufactures, or a temporary scarcity of grain, makes wages an insufficient resource for comfortable maintenance. Remove them, and they settle down quietly to their tasks. Reflect for a moment, sir, on the scene in 1815, when the corn maximum was under consideration, when my Lord Castlereagh, late Lord Londonderry, caused the Parliament house to be surrounded by armed soldiers, to keep off what he was pleased to call a mob; that is the people, who feared, by the high price of grain, they would starve for bread. In this country, sir, where agriculture predominates, no such difficulties occur; our own people eat their own bread, and have some to spare to the British manufacturer. And let us not be uneasy, sir, that we have too much breadstuff; we can always dispose of it at some price; and if it be now low, it is owing to the state of the world; so are manufactures in England low; indeed it seems they are too low; for our manufacturers tell us they are so much so that they shall be ruined if brought into competition with theirs. Let me add, sir, for the comfort of our agriculturists, that some surplus of grain on hand is a national blessing; they serve the purposes which public granaries did in ancient times to supply deficient years; the very year, sir, after the English farmers called for a maximum on corn, from their supposed abundance, the year 1816, such was the scarcity that it rose to £6 sterling the quarter of eight bushels; even in this land of plenty, Indian corn sold at $10 per barrel, and flour at near $15. A continual surplus, then, I repeat, is a public blessing.

But it is said that the late war and the double duties gave an encouragement, which caused infant manufactures to spring up, and that they ought to be sustained by Government till they become strong enough to withstand foreign competition. No doubt, sir, that, since the peace, the manufacturers have suffered great reduction in their prices; but in this they participate in common with every class of their fellow-citizens, nay, sir, with every part of Europe. Mr. Lowe estimates the fall in agricultural produce at 60 per cent., and in that of manufactures at from 40 to 50 per cent. The same cause operated in Europe and America; from 1792 till 1814, except the feverish truce which followed the peace of Amiens, all civilized Europe almost was in arms; half a million of men on the side of France, about the same number on the side of the allies; this created an immense demand for ordnance, munitions of war, clothing, subsistence; this demand gave new stimulus to their production, and enhanced the prices to an enormous extent; upon the peace of 1814, this demand was greatly diminished, and consequently the prices of every article fell to a peace rate. The languor which followed, corresponded to the preceding excitement. Let me present to the Committee the description which Mr. Lowe gives of the prominent characteristic of the national embarrassment of England since the peace of 1814. I use his own words: "A deficiency of employment among part of the lower orders, and distress, from insufficiency of wages, at those intervals, when provisions were high priced. In the middle classes, whether merchants, manufacturers, or agriculturists, the general ground of complaint has been an inadequacy of profit, a disproportion of prices to the cost of production. The principal cause of these and other difficulties, was, doubtless, as explained in the preceding chapter, the magnitude of the transition, the suspension of Government expenditure, and the consequent overstock of hands." He then considers the evil as aggravated by the public burdens, and the expense of living being higher than among their neighbors.

Towards the close of the European war, we were drawn into its devouring vortex with one of the belligerents; the same extravagant enhancement of price occurred here for every article required for the public service or individual consumption; upon the return of peace here, as in Europe, every thing returned to its natural peace price. The same state of things, however, pervaded the whole society; the ship owner, the merchant, the farmer, all shared the same fate. I regret that war prices allured too many persons to embark in manufacturing projects; even in Massachusetts alone I learn that eighty-five manufacturing companies were incorporated in four years. But, Mr. Chairman, I will show that the manufacturers have no cause of complaint against the Government; on the contrary, that the Government has acted with great liberality to them; until the year 1812, there was no duty, except on carriages and their parts, higher than 12½ per cent.; by the act of 1812, the permanent duties were doubled, thus raising them from 12½ to 25 per cent.; there was a duty of 2½ per cent., called the Mediterranean fund, laid in 1804, and continued by successive acts to 1815, when it expired, but it was no part of the permanent duty; the act of 1812, which doubled the duties, declared, that it should continue in force for one year after the peace, and no longer; here then was fair warning to all who engaged in manufactures; they were purchasers with notice.

In 1816, however, the manufacturers represented, that the transition from war to peace, made it necessary to give them a temporary continuance of protection; accordingly, by the act of that year, we continued the 25 per cent., the war duties on cotton and woollen for three years, and then declared it should be reduced to 20 per cent.; before the lapse of those three years we again continued the 25 per cent. on cottons and woollens to 1826, and now we are asked for further protection. This state of facts, and history of legislation, will certainly acquit us of any charge of want of liberality as to the great articles of cotton and woollen. Let us now take the case of iron. In 1816 that article was subjected to a duty of $9 per ton; it was raised, in 1818, to $15. I find by the document from the Treasury, by dividing the whole value of iron imported by the number of tons, the price per ton is $55 and a fraction. Now, it will be found that $15 per ton is more than 25 per cent. ad valorem. This was the war duty, excluding the Mediterranean duty of 2½ per cent. But, if we take the price of iron in the interior of Sweden, where it is made, it is not more than $40 or $45 per ton; here it sells at least for $80; and as the manufacturer here gets the whole benefit of the difference between the price to the manufacturer in Sweden and the market price here, his advantage is equal to between 90 and 100 per cent. The case of hemp is as favorable to our growers; but I forbear to go further into particular articles. It may be said, in general, that the present duties equal the war duties. Let us now, sir, institute a comparison between the relative advantages of Great Britain and the United States in manufacturing. The first thing is fuel, of which they boast triumphantly; in that article we are equal to any nation on the earth; our forests groaning with wood, and the bowels of the earth teeming with coal. The next is the raw material. As to cotton, of which half their exports is composed, as appears from their ministerial pamphlet, we raise it, they do not; here, therefore, we have the advantage. As to provisions, we have an immense advantage. As to the relative taxes of the two countries, it is known that theirs greatly exceed ours, and here, also, we have the advantage. As to wages of labor, it is said that ours greatly exceed theirs; but, in the first place, I would remark that, if it be true, as has been said, that machinery multiplies the physical force of a country twelve times, then it follows that eleventh-twelfths of this disadvantage are obviated. But another strong argument arises from the nature of wages; every pursuit to be continued must yield about the average rate of profit in the country after paying all expenses; now wages are a part of those expenses; when, therefore, it is said that manufactures cannot pay the rate of wages that other pursuits do, it shows that those others are more beneficial; besides, high wages, if the business yet goes on, is the best sign of the prosperity of the country; they are paid to the laboring class of the community, who are always a majority; it shows, therefore, that that class is in a comfortable condition. The last point of comparison is capital; now I know the positive amount of British capital greatly exceeds ours, but its relative amount does not much exceed ours; by relative amount, I mean the proportion which the capital bears to the transactions to be negotiated by it; thus, one man may have a capital of a million, and another only of ten thousand dollars, the one being a wholesale merchant and importer, and the other a small country dealer, the latter may have as much relative capital as the former.

Some idea may be formed of the amount of capital required to negotiate the transactions in Great Britain and Ireland, by the following table given by Lowe, of their national expenditure, or consumption for 1823:

Expended on the produce of the soil for the food of man, or for purposes of manufacture	- £120,000,000
On the produce of the mines	- 10,000,000
On manufactures for home consumption	- 70,000,000
On houses built or repaired, on furniture, and on improvement of land, or whatever is termed in law real property	- 30,000,000
On all goods imported, whether for consumption, such as tea, sugar, coffee, or for manufacture, as wool, hemp, iron	- 70,000,000
On all commodities or products not comprised in the preceding	- 50,000,000
	£350,000,000

The best way to ascertain the relative amount, is the interest of money; that is, the price paid for the use of money; and the price of that, like every other commodity, depends on the proportion between the effective demand and supply. Government in England can command money at four per cent., we at five. This then shows the difference in the relative demand. I have not mentioned machinery, because he who has capital can command it. These are the comparative advantages and disadvantages of the two countries in manufacturing facilities. But our manufacturer of cotton and wool, for example, besides the minimum on coarse cottons, has twenty-five per cent. duty, estimated upon the original cost, with the addition of ten per cent. to that cost—thus making the duty twenty-seven and a half per cent., then the amount of freight. Mr. Hamilton, thirty years ago, estimated it at from fifteen to thirty per cent. As, however, freight has fallen, I will state it at ten per cent. although upon articles whose bulk is large, compared with their value, it may more than double it. Then there are incidental charges of commission, insurance, &c., making the aggregate of advantage to our manufactures from forty to forty-five per cent. If with these extra advantages added to our natural ones he cannot sustain the competition, I must tell him that I cannot go further—I cannot agree to give more for a yard of cloth than forty-five per cent. advance beyond what the foreigner makes it for. Upon what ground does he ask it? Has he skill, capital, and machinery?—he does not need it. Has he capital?—he does not need it; for capital will command the others. If he have not capital, we cannot advance it to him.

Sir, it has been often urged, that all the other branches of industry in the country have been protected; that commerce, navigation, and agriculture, have all received aid from Government; and that justice therefore requires that manufactures should also receive their proportionate share. Let us for a moment investigate this subject. I think, sir, it will result in the proof that manufactures have received more aid from that source than the three other great interests united. I have made an estimate upon this subject, the principles of which I will first explain before I present it. The whole net revenue for the year 1822 was $20,500,000. Of this sum, the duties on wines, molasses, teas, and coffee, and certain miscellaneous articles, not coming into competition with any interest, and not benefiting any, I have deducted—leaving a balance of $15,900,946. I have then taken what seemed to benefit agriculture—viz: duties on spirits, on sugar, deducting drawback; on miscellaneous articles; to this I have added half the amount of discriminating duty on all our tonnage engaged in foreign vessels, and half the estimated profit of all our coasting trade, estimating it at six per cent. upon the whole cost of the tonnage. I have added the extra duty on merchandise in foreign vessels, and the fishing bounties; and the aggregate being $6,166,604, being deducted from the amount of revenue of $15,900,946, leaves $9,734,342 of duties, operating in aid of our manufactures. Gentlemen themselves have said it is no matter for what purpose the duties were laid; the question is, what is their practical effect? I have not included in this estimate the duty on cotton, because it sustains the competition in the foreign market, and therefore derives no aid from duty. But the Committee will perceive that the amount of duties favorable to manufactures, upon this estimate, exceeds the aggregate of those favorable to all the other interests, by $3,567,698—a sum more than three-fourths of what would be the whole amount of duty upon all the cotton exported from the United States, supposing it to be 500,000 bales, and supposing that an equal amount, but for the duty, would be imported—a supposition utterly out of the question. The much talked-of benefit to the tobacco planter, by the duty on snuff and tobacco, rests on the same ground with cotton—it sustains the foreign competition. But let us suppose that some worthy of notice might be imported, then the excess which I have before stated will fully meet every possible calculation as to cotton, tobacco, and snuff; and thus the manufacturing interest receives as much protection as all the others. I have formed the estimate as to our tonnage duty and coasting trade, upon the possibility that, without the aid which they received, foreigners might have come in for one-half. It will at once occur to the Committee, that is much too large a supposition. In our own trade, and particularly our coasting trade, the advantages which our citizens would have, together with that hardy spirit of enterprise which braves every danger, traverses every sea, and encounters every difficulty, would have enabled them always to have monopolized three-fourths of this advantage without the aid of Government.

Sir, there is one fact on this subject, which is decisive of our superiority in the competition. The discriminating duty in favor of American vessels is now abolished by treaties with England and France,* and other foreign nations with which we have most commerce, and yet the document from the Treasury shows us that of $894,739 tons of tonnage which entered our ports during the last year, 775,271 were American, and 119,468 only were foreign. I have not included the duty on molasses in this estimate, amounting to $617,868, amongst the items favorable to agriculture, because I believe that our domestic molasses is almost all consumed as an article of food, and that it is, in a very small degree, if any, the subject of sale. I have, however, included in my estimate two items, which since the late arrangements with foreign nations, ought not to be included; I mean the sum of $523,663, the supposed advantage to our tonnage, by the former discriminating duty, now abolished with all nations with which we have a commerce in any degree considerable, and also the amount of extra duty on foreign merchandise. With these remarks, I submit the statement.

Total net revenue of 1822	- $20,500,000
Deduct duties on articles not aiding manufactures, or other interest, viz:
Wines	- $747,996
Molasses	- 617,868
Teas	- 1,676,250
Coffee	- 714,150
Miscellaneous articles	- 842,790
	$4,599,054
	$15,900,946

Duties favoring agriculture, navigation, &c., viz:

One-half of 744,764 tons, in foreign trade, the discriminating duty	- $523,663
Benefit of coasting trade, one-half at 6 per cent. on cost	- 875,670
Extra duty on merchandise in foreign vessels	- 33,690
Fishing bounties	- 161,400
On spirits	- 2,040,413

* "I find the discriminating duties are abolished, as between the United States and the following countries, viz: The British dominions in Europe, Sweden, the European possessions of the Netherlands, Prussia, Hamburg, Bremen, Lubeck, and the Dukedom of Oldenburg. As it respects France, discriminating duties are abolished on goods imported for transit, or re-exportation, and provision is made in certain events for the progressive abolition of the discriminating duty on imports; and, in the meantime, it is declared, that neither the discriminating duties on imports or tonnage shall exceed a given and very moderate sum."

Sir, I should have been glad to have made a comparison between the relative profits of manufactures and other pursuits, if I could have commanded the data. One of my objections to this bill, however, has been already stated to be, that we cannot procure the necessary information on this subject to arrive at any precise result; yet, there are some facts, which I beg leave to state, as showing the probable profits of manufactures in general, and the certain prosperity of some. The annual Treasury report shows, that in 1823, we imported, of foreign articles, $5,755,109 less than in 1822; and that, in the same year, we exported, of foreign articles, $5,244,267 more than in the preceding year. Adding together these sums, it appears that there was a diminution of consumption of foreign articles in 1823, compared with the preceding year, of about $11,000,000. Now, sir, this additional sum must have been supplied from our own manufactures, more in 1823 than in 1822, unless we could suppose, what is altogether improbable, that, as our population increased, our consumption decreased. Supposing the consumption only to have remained the same, the same conclusion results from this fact. Again: previously to the year 1820, there was actually invested, as appears from the commercial digest, in manufacturing stock, a capital of upwards of $46,000,000; that, since 1820, companies have been incorporated in four of the Northern States only, with an aggregate capital of about $15,000,000, about one-third of all the previous investments. Unless, sir, we suppose the capitalists totally to have lost sight of that sagacity for which they are distinguished, which enables them to see what investment of capital is profitable, this fact affords strong presumptive proof of the increasing prosperity of manufactures. Sir, I am informed, from good authority, that an iron factory, in the State of New York, has, for a series of years past, netted 20 per cent., though it transports its ore 12 miles, is 18 miles from water carriage, and 145 miles from the city of New York. As to this item, let me say, that the ministerial pamphlet, before quoted, states the decrease in price of iron in England to be undoubtedly great, and assigns this strong reason, that the sword is succeeded by the ploughshare. I have further been informed, sir, that there are two manufacturing establishments in Massachusetts, which make a profit of 25 per cent.; that certain capital invested in manufactures is at from 40 to 60 per cent. beyond par; and that, within the last ninety days, mercantile capital has been invested in manufacturing stock at 40 per cent. beyond par. Sir, what is there to compare with this in any other department of national industry? If it be said that these are a few well established manufactories with large capital, what is the import of that argument if it be not this; not that foreign competition is the most serious evil, but that our smaller capitalists call on us to sustain them against the larger ones—against the domestic competition. The irresistible conclusion which follows, is, that the fault is not in the pursuit, but in the pursuer; that there is a want of capital, or skill, or machinery, or economy, or of something, which it is his duty, not ours, to supply.

Mr. Chairman: When we argue upon the impropriety of commencing a system upon the authority of the British example, at a period when the ministers and statesmen have become convinced by experience of its impolicy, we are met with the declaration that whilst this is their theory, they do not carry it into practice. Let us first see the principle now openly avowed to the world by the British ministry, in the pamphlet already quoted. I give it to you in their own words: "Again and again let it be repeated, that they (the ministers) are thoroughly impressed with the truth of the principle, that freedom of trade is alike advantageous to the best interests of the country, and to the solid profit of the merchants, manufacturers, and growers." And, sir, let me inquire, are gentlemen correct when they assume the fact that this theory has not been carried into practice? I answer, no, sir. Within a few years, Great Britain, after successively relaxing the rigor of her double colonial monopoly in her West India islands, has extended the system of free ports to almost all those islands; and the United States are now enabled to import that colonial produce in their own ships, instead of receiving it imported in British ships only. She has admitted us to a direct trade in her ports in the East Indies, so as to excite the clamor of her merchants, that we should rob them of their India as well as China trade; she has, by treaty stipulation, abolished all discrimination between American and British imports and tonnage; and, finally, she has knocked off as many shackles from the monopoly of the East India Company, as, under the circumstances, ministers felt that they could venture upon. The ministers admit that, if the ground were clear before them, a free would be preferable to a restricted market; but they say, that, whether it be called a system of error or abuse, it has grown up under less enlightened times. On account of the capitals that have become fixed, and the interests that are embarked, the question is not what is absolutely best, but what is so, under existing circumstances. Thus, sir, we find, that this theory has, in important respects, been carried into practice; and that the only ground upon which ministers stop short in correcting acknowledged error and abuse, is one beautifully and forcibly expressed in the Philadelphia memorial: That the fetters have sunk so deep they cannot be suddenly removed without tearing away a part of the flesh with them. The British example then, sir, should be to us a beacon, to warn us of the rocks and shoals which lie in the way of this policy. Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to maintain these propositions: that the state of the Treasury does not require an increase of revenue; that if it did, this bill would not effect it; that it is improper in us to exercise a power given for one object, so as to attempt to effect another; that the operation of this bill would be, by legislative coercion, to increase the profits of capital in some parts of the country to the exclusion of others; that it would produce none of the advantages which its friends contend for, but contrary and injurious effects; that manufacturers have a full share of the national protection and prosperity, and that, therefore, we ought not to add to it; that the example of Great Britain, which we are invited to imitate, is fading away in the broad light of experience. If I have succeeded in proving these positions, then, surely, the bill ought not to pass; but if it must pass, if like the meek and patient animal which is annually shorn of its fleece for the use of man, we must suffer, then, whilst the people will submit to the laws passed by the constituted authorities of the country, they will feel that spirit of discontent which arises from a belief that this law is not supported either upon principles of justice or sound policy.

When Mr. B. had concluded, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, March 27.

EDWARD F. TATTNALL, a Representative from the State of Georgia, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of considering the several amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1824."

The first amendment proposed to add $700 to the amount appropriated for "stationery, fuel, and other contingent expenses of Congress." This amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment proposes to reduce the amount appropriated "for surveys of public lands," from $100,000 to $75,000. This amendment was explained and advocated by Mr. McLANE, and was concurred in.

The next amendment increases the sum appropriated "for improving the Capitol square, and painting the railing round the same," from $1,250 to $2,000. Mr. CUSHMAN stated the reasons which led to this increase. The amendment was concurred in.

The Senate proposes to insert in the bill a clause, as follows: "For graduating and levelling the grounds round the President's House, $2,000." Some remarks were made upon this item, by Messrs. MILLER and CUSHMAN; and, at the suggestion of Mr. FORSYTH, who stated that he wished to obtain further information on the subject, it was passed over for the present.

It is also proposed to amend the bill by striking out the sum of $18,000, which was appropriated "for the salaries of the commissioner and arbitrator under the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, and for half the salary of their secretary, and half the contingent expenses of the commission," and insert $4,500 in lieu thereof, for that purpose. The Senate further propose to amend this clause, by inserting the word "agent," after the word "arbitrator." By this amendment, it will be perceived that provision is to be made for a public agent, in connexion with this commission.

Mr. McLANE moved to strike out the word "agent" from this amendment; and, consequently, to reduce the proposed appropriation from $4,500 to $2,500. He advocated the amendment he proposed at considerable length, and went into an examination of the terms of the treaty under which the commission was instituted, and the nature of the claims exhibited before it, to show that this agent was neither necessary to the interest of the Government, nor of the individual claimants.

Mr. WARFIELD was opposed to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Delaware. He alluded to the various instances, from the establishment of the Government down to the present day, in which similar powers, in the appointment of agents, though not expressly provided for by the terms of the treaties, had been exercised by the Executive, when such agents were necessary to the protection of the public interest, or of the rights of the citizens. He adverted to the remarks of an honorable member of the Senate on this subject, which were published in the paper of this morning. He considered this as one of the cases in which an agent was peculiarly necessary, and thought his continuance required to promote the great interests of these claimants.

Mr. FARRELLY spoke in opposition to Mr. McLANE's amendment. He, too, considered this agency as highly necessary. There were no data before the House to show that the services of the agent had not been very faithfully performed. The act by which the commission was established, was a national act, and it ought to be consummated by the nation. The treaty provides that the Government shall establish the average value of the slaves; and, if the agent is taken away, how, Mr. F. asked, could this be done? For this purpose the agent had been highly necessary; and the evidence, on that point, was not yet concluded. And, even if it were, he thought the duty of the Government to the individuals, whose property was involved in this public act, required the continuance of this agency. From the practice of this Government, in relation to other commissions, he considered it bound to provide an agent in this case.

Mr. BRADLEY considered the ascertainment of the average value of the slaves, for which compensation was to be made, as a most important part of the business of the commission. It was a component part of the treaty, and could only be carried into effect by the appointment of an agent. The evidence, on this point, was to be furnished under the authority of the President; and, as it was not to be supposed that he was to appear before the commissioners in person, it must be considered as a specific authority for the appointment of this agent. This was unlike other treaties, by which commissioners were appointed, as there was a previous question to be settled, as to average value.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

MARCH, 1824.

Mr. McLANE explained, in reference to the remarks he had previously made. The average value was to be ascertained, by taking the value of slaves throughout the United States—not by an itinerant agent to be sent throughout the country, but by correspondence with different parts of the country, by the Department of State, or an agent appointed for the purpose. The ascertainment of this average was the basis of the business of the commission, and ought to have been obtained previous to the meeting of the Commissioners. If it had been obtained, the agent was no longer necessary; if it had not been collected, he thought the agent who had not done it ought not again to be provided for. The article of the treaty does not mention the term agent—the business is put upon the President. The Commissioners would not have received this agent—he was not authorized by the treaty. This agent either had, or had not, done his duty; in either case he was no longer necessary. Mr. McL. believed that no agent, of a similar character, had ever been appointed. The President had a right to appoint public diplomatic agents in the recess of the Legislature; these have been appointed—they are a part of the diplomatic corps—but there was no instance, in the history of the Government, of the prospective appointment of a salary officer by the President. The amendment from the Senate constitutes him an agent for Government. Is he necessary for the interest of the Government? He is entirely irresponsible to the individual claimants. Mr. McL. said he was not willing to appoint an agent for the individual claimants; and he did not believe that the public interest required an agent. He thought the Government ought not to connect itself with the commission, by the appointment of an agent.

Mr. BASSETT was opposed to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means on this subject. He accorded in the principle, that the President had no right to appoint a salary officer, not provided for by law. But he might certainly appoint a temporary agent, for a certain purpose. He went on to show that the appointment of this agent was necessary. He contended that the agency was created by law, as having been computed in the appropriation made for the support of this commission at the last session. He thought the Government was bound to take an interest in assisting these claimants, and forwarding their business before the Commissioners. The agency has been established for their benefit, and it ought to receive the support of the Government. Mr. B. said, there were many claimants who were not able to employ private agents. He instanced two cases of poor persons in his own neighborhood, who were in this situation. Upon these individual claims the Commissioners were appointed to act. And it was the duty of the Government to provide an agent, for the benefit of those poor claimants, who were not able themselves to employ one.

Mr. RIVES contended for the necessity of an agent in this case. The Government, he said, had assumed the duty of ascertaining the average value of slaves. The testimony to this point was to be exhibited, not by the President in person, but under his authority. And it was proper for him to appoint some person competent to conduct the business. The Government had come in, and agreed to take upon itself to establish the average value of the slaves. The individual claimants were not required to hunt the country over to procure information upon this point. It was peculiarly incumbent on the Government, under these circumstances, to take the necessary measures to procure this information. The President had not only the right to appoint the agent in question, but it was emphatically proper that he should do it, in order to afford the promised facilities to the claimants.

It had been said by some, that this information might have been obtained through the ordinary organs of the Government—through the Secretary of State or the Attorney General. Mr. R. thought it would have been a very niggardly policy to have imposed this duty upon either of those officers. There was certainly no obligation upon them to perform it. It had no connexion with the duties of their offices. The House would not expect the President to require of them the performance of a duty which they might very properly reject. If, then, the President was compelled to appoint some person, as the duties could be performed in no other way, Mr. R. said, he would like to know why the appointment was improperly made. If the appointment of this officer belongs to another department of the Government, and charges of non-performance of duty are alleged against the person appointed, the burden of proof lies upon those who prefer the charge. Mr. R. asked, what proof there was that this agent had not been vigilant in the performance of his duties? He called the attention of the Committee to the difficulties attending the ascertainment of the average value of the slaves. The value at the time of the exchange of the ratification of the treaty was to be taken. This could be done only by getting at the actual sales made at or about that time. It was to be done, not in regard to one place only, but to various places. The price of slaves varies much, according to the sex, age, and other circumstances. All these points are to be ascertained before the average value can be fixed. It was not at all extraordinary, whatever might have been the industry of the agent, that all the information had not yet been collected. Whatever might have been the want of diligence heretofore, Mr. R. thought it would be better now to continue the appointment. There was no limit, he said, to this commission. The board might continue the business as long as it pleased; and might sit, like an incubus, upon us, until its object was accomplished. The preliminary object, in the proceedings in regard to the commission, was the ascertainment of the average value of slaves; it was well known that this point was not yet decided—the materials for its decision were not yet collected. The session of the Commissioners must, necessarily, be protracted, until this is done. Under this view of the subject, he considered the agent as being absolutely necessary—the greater the facilities furnished, the sooner the duties of the Commissioners would be discharged. He thought, therefore, that there could be no sort of doubt of the propriety of appointing this agent, on the part of the Government.

The Tariff Bill.

But the gentleman from Delaware contends that, if this agent is not necessary on the part of the Government, it is improper to appoint him in behalf of the individual claimants; and he says that no agent has ever been appointed in a similar case. Mr. R. thought there was an essential distinction between this and other commissions. These claims arise entirely from the acts of the Government. The whole difficulty had arisen from the defective manner in which the article in the Treaty of Ghent had been drawn. In that treaty it was stipulated, that all places captured during the war should be restored, without carrying away any property. It was contended, by the British Government, that they were not bound by that provision in the treaty, to make remuneration for slaves taken away. This difficulty grew out of the manner in which that negotiation was made. The subject was referred to the decision of the Emperor of Russia. He has given his decision on the subject; in which he provides for the organization of a tribunal to make compensation for these slaves. This Government is bound to pay its part of the expenses of this tribunal, and to afford facilities to the claimants in establishing their claims. All their difficulty had arisen from acts of the Government—from the defective manner of conducting this business in the Treaty of Ghent. He meant not to impute any neglect to those who negotiated that treaty; but he did believe it to be the peculiar duty of the Government, under these circumstances, to assist the individuals concerned in these claims. We are told that it had never been contemplated to afford assistance to these private claimants, in this case. Mr. R. said, he differed from the gentleman from Delaware in that opinion. He knew that the agent had, since his appointment, frequently communicated with the private claimants. He knew that great sensibility and apprehension had been expressed by the claimants, at the prospect that this agent would be taken away from the commission. There were a great many nice points, he said, which were growing out of this subject. The award of the Emperor of Russia had made the matter but little plainer than it was before.

Mr. R. said, he did not feel it necessary to say any thing as to the manner in which this agent had discharged his duty. He very well knew the gentleman who had been appointed; and he did not believe there was any man more competent to the business. This was the very period in the progress of these claims, at which the services of the agent were most wanted; and, if he were taken away, the claimants would be involved in great difficulty.

Mr. WICKLIFFE thought that a provision for a salary officer, whose duties were not defined, who was irresponsible, and not appointed by law, ought not to be introduced into this bill. He believed the appointment of this officer was not authorized or contemplated by the appropriation bill of the last year. We have been told that this officer was appointed by the Secretary of State. Whether this agent should be again appointed, was for the House now to determine. It had been said to be beneath the dignity of the Secretary of State to do this duty. Mr. W. did not consider any of the duties of his office as derogating from the dignity of the Secretary. The description of evidence, in relation to the average value of the slaves, might have been obtained in sixty days, by application to the different marshals. We have given a year's salary to an agent for this purpose, and the fact is not yet ascertained. If the Board of Commissioners is limited by no other provision, the power is in the hands of the House, to make or not to make the appropriation for its support. He considered the appropriation for this agent as one which now ought to be stopped. The argument, that the Government had made this commission for the benefit of the private claimants, and ought to extend further assistance, was not a sound one. Because we have done one good turn, we must consequently do another. We pay the board, and so we must pay the agent. We pay the judges of our courts—but are we bound to pay witnesses and counsel for the parties? The opinion of honest, intelligent men, is the only evidence to be obtained of the average value of slaves; and that is to be laid before the Commissioners. This might have been done without the aid of this agent. It has not been the practice of this Government to prosecute private claims. The claimants will, no doubt, be glad to have their claims conducted at the expense of Government. He felt it his duty to oppose the appropriation for a salary for this agent.

Mr. FULLER thought it manifest that a service of this kind was requisite, and that the appropriation was necessary. If it was contemplated that the Attorney General or the Secretary of State should perform this service, why was the amount appropriated the last year? He considered that the President had a right to appoint one or twenty agents for this purpose, if it had been necessary. The fulfilment of the treaty was in the province of the Department of State; and it is possible that the duty of that appointment might have devolved on the Secretary of State. If there has been any thing improper let us make an investigation on the subject. There is no evidence of unnecessary delay, or any impropriety in this business. He understood it was very difficult to ascertain the average value of slaves at that time. This agent had been under the necessity of resorting to various means of information—the business is not yet concluded. Individuals have been led to rely on the good faith of the Government, and now they are to be cut off in the middle of the subject. It would be an act of gross injustice to take away this assistance.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, thought it was rather singular the House should be engaged in the discussion of this matter, involving a sum of $2,000, when it is well known to be the opinion of the Secretary of State, and of Mr. Cheves, the Commissioner, that this agent was very necessary. Mr. T. proceeded to state the reasons which induced him to believe that his services were very valuable towards effecting the objects of the commission, and that those services were now even more requisite than they had been during the past year. He thought the true dignity of the Government was in protecting the rights and the interests of its citizens. He denied that this duty could have been properly performed by the Secretary of State or the Attorney General, consistently with the due performance of their other duties. He thought the individual who held this office was more competent, from his acquaintance with the nature of the duties to be performed, than any other person.

Mr. STORRS said, that two reasons had been given in favor of the appropriation for this agent—the protection of the public interest, and those of the private claimants. But the Secretary of State did not, in 1823, when the first appropriation was to be made, mention the necessity of this agent in relation to the public interest. He merely states that such a person would be desirable to forward the views of the private claimants. Mr. S. thought that, as the duty of this agent was not of a public nature, that the office ought to stop. It was easier to get a man into office than to get him out; and when his services are no longer necessary to the public, his office ought to be discontinued. This agent is not known as a public officer—his name is not to be found in the Register. The reason given for his appointment, in reference to the average value of slaves, had not been discovered until it came up in this House. Six months would have been ample time to have collected evidence on this subject, from all parts of the country.

Mr. S. went on to state his objections to this appropriation. He produced some instances to prove that discretion ought not to be given to the Executive Department to create offices. If there were a necessity for the officer, the office ought to be established by law. As he was only appointed for the benefit of the private claimants, and as they were no more entitled to such a favor than any other claimants, Mr. S. thought Congress ought not to authorize his appointment.

Mr. FORSYTH made some explanation in reference to a remark of Mr. STORRS, relative to the Florida treaty.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, replied to some of the remarks which had been made against his amendment. He felt perfectly convinced of the uselessness of this appointment, and, for that reason, considered himself bound to resist it. He had intended no imputation against the Secretary of State. He felt a high respect for him. But if, as the gentleman from Massachusetts had stated, we were bound to take estimates on this subject, it should be recollected that $18,000 instead of $4,500, would have been appropriated for the support of this commission. It was the duty of the President, through his Secretary of State, to collect the information for which the agent was appointed. Mr. McL. contended that the Government was not bound to sustain these claims, and that it ought not to commit itself in regard to them. It was the duty of the Government to make the best provision it could for the citizens, at the conclusion of war. This had been done in reference to these claimants, and the Government had done its duty towards them. He wanted no further evidence of the want of necessity for this agent, than, that a year should have been consumed in doing what might have been done in six months. He was rather disposed to argue that the business had already been completed, the duties of the agent having commenced a year ago, while that of the commissioners had begun but six months since. It had been stated by the gentleman from Virginia that the business was not yet done. If so, it was not the fault of the commissioners, but of the agent. He meant no insinuations against the individual in this case, but he spoke of the fact. It was quite time the office was abolished. If the business had been left with the Secretary of State, with his known vigilance, he would have completed these duties long since.

Mr. BUCKNER differed from his honorable colleague (Mr. WICKLIFFE) on this subject. He believed the ground that it was not the duty of Government to provide an agent in this case, because only a portion of its citizens, and not the whole, were concerned, was not correct. He thought there was force in the remark, that these losses were sustained in consequence of an act of the Government. The Government has acted from honorable motives in this case. It had an eye to the rights and interests of its citizens. He proceeded to remark upon the obligations of a Government to see that remuneration was made for the losses sustained by its citizens in time of war. He was not possessed of sufficient information as to the propriety of this appropriation. If the agent had failed in his duty, it was not a good reason, as he thought, for refusing the appropriation. The sum was a mere pittance, hardly worth the interest that had been displayed in regard to it.

Mr. POINSETT said that he believed the duties of this agency had been very arduous, and had been performed in a very satisfactory manner. He thought the business of the commission would suffer materially by withholding the appropriation for the agent.

Mr. FORSYTH replied to the remark of Mr. POINSETT. He denied the existence of the difficulties which had been supposed to exist in connexion with this agency. He said the whole information required of the agent ought to have been prepared at the first meeting of the commissioners in August last. Every particle of the information might have been obtained by circular letters, written by one of the clerks of the Department. The Government had no other interest in the business than to see that justice was done to these claimants. It had placed them in the way to obtain that justice. Its duty had been performed towards them. In regard to the manner in which the appointment was made, it had never been submitted to Congress until the present session.

Mr. McLANE explained. He stated that the appropriation for this commission had been made the last year, in pursuance of a statement of the amount required, as received from the Department of State. In that statement was included the salary of this agent.

Mr. HAMILTON said that this agent had been engaged in an extensive correspondence on this subject—he had it not in his power to compel persons to answer these letters, and unavoidable delays had taken place. He said, if the subject was not fairly before the House at the last session, it was the fault of the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. He said the agent did not deserve the insinuations that had been thrown out against him. Mr. H. had himself had reason to know that the most important information had been furnished to the claimants by the gentleman who held the office.

Mr. McLANE replied. He had not intended to throw out any censure against the individual who filled this office, nor against any department of the Government, for his appointment. If there had been a necessity of the agency once, it did not follow that it should now be continued. He had said, and he well knew, that other private agents had been appointed by the individual claimants; and he would not consent to the appointment of an agent totally irresponsible to the claimants, and at liberty to do their business or not, as he chose.

Mr. SANDFORD was in favor of the appropriation—he thought that appropriations had been made for much more useless purposes, and that it was the duty of Government to provide assistance for these claimants, and save those who were very poor from the necessity of employing counsel.

Mr. FORSYTH explained in reference to his previous remarks. As a member of Congress, he felt that he must vote against the appropriation, as not being required by the public interest, or the interests of the individual claimants.

Mr. HAMILTON made a few remarks in confirmation of what he had previously said.

The question was then taken on Mr. McLANE's motion to amend the amendment of the Senate, by striking out the provision for the agent, and carried in the affirmative—97 to 52. The amendment of the Senate, as amended, was then agreed to.

The Committee then rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

The House adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, March 29.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Maryland, presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the sixth Congressional district of the State of Maryland, praying for the aid of the General Government in the erection of bridges, at places therein mentioned, for the purpose of facilitating the transportation of the United States' mails.—Referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

18th CON. 1st SESS.—62

Mr. CAMBRELENG presented a petition of Jacob Schieffelin and Son, of New York, merchants, setting forth that, in 1809, a considerable amount of property belonging to them, lying in a port in Holland, was seized by French authorities, transported to the port of Antwerp, and there sold, without condemnation, and the proceeds paid into the Treasury of France, and praying the interposition of Congress in such manner as to procure them redress for their wrongs.

Mr. POINSETT presented a memorial of Anthony Le Courtois, of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, setting forth that, in 1811, while pursuing a lawful voyage from the United States to Russia, his vessel was captured by a French private armed cruiser, and, with her cargo, was condemned, by which the petitioner has been reduced to poverty and distress; and praying such relief in the premises as, in the wisdom of Congress, may seem meet and proper.

Ordered, That the said petition and memorial be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. HOLCOMBE presented a memorial of John M. Gamble, a captain of marines in the Navy of the United States, stating that, while attached to the frigate Essex, commanded by Captain Porter, cruising in the Pacific Ocean, in the late war with Great Britain, he was placed in command of a vessel captured and manned by the Essex; in which vessel he afterwards fell in with, and captured, a British ship of very superior force, and praying to be allowed prize money for himself and crew, for said capture.—Referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CALL presented a petition of divers inhabitants of the city of St. Augustine, and of other parts of the eastern section of the Territory of Florida, praying permission to cut a canal through public lands, lying between said city and the river St. John's; which petition was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. FULLER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Barbara Paulas; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, of Maryland, the Committee on Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of erecting a lighthouse on Poole's Island, in the Chesapeake Bay.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the amendments of the Senate, to the appropriation bill "for the support of Government for the year 1824."

The question being then on the amendment striking out of the bill the following clause: "And provided, also, that no person, receiving an annual salary from the Government of the United States, shall receive any thing in addition thereto for any official services whatever, by way of perquisites, or extra compensation, except for fees of office which may be established by law;"

Mr. COCKE stated a number of facts in relation to the compensation received by Governors of Territories, for extra services. He quoted the law appointing the salaries of those officers, and contended that they had received, in some cases, double what the law warranted, for the performance of duties which properly pertained to their functions as Governors. He acknowledged that he had been under a wrong impression with respect to the Navy Commissioners, who, he was happy to state, received nothing beyond what the laws of their country prescribe. He made some remarks on the compensation received by the Surveyor General, on which he entirely differed from the opinion given by the Secretary of War, and he read a report of the former committee of the House in confirmation of his views.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, explained what he apprehended to be the state of the law on the subject of Territorial Governors. He gave a statement of the compensation allowed to the Superintendents of Indian Affairs, from the first organization of the Government, and the changes which had taken place to the present time, and he contended that the gentleman from Tennessee was mistaken in supposing that the emoluments received by the Governors of Territories were not warranted by legal provisions. He reprobated the idea of attempting to regulate the Indian Department by a clause in an appropriation bill; and contended that the clause, if restored, would operate with great injustice, especially on the Governor of Michigan, whose disbursements, in relation to Indian affairs, were very great, and who, if deprived of the compensation now allowed to him, would be placed on a lower and worse footing than a common Indian agent. He dwelt on the improvements which had been introduced into the Indian Department during the present Administration, for which he contended that the present Secretary of War was entitled to the respect and gratitude of the House, and of the country.

Mr. McLANE spoke in reply. He discussed at length the laws in relation both to the Territorial Governors and the Surgeon General, which he stated as fully warranting what they received. If any improvement was to be introduced into the Indian Department, the present bill was not the proper one to effect it, and the discussion was only calculated to embarrass it.

Mr. WARFIELD quoted several laws in relation to the appointment of Indian agents, and opposed the clause which the Senate had stricken out, as being of too broad and unguarded a character. Possibly abuses did exist, and the laws in relation to Indian affairs would certainly be better for revision; but this must be done as a separate matter, and with deliberation. He hoped the discussion of that subject would be now relinquished.

Mr. CALL, of Florida, stated the many valuable services performed by the Governor of that Territory, and argued in favor of the equity of some farther compensation than his mere salary as Governor. He remarked at large on the case of the Surgeon General, stated the value of his services, his necessity of obedience, as attached to the Army, even in the performance of the longest and most expensive journeys. He was in constant activity, and his salary alone might be exhausted by a single journey; talent and services were nowhere so poorly rewarded as in the medical staff of our Army; and if we persisted in this policy, talent would retire from the service of the Government, &c.

Mr. COCKE spoke in reply; and insisted on the grounds he had formerly taken. The provision was not aimed at any one in particular—its language and its aim were general. He stated some further facts as to the compensations received.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, explained some of his former statements, and added facts in reply.

Mr. WICKLIFFE recalled the remembrance of the gentleman from Tennessee to what had passed in this House when the clause now stricken out by the Senate had been proposed by that gentleman, when he stated that it was not meant to include Territorial Governors. If the gentleman disapproved of the amounts now received, he wished that gentleman, as head, (to use a phrase of his own) of the "Indian Committee," would introduce a provision to fix and regulate their compensation.

Mr. COCKE explained.

Mr. COOK observed that the present case showed the impropriety of receiving statements from the departments which did not come before the House in an official form. The gentleman from Tennessee had produced some statements, but they were incomplete. Mr. C. had had personal opportunity of observing the performance of the duties by the Governor of a Territory, and he knew them to be difficult and perplexing. He referred to censures formerly cast on Governor Cass, the investigation which had ensued, and the complete vindication which was the result.

Mr. COCKE replied in a few words, and Mr. COOK rejoined.

Mr. RICH advocated, in a few observations, the propriety of the principle of the amendment, but thought it best not to insist on its insertion in the present bill.

The question was then taken on non-concurring with the Senate in their amendment, and decided in the negative—ayes 42, noes 90.

So the House concurred in the Senate's amendment, and refused to restore this clause to the bill.

The following amendment of the Senate being under consideration, viz: "for graduating and improving the ground near the President's house, within the enclosure, $2,000,"

Mr. FORSYTH opposed it in a few words.

Mr. CUSHMAN, of Maine, said, that it was not to be expected that the Committee on the Public Buildings could carry back their researches to the foundation of this city, in order to ascertain whether every dollar and cent appropriated had been laid out to the best advantage. The task was too arduous for any one committee to perform during a session of Congress. He questioned whether even the Committee on Foreign Relations, with all their commendable industry, and unwearied assiduity and talent, were able to perform so Herculean a labor.

There was a Committee on the Expenditures of the Public Buildings. It was the province of this committee to inquire whether the sums appropriated had been judiciously expended; to collect all useful information, and report it. With respect to the amendment, he could repeat what he had before said, that it was not of his seeking. The Senate introduced it of their own will and pleasure. They acted, he presumed, not without reason or due consideration. They took a survey of the whole ground. That honorable body had a Constitutional right to make the amendment. Decent respect was due to their opinions. Mr. C. called on gentlemen to view the public grounds, and say whether they did not need the improvements which the appropriation proposes to effect. The grounds attached to the President's house, in particular, were in a rough, uncouth, unsightly, chaotic state, and exhibited an appearance not very honorable to the taste and character of this nation. Much labor was required to level or graduate, to smooth and embellish them. He conceived that gentlemen would feel a pride and pleasure in giving to this little world of the nation's creation, proportion and comeliness. And what more noble displays could they make of their legislative wisdom and energy, than to give to that which is without form, and void, beauty, order, and harmony? It was not, he knew, in the power of this House to create all things out of nothing; but it would be a commendable effort, from chaos to form a regular system.

Mr. C. deemed it decorous, before he sat down, to reply to the worthy member from Tennessee, (Mr. SANDFORD,) who, on a former occasion, so pathetically appealed to the sympathies of this Committee. Whenever that honorable gentleman, said Mr. C., lifts up his voice, I always listen with pleasure, because I consider the worthy member a patriot indeed, in whom there is no guile. That gentleman seemed to consider it strange, and even a "reproach to this House," that, while we were voting liberal sums to improve our grounds and pave our foot-walks, a mere pittance should be refused to pay an advocate to plead the cause of the widow and the fatherless, and him who had no helper. For my part, said Mr. CUSHMAN, if this were a reproach, I had no share in it; I did not vote, neither do I believe I shall vote, against the appropriation. For, whatever reluctance he, Mr. C., might feel in considering human flesh and blood in the light of property, compensation was stipulated to the losers of this species by treaty; and he conceived the honor and faith of the nation to be pledged to the citizens to carry all its provisions strictly into effect. And, if it were necessary for the purpose to employ an attorney, or agent, or minister of subordinate grade, envoy extraordinary, or even an ambassador, he was willing to vote a salary. There is, said Mr. C., a wide difference in the two cases. The sums which we vote even to our useful officers not unfrequently perish in using, and the effect is unseen. Whereas, our grants to improve and embellish the city remain for a long time, to delight the eye, and to subserve purposes of utility and convenience.

While, therefore, we are sparing of our funds in the one case, in the other we may, with great propriety, be bountiful. This city, said he, is the rallying point of the nation; the centre of attraction—a bond of political union. He was ambitious to give it all the improvements and decorations becoming our Confederate Republic. And such was his zeal and enthusiasm, that he would cheerfully vote to diminish his own compensation to aid these desirable attainments.

Mr. FORSYTH replied, and stated his objection to be founded on the existence of an unexpended balance, which might be applied to the object, without any new specified grant.

Mr. WHIPPLE supported the amendment as necessary and proper. He described the state of the grounds referred to, &c.

The question being taken on non-concurring in the amendment of the Senate, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 89, noes 55.

So the Senate's amendment was concurred in by the House.

Mr. HAMILTON offered the following as an amendment to the fifth amendment of the Senate:

"And the sum of one thousand dollars for compensation to the agent or attorney, employed by the Secretary of State to arrange the testimony to be adduced to the Commission, under the Convention of St. Petersburg, for the purpose of ascertaining the average value of slaves taken by Great Britain at the close of the late war; which appointment is to continue until the average value has been fixed, and no longer; and the said compensation is not to extend beyond the time the said agent is actually employed, and, for the time he is so employed, his said compensation to be estimated at the rate of two thousand dollars per annum."

The Chairman pronounced the motion to be out of order.

Mr. ARCHER, to afford the gentleman an opportunity to have his amendment discussed, moved a reconsideration of the vote of this House on the Senate's fifth amendment of the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON explained the amendment he wished to introduce, and insisted on the value and necessity of the services of the agent; and the guards contained in the amendment against his receiving compensation without performing the service.

The question being put on reconsidering the vote of Saturday, it was decided in the negative.

The Committee then rose, and reported their concurrence in the first, second, third, sixth, seventh, and eighth amendments; their disagreement to the fourth; and reported the fifth with an amendment, as already severally stated.

The question being put in the House on concurring in the decisions of the Committee of the Whole, it was carried.

Mr. HAMILTON offered the same amendment he had moved in Committee of the Whole, modifying it so as to strike out the last sentence of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, objected to the amendment as still more objectionable than that from the Senate, in which the House had refused to concur.

Mr. HAMILTON further modified his amendment, (at the suggestion of Mr. RICH,) by striking out

"Secretary of State," and inserting "President of the United States."

Mr. FORSYTH opposed the amendment on the grounds taken in the former debate on this subject.

Mr. FOOT advocated it in a few words, and Mr. McLANE added a correction in point of fact; when the question was taken by yeas and nays, on agreeing to the amendment—and stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. P. P. Barbour, Bassett, Bradley, Buchanan, Buckner, Burleigh, Cassedy, Crafts, Crowninshield, Cushman, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Farrelly, Foot of Connecticut, Fuller, Garnett, Gist, Govan, Gurley, Hamilton, Hayward, Hemphill, Holcombe, Jennings, Johnson of Virginia, J. So the amendment of Mr. HAMILTON was rejected.

The bill was then ordered to be returned to the Senate, with a message, announcing the decision on the amendment.

The engrossed bill to repeal an act entitled "An act for the relief of John B. Hogan," was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

And then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 30.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to which was referred, on the 12th of January, 1824, a memorial of the Common Council of Alexandria, reported a bill further to amend the charter of the said town of Alexandria; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. K., from the same committee, to which was referred, on the 12th of January, 1824 a memorial of the corporation of the city of Washington, reported a bill supplementary to the act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, passed on the 15th of May, 1820; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. K., from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the establishment of a turnpike company in the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia,'" reported the same with amendments; which were read, and agreed to by the House, and the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was committed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act extending the term of pensions, granted to persons disabled, and to the widows and orphans of those who have been slain, or who have died in consequence of wounds or casualties received while in the line of their duty, on board the private armed ships of the United States during the war," reported the same with amendments; which were read, and the amendments ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the same committee, to whom was referred a message from the President of the United States upon the subject, reported a bill to re-organize and fix the Naval Establishment of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, viz: 1st. An act for the relief of Charles Gwynn, of Baltimore; 2d. An act to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Benjamin Lincoln, and others; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said bills were read twice, and committed; the first to the Committee of Claims; the second to the Committee on the Judiciary.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Barbara Paulas," was read the third time, and passed.

Three Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which were read, and are as follows:

FIRST.

Mr. CLAY took the floor, about eleven o'clock, in reply to the speech of Mr. BARBOUR delivered on Friday, and in support of the general principles of the tariff bill. Mr. C. had not concluded, when at half-past three o'clock, he gave way to a motion for the Committee to rise; and the Committee rose.

WEDNESDAY, March 31.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, from the committee to which was referred a Message from the President of the United States, communicating a report of engineers appointed to examine and survey the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, made a detailed report, accompanied by a bill appropriating money to assist the States of Kentucky and Ohio to open a canal around the falls of the river Ohio, at Louisville, in Kentucky; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill to improve the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act extending the term of pensions granted to persons disabled, and to the widows and orphans of those who have been slain, or who have died in consequence of wounds or casualties received while in the line of their duty on board the private armed ships of the United States during the late war," was read the third time, and passed with amendments.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the bill to amend the several acts laying duties on imports, Mr. CONDUCT in the Chair.

Mr. CLAY concluded his remarks on the general principles of the tariff, which are given entire, as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) has embraced the occasion produced by the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, to strike out the minimum price in the bill, on cotton fabrics, to express his sentiments at large on the policy of the pending measure; and it is scarcely necessary for me to say, that he has evinced his usual good temper, ability, and decorum. The parts of the bill are so intermingled and interwoven together, that there can be no doubt of the fitness of this occasion to exhibit its merits or its defects. It is my intention, with the permission of the Committee, to avail myself also of this opportunity, to present to its consideration those general views, as they appear to me, of the true policy of this country, which imperiously demand the passage of this bill. I am deeply sensible, Mr. Chairman, of the high responsibility of my present situation. But that responsibility inspires me with no other apprehension than that I shall be unable to fulfil my duty; with no other solicitude than that I may, at least, in some small degree, contribute to recall my country from the pursuit of a fatal policy, which appears to me inevitably to lead to its impoverishment and ruin. I do feel most awfully this responsibility; and, if it were allowable for us, at the present day, to imitate ancient examples, I would invoke the aid of the Most High. I would anxiously and fervently implore His divine assistance; that He would be graciously pleased to shower on my country His richest blessings; and that He would sustain, on this interesting occasion, the humble individual who stands before Him, and lend him the power, moral and physical, to perform the solemn duties which now belong to his public station.

Two classes of politicians divide the people of the United States. According to the system of one, the produce of foreign industry should be subjected to no other impost than such as may be necessary to provide a public revenue; and the produce of American industry should be left to sustain itself, if it can, with no other than that incidental protection, in its competition, at home as well as abroad, with rival foreign articles. According to the system of the other class, whilst they agree that the imposts should be mainly, and may, under any modifications, be safely relied on as a fit and convenient source of public revenue, they would so adjust and arrange the duties on foreign fabrics as to afford a gradual but adequate protection to American industry, and lessen our dependence on foreign nations, by securing a certain, and, ultimately, a cheaper and better supply of our own wants from our own abundant resources. Both classes are equally sincere in their respective opinions, equally honest, equally patriotic, and desirous of advancing the prosperity of the country. In the discussion and consideration of these opposite opinions, for the purpose of ascertaining which has the support of truth and reason, we should, therefore, exercise every indulgence, and the greatest spirit of mutual moderation and forbearance. And, in our deliberations on this great question, we should look fearlessly and truly at the actual condition of the country, retrace the causes which have brought us into it, and snatch, if possible, a view of the future. We should, above all, consult experience—the experience of other nations as well as our own, as our truest and most unerring guide.

In casting our eyes around us, the most prominent circumstance which fixes our attention, and challenges our deepest regret, is, the general distress which pervades the whole country. It is forced upon us by numerous facts of the most incontestable character. It is indicated by the diminished exports of native produce; by the depressed and reduced state of our foreign navigation; by our diminished commerce; by successive unthreshed crops of grain, perishing in our barns and barn-yards for the want of a market; by the alarming diminution of the circulation medium; by the numerous bankruptcies, not limited to the trading classes, but extending to all orders of society; by an universal complaint of the want of employment, and a consequent reduction of the wages of labor; by the ravenous pursuit after public situations, not for the sake of their honors, and the performance of their public duties, but as a means of private subsistence; by the reluctant resort to the perilous use of paper money; by the intervention of legislation in the delicate relation between debtor and creditor; and, above all, by the low and depressed state of the value of almost every description of the whole mass of the property of the nation, which has, on an average, sunk not less than about fifty per cent. within a few years. This distress pervades every part of the Union, every class of society; all feel it, though it may be felt, at different places, in different degrees. It is like the atmosphere which surrounds us—all must inhale it, and none can escape it. In some places, it has burst upon our people without a single mitigating circumstance to temper its severity. In others, more fortunate, slight alleviations have been experienced, in the expenditure of the public revenue, and in other favoring causes. A few years ago, the planting interest consoled itself with its happy exemption; but it has now reached this interest also, which experiences, though with less severity, the general suffering. It is most painful to me to attempt to sketch or to dwell on the gloom of this picture. But I have exaggerated nothing. Perfect fidelity to the original would have authorized me to have thrown on deeper and darker hues. And it is the duty of the statesman, no less than that of the physician, to survey, with a penetrating, steady, and undismayed eye, the actual condition of the subject on which he would operate; to probe to the bottom the diseases of the body politic, if he would apply efficacious remedies. We have not, thank God, suffered in any great degree for food. But distress, resulting from the absence of a supply of the mere physical wants of our nature, is not the only, nor, perhaps, the keenest distress, to which we may be exposed. Moral and pecuniary suffering is, if possible, more poignant. It plunges its victim into hopeless despair. It poisons, it paralyzes, the spring and source of all useful exertion. Its unsparing action is collateral as well as direct. It falls with inexorable force, at the same time, upon the wretched family of embarrassment and insolvency, and upon its head. They are a faithful mirror, reflecting back upon him, at once, his own frightful image, and that, no less appalling, of the dearest objects of his affection. What is the cause of this wide-spreading distress, of this deep depression, which we behold stamped on the public countenance? We are the same people. We have the same country. We cannot arraign the bounty of Providence. The showers still fall in the same grateful abundance. The sun still casts his genial and vivifying influence upon the land; and the land, fertile and diversified in its soils as ever, yields to the industrious cultivator, in boundless profusion, its accustomed fruits, its richest treasures. Our vigor is unimpaired. Our industry has not relaxed. If ever the accusation of wasteful extravagance could be made against our people, it cannot now be justly preferred. They, on the contrary, for the few last years at least, have been practising the most rigid economy. The causes, then, of our present affliction, whatever they may be, are human causes, and human causes not chargeable upon the people, in their private and individual relations.

What, again I would ask, is the cause of the unhappy condition of our country, which I have faintly depicted? It is to be found in the fact that, during almost the whole existence of this Government, we have shaped our industry, our navigation, and our commerce, in reference to an extraordinary war in Europe, and to foreign markets, which no longer exist; in the fact that we have depended too much upon foreign sources of supply, and excited too little the native; in the fact that, whilst we have cultivated, with assiduous care, our foreign resources, we have suffered those at home to wither, in a state of neglect and abandonment. The consequence of the termination of the war of Europe has been the resumption of European commerce, European navigation, and the extension of European agriculture and European industry, in all its branches. Europe, therefore, has no longer occasion to any thing like the same extent as that which she had during her wars, for American commerce, American navigation, the produce of American industry. Europe in commotion, and convulsed throughout all her members, is to America no longer the same Europe as she is now, tranquil, and watching with the most vigilant attention all her own peculiar interests, without regard to the operation of her policy upon us. The effect of this altered state of Europe upon us has been to circumscribe the employment of our marine, and greatly to reduce the value of the produce of our territorial labor. The further effect of this twofold reduction has been to decrease the value of all property, whether on the land or on the ocean, and which I suppose to be about fifty per cent. And the still further effect has been to diminish the amount of our circulating medium, in a proportion not less by its transmission abroad, or its withdrawal by the banking institutions, from a necessity which they could not control. The quantity of money, in whatever form it may be, which a nation wants, is in proportion to the total mass of its wealth, and to the activity of that wealth. A nation that has but little wealth, has but a limited want of money. In stating the fact, therefore, that the total wealth of the country has diminished, within a few years, in a ratio of about fifty per cent., we shall at once fully comprehend the inevitable reduction which must have ensued in the total quantity of the circulating medium of the country. A nation is most prosperous when there is a gradual and untempting addition to the aggregate of its circulating medium. It is in a condition the most adverse, when there is a rapid diminution in the quantity of the circulating medium; and a consequent depression in the value of property. In the former case, the wealth of individuals insensibly increases, and income keeps ahead of expenditure. But, in the latter instance, debts have been contracted, engagements made, and habits of expense established, in reference to the existing state of wealth and of its representative. When these come to be greatly reduced, individuals find their debts still existing, their engagements unexecuted, and their habits inveterate. They see themselves in the possession of the same property on which, in good faith, they had bound themselves. But that property, without their fault, possesses no longer the same value; and hence, discontent, impoverishment, and ruin arise. Let us suppose, Mr. Chairman, that Europe was again the theatre of such a general war as recently raged throughout all her dominions—such a state of the war as existed in her greatest exertions and in our greatest prosperity—instantly there would arise a greedy demand for the surplus produce of our industry, for our commerce, for our navigation. The languor which now prevails in our cities, and in our seaports, would give way to an animated activity. Our roads and rivers would be crowded with the produce of the interior. Every where we should witness excited industry. The precious metals would reflow from abroad upon us. Banks, which have maintained their credit, would revive their business, and new banks would be established to take the place of those which have sunk beneath the general pressure; for, it is a mistake to suppose that they have produced our present adversity; they have somewhat aggravated it, but they were the effect and the evidence of our prosperity. Prices would again get up; the former value of property would be restored; and those embarrassed persons who have not been already overwhelmed by the times, would suddenly find, in the augmented value of their property, and the renewal of their business, ample means to extricate themselves from all their difficulties. The greatest want of civilized society is a market for the sale and exchange of the surplus of the produce of the labor of its members. This market may exist at home or abroad, or both, but it must exist somewhere, if society prospers; and wherever it does exist, it should be competent to the absorption of the entire surplus of production. It is most desirable that there should be both a home and a foreign market. But, with respect to their relative superiority, I cannot entertain a doubt. The home market is first in order, and paramount in importance. The object of the bill under consideration is to create this home market, and to lay the foundations of a genuine American policy. It is opposed; and it is incumbent upon the partisans of the foreign policy (terms which I shall use without any invidious intent) to demonstrate that the foreign market is an adequate vent for the surplus produce of our labor. But is it so? 1. Foreign nations cannot, if they would, take our surplus produce. If the source of supply, no matter of what, increases in a greater ratio than the demand for that supply, a glut of the market is inevitable, even if we suppose both to remain perfectly unobstructed. The duplication of our population takes place in terms of about twenty-five years. The term will be more and more extended as our numbers multiply. But it will be a sufficient approximation to assume this ratio for the present. We increase, therefore, in population at the rate of about four per cent. per annum. Supposing the increase of our production to be in the same ratio, we should, every succeeding year, have, of surplus produce, four per cent. more than that of the preceding year, without taking into the account the differences of seasons which neutralize each other. If, therefore, we are to rely upon the foreign market exclusively, foreign consumption ought to be shown to be increasing in the same ratio of four per cent. per annum, if it be an adequate vent for our surplus produce. But, as I have supposed the measure of our increasing production to be furnished by that of our increasing population; so the measure of their power of consumption must be determined by that of the increase of their population. Now, the total foreign population, who consume our surplus produce, upon an average, do not double their aggregate number in a shorter term than that of about one hundred years. Our powers of production increase then in a ratio four times greater than their powers of consumption. And hence their utter inability to receive from us our surplus produce.

But, secondly; if they could, they will not. The policy of all Europe is adverse to the reception of our agricultural produce, so far as it comes into collision with its own; and, under that limitation, we are absolutely forbid to enter their ports, except under circumstances which deprive them of all value as a steady market. The policy of all Europe rejects those great staples of our country, which consist of objects of human subsistence. The policy of all Europe refuses to receive from us any thing but those raw materials of smaller value, essential to their manufactures, to which they can give a higher value, with the exception of tobacco and rice, which they cannot produce. Even Great Britain, to which we are its best customer, and from which we receive nearly one half in value of our whole imports, will not take from us articles of subsistence produced in our country cheaper than can be produced in Great Britain. In adopting this exclusive policy, the States of Europe do not inquire what is best for us, but what suits themselves, respectively; they do not take jurisdiction of the question of our interests, but limit the object of their legislation to that of the conservation of their own peculiar interests, leaving us free to prosecute ours as we please. They do not guide themselves by that romantic philanthropy, which we see displayed here, and which invokes us to continue to purchase the produce of foreign industry, without regard to the state or prosperity of our own, that foreigners may be pleased to purchase the few remaining articles of ours which their restrictive policy has not yet absolutely excluded from their consumption. What sort of a figure would a member of the British Parliament have made—what sort of a reception would his opposition have obtained, if he had remonstrated against the passage of the corn law, by which British consumption is limited to the breadstuffs of British production, to the entire exclusion of American, and stated that America could not, and would not, buy British manufactures, if Britain did not buy American flour?

Both the inability and the policy of foreign Powers, then, forbid us to rely upon the foreign market as being an adequate vent for the surplus produce of American labor. Now, let us see if this general reasoning is not fortified and confirmed by the actual experience of this country. If the foreign market may be safely relied upon as furnishing an adequate demand for our surplus produce, then the official document will show a progressive increase, from year to year, in the exports of our native produce, in a proportion equal to that which I have suggested. If, on the contrary, we shall find from them that, for a long term of past years, some of our most valuable staples have retrograded, some remained stationary, and others advanced but little, if any, in amount, with the exception of cotton, the deductions of reason and the lessons of experience will alike command us to withdraw our confidence in the competency of the foreign market. The total amount of all our exports of domestic produce for the year, beginning in 1795, and ending on the 30th September, 1796, was $40,764,097. Estimating the increase according to the ratio of the increase of our population, that is at four per cent. per annum, the amount of the exports of the same produce in the year ending on the 30th September last, ought to have been $85,420,861. It was in fact only $47,155,408. Taking the average of five years, from 1803 to 1807, inclusive, the amount of native produce exported was $43,202,751 for each of those years. Estimating what it ought to have been, during the last year, applying the principle suggested to that amount, there should have been exported $77,766,751, instead of $47,155,408. If these comparative amounts of the aggregate actual exports, and what they ought to have been, be discouraging, we shall find, on descending into particulars, still less cause of satisfaction. The export of tobacco in 1791 was 112,428 hogsheads. That was the year of the largest exportation of that article; but it is the only instance of which I have selected the maximum of exportation. The amount of what we ought to have exported last year, estimated according to the scale of increase which I have used, is 266,332 hogsheads. The actual export was 99,009 hogsheads. We exported in 1823 the quantity of 1,311,853 barrels of flour; and ought to have exported last year 2,361,333 barrels. We, in fact, exported only 756,702 barrels. Of that quantity we sent to South America 150,000 barrels, according to a statement furnished me by the diligence of a friend near me, (Mr. POINSETT,) to whose valuable mass of accurate information, in regard to that interesting quarter of the world, I have had occasion frequently to apply. But that demand is temporary, growing out of the existing state of war. Whenever peace is restored to it, and I now hope that the day is not distant when its independence will be generally acknowledged, there cannot be a doubt that it will supply its own consumption. In all parts of it, the soil, either from climate or elevation, is well adapted to the culture of wheat; and nowhere can better wheat be produced than in some portions of Mexico and Chili. Still the market of South America is one which, on other accounts, deserves the greatest consideration. And I congratulate you, the Committee, and the country, on the recent adoption of a more auspicious policy towards it.

We exported, in 1802, Indian corn to the amount of 2,074,608 bushels—the quantity should have been, in 1823, 3,734,298 bushels. The actual quantity exported was 749,034 bushels, or about one-fifth of what it should have been, and a little more than one-third of what it was more than twenty years ago. We ought not then to be surprised at the extreme depression of the price of that article, of which I have heard my honorable friend (Mr. BASSETT) complain, nor of the distress of the corn-growing districts adjacent to Chesapeake bay. We exported 77,934 barrels of beef in 1803, and last year but 61,418, instead of 140,274 barrels. In the same year, (1803,) we exported 96,602 barrels of pork, and last year 55,529, instead of 173,882 barrels. Rice has not advanced, by any means, in the proportion which it ought to have done. All the small articles—such as cheese, butter, candles, &c., too minute to detail, but important in their aggregate—have also materially diminished. Cotton alone has advanced. But whilst the quantity of it is augmented, its actual value is considerably diminished. The total quantity last year exceeded that of the preceding year by near thirty millions of pounds. And yet the total value of the year of smaller exportation exceeded that of the last year by upwards of three and a half millions of dollars. If this article (the capacity of our country to produce which was scarcely known in 1790) were subtracted from the mass of our exports, the value of the residue would only be a little upwards of $27,000,000 during the last year. The distribution of the articles of our exports throughout the United States cannot fail to fix the attention of the Committee. Of the $47,155,408, to which they amounted last year, three articles alone—cotton, rice, and tobacco—composed together $28,549,177. Now, these articles are chiefly produced to the South. And if we estimate that portion of our population who are actually engaged in their culture, it would probably not exceed two millions. Thus, then, less than one-fifth of the whole population of the United States produced upwards of one-half—nearly two-thirds—of the entire value of the exports of the last year.

Is this foreign market, so incompetent at present, and which, limited as its demands are, operates so unequally upon the productive labor of our country, likely to improve in future? If I am correct in the views which I have presented to the Committee, it must become worse and worse. What can improve it? Europe will not abandon her own agriculture to foster ours. We may even anticipate that she will more and more enter into competition with us in the supply of the West India market. That of South America, for articles of subsistence, will probably soon vanish. The value of our exports, for the future, may remain at about what it was last year. But if we do not create some new market; if we persevere in the existing pursuits of agriculture; the inevitable consequence must be to augment greatly the quantity of our produce, and to lessen its value in the foreign market. Can there be a doubt on this point? Take the article of cotton, for example, which is almost the only article that now remunerates labor and capital. A certain description of labor is powerfully attracted towards the cotton-growing country. The cultivation will be greatly extended; the aggregate amount annually produced will be vastly augmented. The price will fall. The more unfavorable soils will then be gradually abandoned. And I have no doubt that, in a few years, it will cease to be profitably produced any where north of the thirty-fourth degree of latitude. But, in the mean time, large numbers of the cotton growers will suffer the greatest distress. And whilst this distress is brought upon our own country, foreign industry will be stimulated by the very cause which occasions our distress. For, by surcharging the markets abroad, the price of the raw material being reduced, the manufacturer will be able to supply cotton fabrics cheaper, and the consumption in his own country, and in foreign nations, other than ours, (where the value of the import must be limited to the value of the export, which I have supposed to remain the same,) being proportionably extended, there will be consequently an increased demand for the produce of his industry.

Our agricultural is our greatest interest. It ought ever to be predominant. All others should bend to it. And, in considering what is for its advantage, we should contemplate it in all its varieties, of planting, farming, and grazing. Can we do nothing to invigorate it? nothing to correct the errors of the past, and to brighten the still more unpromising prospects which lie before us? We have seen, I think, the causes of the distresses of the country. We have seen that an exclusive dependence upon the foreign market must lead to still severer distress, to impoverishment, to ruin. We must then change somewhat our course. We must give a new direction to some portion of our industry. We must speedily adopt a genuine American policy. Still cherishing a foreign market, let us create also a home market, to give further scope to the consumption of the produce of American industry. Let us counteract the policy of foreigners, and withdraw the support which we now give to their industry, and stimulate that of our own country. It should be a prominent object with wise legislators, to multiply the vocations and extend the business of society, as far as it can be done by the protection of our interests at home, against the injurious effects of foreign legislation. Suppose we were a nation of fishermen, or of skippers, to the exclusion of every other occupation, and the Legislature had the power to introduce the pursuits of agriculture and manufactures, would not our happiness be promoted by an exertion of its authority? All the existing employments of society, the learned professions, commerce, agriculture, are now overflowing. We stand in each other's way. Hence, the want of employment. Hence, the eager pursuit after public stations, which I have before glanced at. I have been again and again shocked, during this session, by instances of solicitation for places before the vacancies existed. The pulse of incumbents, who happen to be taken ill, is not marked with more anxiety by the attending physicians, than by those who desire to succeed them, though with very opposite feelings. Our old friend, the faithful sentinel, who has stood so long at our door, and the gallantry of whose patriotism deserves to be noticed, because it was displayed when that virtue was most rare and most wanted, on a memorable occasion, in this unfortunate city, became indisposed some weeks ago. The first intelligence which I had of his dangerous illness, was by an application for his unvacated place. I hastened to assure myself of the extent of his danger, and was happy to find that the eagerness of succession outstripped the progress of disease. By creating a new and extensive business, then, we should not only give employment to those who want it, and augment the sum of national wealth by all that this new business would create, but we should meliorate the condition of those who are now engaged in existing employments. In Europe, particularly in Great Britain, their large standing armies, large navies, large even on their peace arrangement, their established church, afford to their population employments which, in that respect, the happier constitution of our Government does not tolerate but in a very limited degree. The peace establishments of our Army and our Navy are extremely small, and I hope ever will be. We have no established church, and I trust never shall have. In proportion as the enterprise of our citizens in public employments is circumscribed, should we excite and invigorate it in private pursuits.

The creation of a home market is not only necessary to procure for our agriculture a just reward of its labors, but it is indispensable to obtain a supply of our necessary wants. If we cannot sell, we cannot buy. That portion of our population (and we have seen that it is not less than four-fifths) which makes comparatively nothing that foreigners will buy, has nothing to make purchases with from foreigners. It is in vain that we are told of the amount of our exports, supplied by the planting interest. They may enable the planting interest to supply all its wants; but they bring no ability to the interests not planting, unless, which cannot be pretended, the planting interest was an adequate vent for the surplus produce of the labor of all other interests. It is in vain to tantalize us with the greater cheapness of foreign fabrics. There must be an ability to purchase, if an article be obtained, whatever may be the price, high or low, at which it was sold. And a cheap article is as much beyond the grasp of him who has no means to buy, as a high one. Even if it were true that the American manufacturer would supply consumption at dearer rates, it is better to have his fabrics than the unattainable foreign fabrics; for it is better to be ill supplied than not supplied at all. A coarse coat, which will communicate warmth and cover nakedness, is better than no coat. The superiority of the home market results, 1st, from its steadiness and comparative certainty at all times; 2d, from the creation of reciprocal interests; 3d, from its greater security; and, lastly, from an ultimate and not distant augmentation of consumption, and, consequently, of comfort from increased quantity and reduced prices. But this home market, highly desirable as it is, can only be created and cherished by the protection of our own legislation against the inevitable prostration of our industry, which must ensue from the action of foreign policy and legislation. The effect and the value of this domestic care of our own interests will be obvious from a few facts and considerations. Let us suppose that half a million of persons are now employed abroad, in fabricating for our consumption those articles of which, by the operation of this bill, a supply is intended to be provided within ourselves. That half a million of persons are, in effect, subsisted by us; but their actual means of subsistence are drawn from foreign agriculture. If we could transport them to this country, and incorporate them in the mass of our own population, there would instantly arise a demand for an amount of provisions equal to that which would be requisite for their subsistence throughout the whole year. That demand, in the article of flour alone, would not be less than the quantity of about 900,000 barrels, besides a proportionate quantity of beef and pork, and other articles of subsistence. But 900,000 barrels of flour exceeded the entire quantity exported last year, by nearly 150,000 barrels. What activity would not this give? What cheerfulness would it not communicate to our now dispirited farming interest? But if, instead of these five hundred thousand artisans emigrating from abroad, we give, by this bill, employment to an equal number of our own citizens now engaged in unprofitable agriculture, or idle, from the want of business, the beneficial effect upon the productions of our farming labor would be nearly doubled. The quantity would be diminished by a subtraction of the produce from the labor of all those who should be diverted from its pursuits to manufacturing industry, and the value of the residue would be enhanced, both by that diminution and the creation of the home market to the extent supposed. And the honorable gentleman from Virginia may repress any apprehensions which he entertains, that the plough will be abandoned, and our fields remain unsown. For, under all the modifications of social industry, if you will secure to it a just reward, the greater attractions of agriculture will give to it that proud superiority which it has always maintained. If we suppose no actual abandonment of farming, but, what is most likely, a gradual and imperceptible employment of population in the business of manufacturing, instead of being compelled to resort to agriculture, the salutary effect would be nearly the same. Is any part of our common country likely to be injured by a transfer of the theatre of fabrication for our own consumption from Europe to America? All that those parts, if any there be, which will not, or cannot, engage in manufactures, should require, is, that their consumption should be well supplied; and if the objects of that consumption are produced in other parts of the Union that can manufacture, far from having, on that account, any just cause of complaint, their patriotism will and ought to inculcate a cheerful acquiescence in what essentially contributes, and is indispensably necessary, to the prosperity of the common family.

The great desideratum in political economy is the same as in private pursuits—that is, What is the best application of the aggregate industry of a nation, that can be made honestly to produce the largest sum of national wealth? Labor is the source of all wealth, but it is not natural labor only; and the fundamental error of the gentleman from Virginia, and of the school to which he belongs, in adducing, from our sparse population, our unfitness for the introduction of the arts, consists in their not sufficiently weighing the importance of the power of machinery. In former times, when but little comparative use was made of machinery, manual labor and the price of wages were circumstances of the greatest consideration. But it is far otherwise in these latter times. Such are the improvements and the perfections in machinery, that, in analyzing the compound value of many fabrics, the element of natural labor is so inconsiderable as almost to escape detection. This truth is demonstrated by many facts. Formerly, Asia, in consequence of the density of her population, and the consequent lowness of wages laid Europe under tribute for many of her fabrics. Now Europe reacts upon Asia, and Great Britain, in particular, throws back upon her countless millions of people the rich treasures produced by artificial labor, to a vast amount, infinitely cheaper than they can be manufactured by the natural exertions of that portion of the globe. But Britain is herself the most striking illustration of the immense power of machinery. Upon what other principle can you account for the enormous wealth which she has accumulated, and which she annually produces? A statistical writer of that country, several years ago, estimated the total amount of the artificial or machine labor of the nation to be equal to that of one hundred millions of able-bodied laborers. Subsequent estimates of her artificial labor, at the present day, carry it to the enormous height of two hundred millions. But the population of the Three Kingdoms is 21,500,000. Supposing that to furnish able-bodied labor to the amount of 4,000,000, the natural labor will be but two per cent. of the artificial labor. In the production of wealth, she operates, therefore, by a power (including the whole population) of 221,500,000; or, in other words, by a power eleven times greater than the total of her natural power. If we suppose the machine labor of the United States to be equal to that of 10,000,000 of able-bodied men, the United States will operate, in the creation of wealth, by a power (including all their population) of 20,000,000. In the creation of wealth, therefore, the power of Great Britain, compared to that of the United States, is as eleven to one. That these views are not imaginary, will be, I think, evinced, by contrasting the wealth, the revenue, the power, of the two countries. Upon what other hypothesis can we explain those almost incredible exertions which Britain made during the late wars of Europe? Look at her immense subsidies! Behold her, standing unaided and alone, breasting the storm of Napoleon's colossal power, when all continental Europe owned and yielded to its irresistible sway; and, finally, contemplate her vigorous prosecution of the war, with and without allies, to its splendid termination, on the ever-memorable field of Waterloo.

The British works which the gentleman from Virginia has quoted, portray a state of the most wonderful prosperity, in regard to wealth and resources, that ever was before contemplated. Let us look a little into the semi-official pamphlet, written with great force, clearness, and ability, and the valuable work of Lowe, to both of which that gentleman has referred. The revenue of the United Kingdom amounted, during the latter years of the war, to seventy millions of pounds sterling; and one year it rose to the astonishing height of ninety millions sterling, equal to four hundred millions of dollars. This was actual revenue, made up of real contributions from the purses of the people. After the close of the war, Ministers slowly and reluctantly reduced the military and naval establishments, and accommodated them to a state of peace. The pride of power, every where the same, always unwillingly surrenders any of those circumstances which display its pomp and exhibit its greatness. Contemporaneous with this reduction, Britain was enabled to lighten some of the heaviest burdens of taxation, and particularly that most onerous of all, the income tax. In this lowered state, the revenue of peace, gradually rising from the momentary depression incident to a transition from war, attained, in 1822, the vast amount of fifty-five millions sterling, upwards of two hundred and forty millions of dollars, and more than eleven times that of the United States for the same year; thus indicating the difference, which I have suggested, in the respective productive powers of the two countries. The excise alone, collected under twenty-five different heads, amounted to twenty-eight millions, more than one-half of the total revenue of the Kingdom. This great revenue allows Great Britain to constitute an efficient sinking fund of five millions sterling, being an excess of actual income beyond expenditure, and amounting to more than the entire revenue of the United States.

If we look at the commerce of England, we shall perceive that its prosperous condition no less denotes the immensity of her riches. The average of three years' exports, ending in 1789, was between thirteen and fourteen millions. The average for the same term, ending in 1822, was forty millions sterling. The average of the imports for three years, ending in 1789, was seventeen millions. The average for the same term, ending in 1822, was thirty-six millions, showing a favorable balance of four millions. Thus, in a period not longer than that which has elapsed since the establishment of our Constitution, have the exports of that Kingdom been tripled; and this has mainly been the effect of the power of machinery. The total amount of the commerce of Great Britain is greater since the peace, by one-fourth, than it was during the war. The average of her tonnage, during the most flourishing period of the war, was two million four hundred thousand tons. Its average, during the three years 1819, 1820, and 1821, was 2,600,000, exhibiting an increase of 200,000 tons. If we glance at some of the more prominent articles of her manufactures, we shall be assisted in comprehending the true nature of the sources of her riches. The amount of cotton fabrics exported, in the most prosperous year of the war, was eighteen million sterling. In the year 1820, it was 16,600,000; in 1821, 20,150,000; in 1822, 21,-

The Tariff Bill.

639,000 pounds sterling; presenting the astonishing increase in two years of upwards of five millions. The total amount of imports in Great Britain from all foreign parts, of the article of cotton wool, is five millions sterling. After supplying most abundantly the consumption of cotton fabrics within the country (and a people better fed, and clad, and housed, are not to be found under the sun than the British nation) by means of her industry, she gives to this cotton wool a new value, which enables her to sell to foreign nations to the amount of £21,639,000, making a clear profit of upwards of 16,500,000 pounds sterling! In 1821, the value of the export of woollen manufactures was £4,300,000. In 1822, it was 5,500,000. The success of her restrictive policy is strikingly illustrated in the article of silk. In the manufacture of that article she labors under great disadvantages, besides that of not producing the raw material. She has subdued them all, and the increase of the manufacture has been most rapid. Although she is still unable to maintain, in foreign countries, a successful competition with the silks of France, of India, and of Italy, and, therefore, exports but little, she gives to the two millions of the raw material which she imports, in various forms, a value of ten millions, which chiefly enter into British consumption. Let us suppose that she was dependent upon foreign nations for these ten millions, what an injurious effect would it not have upon her commercial relations with them! The average of the exports of British manufactures during the peace exceeds the average of the most productive years of the war. The amount of her wealth annually produced is three hundred and fifty million sterling, bearing a large proportion to all of her pre-existing wealth. The agricultural portion of it is said by the gentleman from Virginia, to be greater than that created by any other branch of her industry. But that flows mainly from a policy similar to that proposed by this bill. One-third only of her population is engaged in agriculture; the other two-thirds furnishing a market for the produce of that third. Withdraw this market, and what becomes of her agriculture? The power and the wealth of Great Britain cannot be more strikingly illustrated than by a comparison of her population and revenue with those of other countries and with our own. [Here Mr. C. exhibited the following table, from authentic materials:]

	Population.	Taxes and public burdens.	Taxes per capita.
Russia in Europe	37,000,000	£18,000,000	£0 9 9
France including Corsica -	30,700,000	37,000,000	1 4 0
Great Britain, exclusive of Ireland, (the taxes computed according to value of money on the European continent)	14,500,000	40,000,000	2 15 0
Great Britain and Ireland, collectively,	21,500,000	44,000,000	2 0 0

England alone -	11,600,000	£36,000,000	£3 2 0
Spain -	11,000,000	6,000,000	0 11 0
Ireland -	7,000,000	4,000,000	0 11 0
The United States of America, }	10,000,000	4,500,000	0 9 0

From this exhibit, we must remark, that the wealth of Great Britain (and, consequently, her power) is greater than that of any of the other nations with which it is compared. The amount of the contributions which she draws from the pockets of her subjects is not referred to for imitation, but as indicative of their wealth. The burden of taxation is always relative to the ability of the subjects of it. A poor nation can pay but little. And the heavier taxes of British subjects, for example, in consequence of their great wealth, may be easier borne than the much lighter taxes of Spanish subjects, in consequence of their extreme poverty. The object of wise Governments should be, by sound legislation so to protect the industry of their own citizens against the policy of foreign Powers as to give to it the most expansive force in the production of wealth. Great Britain has ever acted, and still acts, on this policy. She has pushed her protection of British interest further than any other nation has fostered its industry. The result is, greater wealth among her subjects, and consequently, greater ability to pay their public burdens. If their taxation is estimated by their natural labor alone, nominally it is greater than the taxation of the subjects of any other Power. But if, on a scale of their natural and artificial labor compounded, it is less than the taxation of any other people. Estimating it on that scale, and assuming the aggregate of the natural and artificial labor of the United Kingdom to be what I have already stated, 221,500,000, the actual taxes paid by a British subject are only about three and seven-pence sterling. Estimating our own taxes on a similar scale—that is, supposing both descriptions of labor to be equal to that of 20,000,000 of able bodied persons—the amount of tax paid by each soul in the United States is 4s. 6d. sterling.

The Committee will observe, from that table, that the measure of the wealth of a nation is indicated by the measure of its protection of its industry; and that the measure of the poverty of a nation is marked by that of the degree in which it neglects and abandons the care of its own industry, leaving it exposed to the action of foreign Powers. Great Britain protects most her industry, and the wealth of Great Britain is consequently the greatest. France is next in the degree of protection, and France is next in the order of wealth. Spain most neglects the duty of protecting the industry of her subjects, and Spain is one of the poorest of European nations. Unfortunate Ireland! disinherited, or rendered, in her industry, subservient to England, is exactly in the same state of poverty with Spain, measured by the rule of taxation. And the United States are still poorer than either.

The views of British prosperity which I have endeavored to present, show that her protecting policy is adapted alike to a state of war and of peace. Self-poised, resting upon her own internal resources, possessing a home market carefully cherished and guarded, she is ever prepared for any emergency. We have seen her coming out of a war of incalculable exertion, and of great duration, with her power unbroken, her means undiminished. We have seen that almost every revolving year of peace has brought along with it an increase of her manufactures, of her commerce, and, consequently, of her navigation. We have seen that, constructing her prosperity upon the solid foundation of her own protecting policy, it is unaffected by the vicissitudes of other States. What is our own condition? Depending upon the state of foreign Powers—confiding exclusively in a foreign, to the culpable neglect of a domestic policy, our interests are affected by all their movements. Their wars, their misfortunes, are the only source of our prosperity. In their peace, and our peace, we behold our condition the reverse of that of Great Britain, and all our interests stationary or declining. Peace bring to us none of the blessings of peace. Our system is anomalous; alike unfitted to general tranquillity, and to a state of war or peace on the part of our own country. It can succeed only in the rare occurrence of a general state of war throughout Europe. I am no eulogist of England. I am far from recommending her systems of taxation. I have adverted to them only as manifesting her extraordinary ability. The political and foreign interests of that nation may have been, as I believe them to have been, often badly managed. Had she abstained from the wars into which she has been plunged by her ambition, or the mistaken policy of her Ministers, the prosperity of England would, unquestionably, have been much greater. But it may happen that the public liberty, and the foreign relations of a nation, have been badly provided for, and yet its political economy has been wisely managed. The alacrity or sullenness with which a people pay taxes depends upon their wealth or poverty. If the system of their rulers leads to their impoverishment, they can contribute but little to the necessities of the State; if to their wealth, they cheerfully and promptly pay the burdens imposed on them. Enormous as British taxation appears to be in comparison with that of other nations, but really lighter as it, in fact, is, when we consider its great wealth, and its powers of production, that vast amount is collected with the most astonishing regularity. [Here Mr. CLAY read certain passages from Holt, showing that, in 1822, there was not a solitary prosecution arising out of the collection of the assessed taxes, which are there considered among the most burdensome, and that the prosecution of violations of the excise laws, in all its numerous branches, were sensibly and progressively decreasing.]

Having called the attention of the Committee to the present adverse state of our country, and endeavored to point out the causes which have led to it; having shown that similar causes, wherever they exist in other countries, lead to the same adversity in their condition; and having shown that, wherever we find opposite causes prevailing, a high and animating state of national prosperity exists, the Committee will agree with me in thinking that it is the solemn duty of Government to apply a remedy to the evils which afflict our country, if it can apply one. Is there no remedy within the reach of the Government? Are we doomed to behold our industry languish and decay yet more and more? But there is a remedy, and that remedy consists in modifying our foreign policy, and in adopting a genuine American system. We must naturalize the arts in our country, and we must naturalize them by the only means which the wisdom of nations has yet discovered to be effectual—by adequate protection against the otherwise overwhelming influence of foreigners. This is only to be accomplished by the establishment of a tariff, to the consideration of which I am now brought.

And what is this tariff? It seems to have been regarded as a sort of monster, huge and deformed; a wild beast, endowed with tremendous powers of destruction, about to be let loose among our people, if not to devour them, at least to consume their substance. But let us calm our passions, and deliberately survey this alarming, this terrific being. The sole object of the tariff is to tax the produce of foreign industry, with the view of promoting American industry. The tax is exclusively levied at foreign industry. That is the avowed and the direct purpose of the tariff. If it subjects any part of American industry to burdens, that is an effect not intended, but is altogether incidental, and perfectly voluntary.

It had been treated as an imposition of burdens upon one part of the community by design for the benefit of another; as if, in fact, money were taken from the pockets of one portion of the people and put into the pockets of another. But, is that a fair representation of it? No man pays the duty assessed on the foreign article by compulsion, but voluntarily; and this voluntary duty, if paid, goes into the common exchequer, for the common benefit of all. Consumption has four objects of choice. 1. It may abstain from the use of the foreign article, and thus avoid the payment of the tax. 2. It may employ the rival American fabric. 3. It may engage in the business of manufacturing, which this bill is designed to foster. 4. Or it may supply itself from the household manufactures. But, it is said by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, that the South, owing to the character of a certain portion of its population, cannot engage in the business of manufacturing. Now, I do not agree in that opinion to the extent in which it is asserted. The circumstance alluded to may disqualify the South from engaging in every branch of manufacture as largely as other quarters of the Union, but to some branches of it that part of our population is well adapted. It indisputably affords great facility in the household or domestic line.

But, if the gentleman's premises were true, could his conclusion be admitted? According to him, a certain part of our population, happily much the smallest, is peculiarly situated. The circumstance of its degradation unfits it for the manufacturing arts. The well being of the other, and the larger part of our population, requires the introduction of those arts. What is to be done in this conflict? The gentleman would have us abstain from adopting a policy called for by the interests of the greater and freer part of our population. But is that reasonable? Can it be expected that the interests of the greater part should be made to bend to the condition of the servile part of our population? That, in effect would be to make us the slaves of slaves. I went, with great pleasure, along with my Southern friends, and I am ready again to unite with them in protesting against the exercise of any legislative power, on the part of Congress, over that delicate subject, because it was my solemn conviction, that Congress was interdicted, or at least not authorized, by the Constitution to exercise any such legislative power. And I am sure, that the patriotism of the South may be exclusively relied upon to reject a policy which should be dictated by considerations altogether connected with that degraded class, to the prejudice of the residue of our population. But, does not a perseverance in the foreign policy, as it now exists, in fact, make all parts of the Union, not planting, tributary to the planting parts? What is the argument? It is, that we must continue freely to receive the produce of foreign industry, without regard to the protection of American industry, that a market may be retained for the sale abroad of the produce of the planting portion of the country; and that, if we lessen the consumption, in all parts of America, those which are not planting, as well as the planting sections of foreign manufactures, we diminish to that extent the foreign market for the planting produce. The existing state of things, indeed, presents a sort of tacit compact between the cotton grower and the British manufacturer, the stipulations of which are, on the part of the cotton grower, that the whole of the United States, the other portions as well as the cotton growing, shall remain open and unrestricted in the consumption of British manufactures; and, on the part of the British manufacturer, that, in consideration thereof, he will continue to purchase the cotton of the South.

Thus, then, we perceive that the proposed measure, instead of sacrificing the South to the other parts of the Union, seeks only to preserve them from being absolutely sacrificed under the operation of the tacit compact which I have described. Supposing the South to be actually incompetent, or disinclined to embark at all in the business of manufacturing, is not its interest, nevertheless, likely to be promoted by creating a new and an American source of supply for its consumption? Now foreign Powers, and Great Britain principally, have the monopoly of the supply of Southern consumption. If this bill should pass, an American competitor in the supply of the South would be raised up, and ultimately, I cannot doubt, that it would be supplied cheaper and better. I have before had occasion to state, and will now again mention, the beneficial effects of American competition with Europe, in furnishing a supply of the article of cotton bagging. After the late war, the influx of the Scottish manufacture prostrated the American establishments. The consequence was, that the Scotch possessed the monopoly of the supply; and the price of it rose, and attained the year before the last a height which amounted to more than an equivalent for ten years' protection to the American manufacture. This circumstance tempted American industry again to engage in the business, and several valuable manufactories have been established in Kentucky. They have reduced the price of the fabric very considerably; but, without the protection of Government, they may be again prostrated—and then the Scottish manufacturer, engrossing the supply of our consumption, the price will probably again rise. It has been tauntingly asked, if Kentucky cannot maintain herself in a competition with the two Scottish towns of Inverness and Dundee? But is that a fair statement of the case? Those two towns are cherished and sustained by the whole protecting policy of the British empire, whilst Kentucky cannot, and the General Government will not, extend a like protection to the few Kentucky villages in which the article is made.

If the cotton growing consumption could be constitutionally exempted from the operation of this bill, it might be fair to exempt it upon the condition that foreign manufactures, the proceeds of the sale of cotton abroad, should not enter at all into the consumption of the other parts of the United States. But such an arrangement as that, if it could be made, would probably be objected to by the cotton growing country itself.

2. The second objection to the proposed bill is, that it will diminish the amount of our exports. It can have no effect upon our exports, except those which are sent to Europe. Except tobacco and rice, we send there nothing but the raw materials. The argument is, that Europe will not buy of us if we do not buy of her. The first objection to it is, that it calls upon us to look to the question, and take care of European ability in legislating for American interests. Now, if, in legislating for their interests, they would consider and provide for our ability, the principle of reciprocity would enjoin us so to regulate our intercourse with them, as to leave their ability unimpaired. But I have shown that, in the adoption of their own policy, their inquiry is strictly limited to a consideration of their peculiar interests, without any regard to that of ours. The next remark I would make is, that the bill only operates upon certain articles of European industry, which, it is supposed, our interest requires us to manufacture within ourselves; and, although its effect will be to diminish the amount of our imports of those articles, it leaves them free to supply us with any other produce of their industry. And, since the circle of human comforts, refinements, and luxuries, is of great extent, Europe will still find herself able to purchase from us what she has hitherto done, and to discharge the debt in some of those objects. If there be any diminution in our exports to Europe, it will probably be in the article of cotton to Great Britain. I have stated that Britain buys cotton wool to the amount of about five millions sterling, and sells to foreign

States to the amount of upwards of twenty-one millions and a half. Of this sum, we take a little upwards of a million and a half. The residue, of about twenty millions, she must sell to other foreign Powers than the United States. Now their market will continue open to her, as much after the passage of this bill as before. She will therefore require from us the raw material to supply their consumption. But, it is said, she may refuse to purchase it of us, and seek a supply elsewhere. There can be but little doubt that she now resorts to us, because we can supply her cheaper and better than any other country. And it would be unreasonable to suppose that she would cease, from any pique towards us, to pursue her own interest. Suppose she was to decline purchasing from us: The consequence would be, that she would lose the market for the twenty millions sterling which she now sells other foreign Powers, or enter into it under a disadvantageous competition with us, or with other nations, who should obtain their supplies of the raw material from us. If there should be any diminution, therefore, in the exportation of cotton, it would only be in the proportion of about one and a half to twenty, that is, a little upwards of five per cent.; the loss of a market for which, abroad, would be fully compensated by the market for the article created at home. Lastly, I would observe, that the new application of our industry, producing new objects of exportation, and they possessing much greater value than in the raw state, we should be in the end amply indemnified, by their exportation. Already the item in our foreign exports of manufactures is considerable; and we know that our cotton fabrics have been recently exported, in a large amount, to South America, where they maintain a successful competition with those of any other country.

3. The third objection to the tariff is, that it will diminish our navigation. This great interest deserves every encouragement consistent with the paramount interest of agriculture. In the order of nature it is secondary to both agriculture and manufactures. Its business is the transportation of the productions of those two superior branches of industry. It cannot therefore be expected that they shall be moulded or sacrificed to suit its purposes; but, on the contrary, navigation must accommodate itself to the actual state of agriculture and manufactures. If, as I believe, we have nearly reached the maximum in value of our exports of raw produce to Europe, the effect hereafter will be, as it respects that branch of our trade, if we persevere in the foreign system, to retain our navigation at the point it has now reached. By reducing, indeed, as will probably take place, the price of our raw materials, a further quantity of them could be exported, and of course additional employment might in that way be given to our tonnage; but that would be at the expense of the agricultural interest. If I am right in supposing that no effect will be produced by this measure upon any other branch of our export trade but that to Europe; that with regard to that there will be no sensible diminution of our exports, and that the new direction given to a portion of our industry will produce other objects of exportation, the probability is, that our foreign tonnage will be even increased under the operation of this bill. But, if I am mistaken in these views, and it should experience any reduction, the increase of our coasting tonnage, resulting from the greater activity of domestic exchanges, will more than compensate the injury. Although our navigation partakes in the general distress of the country, it is less depressed than any other of our great interests. The foreign tonnage has been gradually, though slowly, increasing since 1818. And our coasting tonnage since 1816 has increased upwards of one hundred thousand tons.

4. It is next contended that the effect of the measure will be to diminish our foreign commerce. The objection assumes, what I have endeavored to controvert, that there will be a reduction in the value of our exports. Commerce is an exchange of commodities. Whatever will tend to augment the wealth of a nation must increase its capacity to make these exchanges. By new productions, or creating new values in the fabricated forms which shall be given to old objects of our industry, we shall give to commerce a fresh spring, a new aliment. The foreign commerce of the country, from causes, some of which I have endeavored to point out, has been extended as far as it can be. And I think there can be but little doubt that the balance of trade is, and for some time past has been, against us. I was surprised to hear the learned gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) rejecting, as an exploded fallacy, the idea of a balance of trade. I have not time nor inclination now to discuss that topic. But I will observe, that all nations act upon the supposition of the reality of its existence, and seek to avoid a trade the balance of which is unfavorable, and to foster that which presents a favorable balance. However the account be made up, whatever may be the items of a trade, commodities, fishing industry, marine labor, the carrying trade, all of which, I admit, should be comprehended, there can be no doubt, I think, that the totality of the exchanges of all descriptions made by one nation with another, or against the totality of the exchanges of all other nations together, may be such as to present the state of an unfavorable balance with the one or with all. It is true that, in the long run, the measures of these exchanges, that is, the totality in value of what is given and of what is received, must be equal to each other. But the great distress may be felt long before the counterpoise can be effected. In the mean time there will be an export of the precious metals, to the deep injury of internal trade, an unfavorable state of exchange, an export of public securities, a resort to credit, debt, mortgages. Most of, if not all, these circumstances, are believed now to be indicated by our country, in its foreign commercial relations. What have we received, for example, for the public stocks sent to England? Goods. But those stocks are our bond, which must be paid. Although the solidity of the credit of the English public securities is not surpassed by that of our own, strong as it justly is, when have we seen English stocks sold in our market, and regularly quoted in the prices current, as American stocks are in England? An unfavorable balance with one nation may be made up by a favorable balance with other nations; but the fact of the existence of that unfavorable balance is strong presumptive evidence against the trade. Commerce will regulate itself! Yes, and the extravagance of a spendthrift heir, who squanders the rich patrimony which has descended to him, will regulate itself ultimately. But it will be a regulation which will exhibit him in the end safely confined within the walls of a jail. Commerce will regulate itself! But is it not the duty of wise Governments to watch its course, and, beforehand, to provide against even distant evils; by prudent legislation stimulating the industry of their own people, and checking the policy of foreign Powers as it operates on them? The supply, then, of the subjects of foreign commerce, no less than the supply of consumption at home, requires of us to give a portion of our labor such a direction as will enable us to produce them. That is the object of the measure under consideration, and I cannot doubt that, if adopted, it will accomplish its object.

5. The fifth objection to the tariff is, that it will diminish the public revenue, disable us from paying the public debt, and finally compel a resort to a system of excise and internal taxation. This objection is founded upon the supposition that the reduction in the importation of the subjects, on which the increased duties are to operate, will be such as to produce the alleged effect. All this is matter of mere conjecture, and can only be determined by experiment. I have very little doubt, with my colleague, (Mr. TRIMBLE,) that the revenue will be increased considerably, for some years at least, under the operation of this bill. The diminution in the quantity imported will be compensated by the augmentation of the duty. In reference to the article of molasses, for example, if the import of it should be reduced fifty per cent., the amount of duty collected would be the same as it now is. But it will not, in all probability, be reduced by any thing like that proportion. And then there are some other articles which will continue to be introduced in as large quantities as ever, notwithstanding the increase of duty—the object in reference to them being revenue, and not the encouragement of domestic manufactures. Another cause will render the revenue of this year, in particular, much more productive than it otherwise would have been; and that is, that large quantities of goods have been introduced into the country, in anticipation of the adoption of this measure. The eagle does not dart a keener gaze upon his intended prey, than that with which the British manufacturer and merchant watches the foreign market, and the course even of our elections as well as our legislation. The passage of this bill has been expected; and all our information is, that the importations, during this Spring, have been immense. But, further, the measure of our importations is that of our exportations. If I am right in supposing that, in future, the amount of these, in the old or new forms of the produce of our labor, will not be diminished, but probably increased, then the amount of our importations, and, consequently, of our revenue, will not be reduced, but may be extended. If these ideas be correct, there will be no inability on the part of the Government to extinguish the public debt. The payment of that debt, and the consequent liberation of the public resources from the charge of it, is extremely desirable. No one is more anxious than I am to see that important object accomplished. But I entirely concur with the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) in thinking that no material sacrifice of any of the great interests of the nation ought to be made to effectuate it. Such is the elastic and accumulating nature of our public resources, from the silent augmentation of our population, that if, in any given state of the public revenue, we throw ourselves upon a couch and go to sleep, we may, after a short time, awake with an ability abundantly increased to redeem any reasonable amount of public debt with which we may happen to be burdened. The public debt of the United States, though nominally larger now than it was in the year 1791, bears really no sort of discouraging comparison to its amount, at that time, whatever standard we may choose to adopt to institute the comparison. It was, in 1791, about seventy-five millions of dollars. It is now about ninety. Then we had a population of about four millions. Now we have upwards of ten millions. Then we had a revenue short of five millions of dollars. Now our revenue exceeds twenty. If we select population as the standard, our present population is one hundred and fifty per cent. greater than it was in 1791; if revenue, that is four times more now than at the former period; whilst the public debt has increased only in a ratio of twenty per cent. A public debt of three hundred millions of dollars, at the present day, considering our actual ability, compounded both of the increase of population and of revenue, would not be more onerous now than the debt of seventy-five millions of dollars was, at the epoch of 1791, in reference to the same circumstances. If I am right in supposing that, under the operation of the proposed measure, there will not be any diminution, but a probable increase of the public revenue, there will be no difficulty in defraying the current expenses of Government, and paying the principal as well as the interest of the public debt, as it becomes due. Let us, for a moment, however, indulge the improbable supposition of the opponents of the tariff, that there will be a reduction of the revenue to the extent of the most extravagant calculation which has been made—that is to say, to the extent of five millions. That sum deducted, we shall still have remaining a revenue of about fifteen millions. The Treasury estimates of the current service of the years 1822, 1823, and 1824, exceeds, each year, nine millions. The lapse of Revolutionary pensions, and judicious retrenchments which might be made, without detriment to any of the essential establishments of the country, would probably reduce them below nine millions of dollars. Let us assume that sum, to which add above five millions and a half for the interest of the public debt, and the wants of Government would require a revenue of fourteen and a half millions, leaving a surplus of revenue of half a million beyond the public expenditure. Thus, by a postponement of the payment of the principal of the public debt, in which the public creditors would gladly acquiesce, and confiding, for the means of redeeming it, in the necessary increase of our revenue from the natural augmentation of our population and consumption, we may safely adopt the proposed measure, even if it should be attended (which is confidently denied) with the supposed diminution of revenue. We shall not then have occasion to vary the existing system of taxation; we shall be under no necessity to resort either to direct taxes or to an excise. But suppose the alternative were really forced upon us of continuing the foreign system, with its inevitable impoverishment of the country, but with the advantage of the present mode of collecting the taxes, or of adopting the American system, with its increase of the national wealth, but with the disadvantage of an excise, could any one hesitate between them? Customs and an excise agree in the essential particulars, that they are both taxes upon consumption, and both are voluntary. They differ only in the mode of collection. The office for the collection of one is located on the frontier, and that for the other within the interior. I believe it was Mr. Jefferson, who, in reply to the boast of a citizen of New York, of the amount of the public revenue paid by that city, asked who would pay it if the collector's office were removed to Paulus Hook, on the New Jersey shore? National wealth is the source of all taxation. And, my word for it, the people are too intelligent to be deceived by mere names, and not to give a decided preference to that system which is based upon their wealth and prosperity, rather than to that which is founded upon their impoverishment and ruin.

6. But, according to the opponents of the domestic policy, the proposed system will force capital and labor into new and reluctant employments; we are not prepared, in consequence of the high price of wages, for the successful establishment of manufactures, and we must fail in the experiment. We have seen that the existing occupations of our society, those of agriculture, commerce, navigation, and the learned professions, are overflowing with competitors, and that the want of employment is severely felt. Now what does this bill propose? To open a new and extensive field of business, in which all that choose may enter. There is no compulsion upon any one to engage in it. An option only is given to industry, to continue in the present unprofitable pursuits, or to embark in a new and promising one. The effect will be to lessen the competition in the old branches of business, and to multiply our resources for increasing our comforts and augmenting the national wealth. The alleged fact of the high price of wages is not admitted. The truth is, that no class of society suffers more, in the present stagnation of business, than the laboring class. That is a necessary effect of the depression of agriculture, the principal business of the community. The wages of able-bodied men vary from five to eight dollars per month; and such has been the want of employment, in some parts of the Union, that instances have not been unfrequent, of men working merely for the means of present subsistence. If the wages for labor here and in England are compared, they will be found not to be essentially different. I agree with the honorable gentleman from Virginia, that high wages are a proof of national prosperity; we differ only in the means by which that desirable end shall be attained. But, if the fact were true, that the wages of labor are high, I deny the correctness of the argument founded upon it. The argument assumes, that natural labor is the principal element in the business of manufacture. That was the ancient theory. But the valuable inventions and vast improvements in machinery, which have been made within a few years past, have produced a new era in the arts. The effect of this change in the powers of production may be estimated from what I have already stated in relation to England, and to the triumphs of European artificial labor over the natural labor of Asia. In considering the fitness of a nation for the establishment of manufactures, we must no longer limit our views to the state of its population, and the price of wages. All circumstances must be regarded, of which that is, perhaps, the least important. Capital, ingenuity in the construction, and adroitness in the use of machinery, and the possession of the raw materials, are those which deserve the greatest consideration. All these circumstances, (except that of capital, of which there is no deficiency,) exist in our country in an eminent degree, and more than counterbalance the disadvantage, if it really existed, of the lower wages of labor in Great Britain. The dependence upon foreign nations for the raw material of any great manufacture, has been ever considered as a discouraging fact. The state of our population is peculiarly favorable to the most extensive introduction of machinery. We have no prejudices to combat, no persons to drive out of employment. The pamphlet to which we have had occasion so often to refer, in enumerating the causes which have brought in England their manufactures to such a state of perfection, and which now enable them, in the opinion of the writer, to defy all competition, does not specify, as one of them, low wages. It assigns three; 1st, capital; 2ndly, extent and costliness of machinery; and, 3dly, steady and persevering industry. Notwithstanding the concurrence of so many favorable causes, in our country, for the introduction of the arts, we are earnestly dissuaded from making the experiment, and our ultimate failure is confidently predicted. Why should we fail? Nations, like men, fail in nothing which they boldly attempt, when sustained by virtuous purposes and firm resolution. I am not willing to admit this depreciation of American skill and enterprise. I am not willing to strike before an effort is made. All our past history exhorts us to proceed, and inspires us with animating hopes of success. Past predictions of our incapacity have failed, and present predictions will not be realized. At the commencement of this Government, we were told that the attempt would be idle to construct a marine adequate to the commerce of the country, or even to the business of its coasting trade. The founders of our Government did not listen to these discouraging counsels; and behold the fruits of their just comprehension of our resources! Our restrictive policy was denounced, and it was foretold that it would utterly disappoint all our expectations. But our restrictive policy has been eminently successful; and the share which our navigation now enjoys in the trade with France, and with the British West India islands, attests its victory. What were not the disheartening predictions of the opponents of the late war? Defeat, discomfiture, and disgrace, were to be the certain, but not the worst, effect of it. Here, again, did prophecy prove false; and the energies of our country, and the valor and the patriotism of our people, carried us gloriously through the war. We are now, and ever will be, essentially, an agricultural people. Without a material change in the fixed habits of the country, the friends of this measure desire to draw to it, as a powerful auxiliary to its industry, the manufacturing arts. The difference between a nation with, and without the arts, may be conceived, by the difference between a keelboat and a steamboat, combatting the rapid torrent of the Mississippi. How slow does the former ascend, hugging the sinuosities of the shore, pushed on by her hardy and exposed crew, now throwing themselves in vigorous concert on their oars, and then seizing the pendant boughs of overhanging trees; she seems hardly to move; and her scanty cargo is scarcely worth the transportation! With what ease is she not passed by the steamboat, laden with the riches of all quarters of the world, with a crowd of gay, cheerful and protected passengers, now dashing into the midst of the current, or gliding through the eddies near the shore! Nature herself seems to survey, with astonishment, the passing wonder, and, in silent submission, reluctantly to own the magnificent triumphs, in her own vast dominion, of Fulton's immortal genius!

7. But it is said, that wherever there is a concurrence of favorable circumstances, manufactures will arise of themselves, without protection; and that we should not disturb the natural progress of industry, but leave things to themselves. If all nations would modify their policy on this axiom, perhaps it would be better for the common good of the whole. Even then, in consequence of natural advantages, and a greater advance in civilization and in the arts, some nations would enjoy a state of much higher prosperity than others. But there is no universal legislation. The globe is divided into different communities, each seeking to appropriate to itself all the advantages it can, without reference to the prosperity of others. Whether this is right or not, it has always been, and ever will be, the case. Perhaps the care of the interests of our people is sufficient for all the wisdom of one Legislature; and that it is among nations as among individuals, that the happiness of the whole is best secured by each attending to its own peculiar interests. The proposition to be maintained by our adversaries, is, that manufactures, without protection, will, in due time, spring up in our country, and sustain themselves, in a competition with foreign fabrics, however advanced the arts, and whatever the degree of protection may be in foreign countries. Now I contend that this proposition is refuted by all experience, ancient and modern, and in every country. If I am asked, why unprotected industry should not succeed in a struggle with protected industry, I answer, the fact has ever been so, and that is sufficient; I reply that uniform experience evinces that it cannot succeed in such an unequal contest, and that is sufficient. If we speculate on the causes of this universal truth, we may differ about them. Still the indisputable fact remains. And we should be as unwise in not availing ourselves of the guide which it furnishes, as a man would be who should refuse to bask in the rays of the sun, because he could not agree with Judge Woodward as to the nature of the substance of that planet, to which we are indebted for heat and light. If I were to attempt to particularize the causes which prevent the success of the manufacturing arts, without protection, I should say that they are—first, the obduracy of fixed habits. No nation, no individual, will easily change an established course of business, even if it be unprofitable; and least of all is an agricultural people prone to innovation. With what reluctance do they not adopt improvements in the instruments of husbandry, or in modes of cultivation! If the farmer makes a good crop, and sells it badly, or makes a short crop, buoyed up by hope, he perseveres, and trusts that a favorable change of the market, or of the seasons, will enable him, in the succeeding year, to repair the misfortunes of the past. Secondly, the uncertainty, fluctuation, and unsteadiness, of the home market, when liable to an unrestricted influx of fabrics from all foreign nations; and, thirdly, the superior advance of skill, and amount of capital, which foreign nations have obtained, by the protection of their own industry. From the latter, or from other causes, the unprotected manufactures of a country are exposed to the danger of being crushed in their infancy, either by the design or from the necessities of foreign manufacturers. Gentlemen are incredulous as to the attempts of foreign merchants and manufacturers to accomplish the destruction of ours. Why should they not make such attempts? If the Scottish manufacturer, by surcharging our market, in one year, with the article of cotton bagging, for example, should so reduce the price as to discourage and put down the home manufacture, he would secure to himself the monopoly of the supply. And now having the exclusive possession of the market, perhaps for a long term of years, he might be more than indemnified for his first loss, in the subsequent rise in the price of the article. What have we not seen under our own eyes? The competition for the transportation of the mail, between this place and Baltimore, so excited, that to obtain it, an individual offered, at great loss, to carry it a whole year for one dollar! His calculation, no doubt, was, that, by driving his competitor off the road, and securing to himself the carriage of the mail, he would be afterwards able to repair his original loss by new contracts with the department. But the necessities of foreign manufacturers, without imputing to them any sinister design, may oblige them to throw into our markets the fabrics which have accumulated on their hands, in consequence of obstruction in the ordinary vents, or from overcalculation; and the forced sales, at losing prices, may prostrate our establishments. From this view of the subject, it follows that, if we would place the industry of our country upon a solid and unshakable foundation, we must adopt the protecting policy, which has every where succeeded, and reject that which would abandon it, which has every where failed.

8. But if the policy of protection be wise, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) has made some ingenious calculations to prove that the measure of protection, already extended, has been sufficiently great. With some few exceptions, the existing duties, of which he has made an estimate, were laid with the object of revenue, and without reference to that of encouragement to our domestic industry; and, although it is admitted that the incidental effect of duties, so laid, is to promote manufactures, yet, if it falls short of competent protection, the duties might as well not have been imposed with reference to that purpose. A moderate addition may accomplish this desirable end; and the proposed tariff is believed to have this character.

9. The prohibitory policy, it is confidently asserted, is condemned by the wisdom of Europe, and by her most enlightened statesmen. Is this the fact? We call upon gentlemen to show, in what instance a nation, that has enjoyed its benefits, has surrendered it. [Here Mr. BARBOUR rose, Mr. CLAY giving way, and said, that England had departed from it in the China trade, in allowing us to trade with her East India possessions, and in tolerating our navigation to her West India colonies.] With respect to the trade to China, the whole amount of what England has done is to modify the monopoly of the East India Company in behalf of one and a small part of her subjects, to increase the commerce of another, and the greater portion of them. The abolition of the restriction, therefore, operates altogether among the subjects of England, and does not touch at all the interests of foreign Powers. The toleration of our commerce to British India is for the sake of the specie, with which we mainly carry on that commerce, and which, having performed its circuit, returns to Great Britain in exchange for British manufactures. The relaxation from the colonial policy, in the instance of our trade and navigation with the West Indies, is a most unfortunate example for the honorable gentleman; for, it is an illustrious proof of the success of our restrictive policy, when resolutely adhered to. Great Britain had prescribed the terms on which we were to be graciously allowed to carry on that trade. The effect of her regulations was, to exclude our navigation altogether, and a complete monopoly, on the part of the British navigation, was secured. We forbade it, unless our vessels should be allowed a perfect reciprocity. Great Britain stood out a long time; but finally yielded, and our navigation now fairly shares with hers in the trade. Have gentlemen no other to exhibit than these trifling relaxations from the prohibitory policy, which do not amount to a drop in the bucket, to prove its abandonment by Great Britain? Let them show us that her laws are repealed which prohibit the introduction of our flour and provisions; of French silks, laces, porcelain, manufactures of bronze, mirrors, woollens; and of the manufactures of all other nations; and then we may be ready to allow, Great Britain has really abolished her prohibitory policy. We find there, on the contrary, that system of policy in full and vigorous operation, and a most curiously interwoven system it is, as she enforces it. She begins by protecting all parts of her immense dominions against foreign nations. She then protects the parent country against the colonies; and, finally, one part of the parent country against another. The sagacity of Scotch industry has carried the process of distillation to a perfection which would place the art in England on a footing of disadvantageous competition, and English distillation has been protected accordingly. But, suppose it were even true that Great Britain had abolished all restrictions upon trade, and allowed the freest introduction of the produce of foreign labor, would that prove it unwise for us to adopt the protecting system? The object of protection is the establishment and perfection of the arts. In England, it has accomplished its purpose, fulfilled its end. If she has not carried every branch of manufacture to the same high state of perfection that any other nation has, she has succeeded in so many that she may safely challenge the most unshackled competition in exchanges. It is upon this very ground that many of her writers recommend an abandonment of the prohibitory system. It is to give greater scope to British industry and enterprise. It is upon the same selfish principle. The object of the most perfect freedom of trade, with such a nation as Britain, and of the most rigorous system of prohibition, with a nation whose arts are in their infancy, may both be precisely the same. In both cases, it is to give greater expansion to native industry. They only differ in the theatres of their operation. The abolition of the restrictive system, by Britain, if by it she could prevail upon other nations to imitate her example, would have the effect of extending the consumption of British produce in other countries, where, her writers boldly affirm, it could maintain a fearless competition with the produce of native labor. The adoption of the restrictive system, on the part of the United States, by excluding the produce of foreign labor, would extend the consumption of American produce, unable, in the infancy and unprotected state of the arts, to sustain a competition with foreign fabrics. Let our arts breathe under the shade of protection; let them be perfected as they are in England, and we shall then be ready, as England now is said to be, to put aside protection, and to enter upon the freest exchanges. To what other cause, than to their whole prohibitory policy, can you ascribe British prosperity? It will not do to assign it to that of her antiquity; for France is no less ancient, though much less rich and powerful, in proportion to the population and natural advantages of France. Hallam, a sensible and highly approved writer on the Middle Ages, assigns the revival of the prosperity of the North of Europe to the success of the woollen manufactories of Flanders, and the commerce of which their fabrics became the subject; and the commencement of that of England, to the establishment of similar manufactures there, under the Edwards, and to the prohibitions which began about the same time. As to the poor rates, the theme of so much reproach, without England, and of so much regret within it, among her speculative writers, the system was a strong proof, no less of her unbounded wealth, than of her pauperism. What other nation can dispense, in the form of regulated charity, the enormous sum, I believe, of ten or twelve millions sterling!

[Mr. BARBOUR stated, it was reduced to six; to which Mr. CLAY replied, that he entertained no doubt but that the benign operation of British protection of home industry had greatly reduced it, within the last few years, by the full employment of her subjects, of which her flourishing trade bore evidence.]

The number of British paupers was the result of pressing the principle of population to its utmost limits, by her protecting policy, in the creation of wealth, and in placing the rest of the world under tribute to her industry. Doubtless, the condition of England would be better without paupers, if, in other respects, it remained the same. But, in her actual circumstances, the poor system has the salutary effect of an equalizing corrective of the tendency to the concentration of riches, produced by the genius of her political institutions, and by her prohibitory system.

But, is it true that England is convinced of the impolicy of the prohibitory system, and desirous to abandon it? What proof have we to that effect? We are asked to reject the evidence, deducible from the settled and steady practice of England, and to take lessons in a school of philosophical writers, whose visionary theories are nowhere adopted; or, if adopted, bring with them inevitable distress, impoverishment, and ruin. Let us hear the testimony of an illustrious personage, entitled to the greatest attention, because he speaks after a full experiment of the unrestrictive system, made in his own empire. I hope I shall give no offence in quoting from a publication issued from "the Mint of Philadelphia;" from a work of Mr. Carey, of whom I seize, with great pleasure, the occasion to say, that he merits the public gratitude, for the disinterested diligence with which he has collected a large mass of highly useful facts, and for the clear and convincing reasoning with which he generally illustrates them. The Emperor of Russia, in March, 1822, after about two years' trial of the free system, says, through Count Nesselrode:

"To produce happy effects, the principles of commercial freedom must be generally adopted. The State which adopts, whilst others reject them, must condemn its own industry and commerce to pay a ruinous tribute to those of other nations."

"From a circulation exempt from restraint, and the facility afforded by reciprocal exchanges, almost all the Governments at first resolved to seek the means of repairing the evil which Europe had been doomed to suffer; but experience and more correct calculations, because they were made from certain data, and upon the results, already known, of the peace that had just taken place, forced them soon to adhere to the prohibitory system."

"England preserved hers. Austria remained faithful to the rule she had laid down, to guard herself against the rivalry of foreign industry. France, with the same views, adopted the most rigorous measures of precaution. And Prussia published a new tariff in October last, which proves that she found it impossible not to follow the example of the rest of Europe."

"In proportion as the prohibitory system is extended and rendered perfect in other countries, that State which pursues a contrary system, makes, from day to day, sacrifices more extensive and more considerable."

"It offers a continual encouragement to the manufactures of other countries; and its own manufactures perish in the struggle which they are, as yet, unable to maintain."

"It is with the most lively feelings of regret we acknowledge it is our own proper experience which enables us to trace this picture. The evils which it details have been realized in Russia and Poland, since the conclusion of the act of the 7-19 December, 1818. Agriculture without a market, industry without protection, languish and decline. Specie is exported, and the most solid commercial houses are shaken. The public prosperity would soon feel the wound inflicted on private fortunes, if new regulations did not promptly change the actual state of affairs."

"Events have proved that our agriculture and our commerce, as well as our manufacturing industry, are not only paralyzed, but brought to the brink of ruin."

The example of Spain has been properly referred to, as affording a striking proof of the calamities which attend a State that abandons the care of its own internal industry. Her prosperity was greatest when the arts, brought there by the Moors, flourished most in that Kingdom. Then she received from England her wool, and returned it in the manufactured state; and then England was least prosperous. The two nations have reversed conditions. Spain, after the discovery of America, yielding to an inordinate passion for the gold of the Indies, sought in their mines that wealth which might have been better created at home. Can the remarkable difference in the state of the prosperity of the two countries be otherwise explained than by the opposite systems which they pursued? England, by a sedulous attention to her home industry, supplied the means of an advantageous commerce with her colonies. Spain, by an utter neglect of her domestic resources, confided altogether in those which she derived from her colonies, and presents an instance of the greatest adversity. Her colonies were infinitely more valuable than those of England; and if she had adopted a similar policy, is it unreasonable to suppose that, in wealth and power, she would have surpassed that of England? I think the honorable gentleman from Virginia does great injustice to the Catholic religion, in specifying that as one of the leading causes of the decline of Spain. It is a religion entitled to great respect; and there is nothing in its character incompatible with the highest degree of national prosperity. Is not France, the most polished, and in many other respects the most distinguished State of Christendom, Catholic? Is not Flanders, the most populous part of Europe, also Catholic? Are the Catholic parts of Switzerland and of Germany less prosperous than those which are Protestant?

10. The next objection of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, which I shall briefly notice, is, that the manufacturing system is adverse to the genius of our Government, in its tendency to the accumulation of large capitals in a few hands; in the corruption of the public morals, which is alleged to be incident to it; and in the consequent danger to the public liberty. The first part of the objection would apply to every lucrative business—to commerce, to planting, and to the learned professions. Would the gentleman introduce the system of Lycurgus? If his principle be correct, it should be extended to any and every vocation which had a similar tendency. The enormous fortunes in our country—the nabobs of the land—have been chiefly made by the profitable pursuit of that foreign commerce, in more propitious times, which the honorable gentleman would so carefully cherish. Immense estates have also been made in the South. The dependants are, perhaps, not more numerous upon that wealth which is accumulated in manufactures, than they are upon that which is acquired by commerce and by agriculture. We may safely confide in the laws of distributions, and in the absence of the rule of primogeniture, for the dissipation (perhaps too rapid) of large fortunes. What has become of those which were held two or three generations back in Virginia? Many of the descendants of the ancient aristocracy (as it was called) of that State, are now in the most indigent condition. The best security against the demoralization of society is the constant and profitable employment of its members. The greatest danger to public liberty is from idleness and vice. If manufactures form cities, so does commerce. And the disorders and violence which proceed from the contagion of the passions are as frequent in one description of those communities as in the other. There is no doubt but that the yeomanry of a country is the safest depository of public liberty. In all time to come, and under any probable direction of the labor of our population, the agricultural class must be much the most numerous and powerful, and will ever retain (as it ought to retain) a preponderating influence in our councils. The extent and the fertility of our lands constitute an adequate security against an excess in manufactures; and also against oppression on the part of capitalists towards the laboring portions of the community.

11. The last objection, with a notice of which I shall trouble the Committee, is, that the Constitution does not authorize the passage of the bill. The gentleman from Virginia does not assert, indeed, that it is inconsistent with the express provisions of that instrument, but he thinks it incompatible with the spirit of the Constitution. If we attempt to provide for the internal improvement of the country, the Constitution, according to some gentlemen, stands in our way. If we attempt to protect American industry against foreign policy and the rivalry of foreign industry, the Constitution presents an insuperable obstacle! This Constitution must be a most singular instrument! It seems to be made for any other people than our own. Its action is altogether foreign. Congress has power to lay duties and imposts, under no other limitation whatever than that of their being uniform throughout the United States. But they can only be imposed, according to the honorable gentleman, for the sole purpose of revenue. This is a restriction which we do not find in the Constitution. No doubt revenue was a principal object with the framers of the Constitution, in investing Congress with the power; but, in executing it, may not the duties and imposts be so laid as to secure domestic interests? Or, is Congress denied all discretion as to the amount or the distribution of the duties and imposts?

The gentleman from Virginia has, however, entirely mistaken the clause of the Constitution on which we rely. It is that which gives to Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. The grant is plenary, without any limitation whatever, and includes the whole power of regulation, of which the subject to be regulated is susceptible. It is as full and complete a grant of the power, as that is to declare war. What is a regulation of commerce? It implies the admission or exclusion of the objects of it, and the terms. Under this power, some articles, by the existing laws, are admitted freely; others are subjected to duties so high as to amount to their prohibition; and various rates of duties are applied to others. Under this power, laws of total non-intercourse with some nations, and embargoes, producing an entire cessation of commerce with all foreign countries, have been, from time to time, passed. These laws, I have no doubt, met with the entire approbation of the gentleman from Virginia. [Mr. BARBOUR said that he was not in Congress.] Wherever the gentleman was, whether on his farm, or in the pursuit of that profession of which he is an ornament, I have no doubt that he gave his zealous support to the laws referred to.

The principle of the system under consideration has the sanction of some of the best and wisest men in all ages—in foreign countries as well as in our own: of the Edwards, of Henry the Great, of Elizabeth, of the Colberts, abroad; of our

Franklin, Jefferson, Madison, Hamilton, at home. But it comes recommended to us by a higher authority than any of these, illustrious as they unquestionably are—by the master spirit of the age—that extraordinary man, who has thrown the Alexanders and the Cæsars infinitely farther behind him than they stood in advance of the most eminent of their predecessors—that singular man who, whether he was seated on his imperial throne, deciding the fate of nations, and allotting kingdoms to the members of his family, with the same composure, if not with the same affection, as that with which a Virginia father divides his plantations among his children, or on the miserable rock of St. Helena, to which he was condemned by the cruelty and the injustice of his unworthy victors, is equally an object of the most intense admiration. He appears to have comprehended, with the rapidity of intuition, the true interests of a State, and to have been able, by the turn of a single expression, to develop the secret springs of the policy of cabinets. We find that Las Casas reports him to have said:

"He opposed the principles of economists, which, he said, were correct in theory, though erroneous in their application. The political constitution of different States, continued he, must render these principles defective; local circumstances continually call for deviations from their uniformity. Duties, he said, which were so severely condemned by political economists, should not, it is true, be an object to the treasury; they should be the guarantee and protection of a nation, and should correspond with the nature and the objects of its trade. Holland, which is destitute of productions and manufactures, and which has a trade only of transit and commission, should be free of all fetters and barriers. France, on the contrary, which is rich in every sort of production and manufactures, should incessantly guard against the importations of a rival, who might still continue superior to her, and also against the cupidity, egotism, and indifference of mere brokers.

"I have not fallen into the error of modern systematizers," said the Emperor, "who imagine that all the wisdom of nations is centered in themselves. Experience is the true wisdom of nations. And what does all the reasoning of economists amount to? They incessantly extol the prosperity of England, and hold her up as our model; but the custom-house system is more burdensome and arbitrary in England than in any other country. They also condemn prohibitions; yet it was England set the example of prohibitions; and they are, in fact, necessary, with regard to certain objects. Duties cannot adequately supply the place of prohibitions; there will always be found means to defeat the object of the legislator. In France we are still very far behind on these delicate points, which are still unperceived or ill understood by the mass of society. Yet, what advancement have we not made? What correctness of ideas has been introduced by my gradual classification of agriculture, industry, and trade; objects so distinct in themselves, and which present so great and positive a graduation!

"1st. Agriculture; the soul, the first basis of the empire.

"2d. Industry; the comfort and happiness of the population.

"3d. Foreign trade; the superabundance, the proper application of the surplus of agriculture and industry.

"Agriculture was continually improving during the whole course of the revolution. Foreigners thought it ruined in France. In 1814, however, the English were compelled to admit that we had little or nothing to learn from them.

"Industry or manufactures, and internal trade, made immense progress during my reign. The application of chemistry to the manufactures caused them to advance with giant strides. I gave an impulse, the effects of which extended throughout Europe.

"Foreign trade, which, in its results, is infinitely inferior to agriculture, was an object of subordinate importance in my mind. Foreign trade is made for agriculture and home industry, and not the two latter for the former. The interests of these three fundamental cases are diverging and frequently conflicting. I always promoted them in their natural gradation; but I could not and ought not to have ranked them all on an equality. Time will unfold what I have done, the national resources which I created, and the emancipation from the English, which I brought about. We have now the secret of the commercial treaty of 1783. France still exclaims against its author; but the English demanded it on pain of resuming the war. They wished to do the same after the Treaty of Amiens; but I was then all powerful; I was a hundred cubits high. I replied, that if they were in possession of the heights of Montmartre, I would still refuse to sign the treaty. These words were echoed through Europe.

"The English will now impose some such treaty on France, at least if popular clamor, and the opposition of the mass of the nation, do not force them to draw back. This thralldom would be an additional disgrace in the eyes of that nation, which is now beginning to acquire a just perception of her own interests.

"When I came to the head of the Government, the American ships, which were permitted to enter our ports on the score of their neutrality, brought us raw materials, and had the impudence to sail from France without freight, for the purpose of taking in cargoes of English goods in London. They moreover had the insolence to make their payments, when they had any to make, by giving bills on persons in London. Hence the vast profits reaped by the English manufacturers and brokers, entirely to our prejudice. I made a law that no American should import goods to any amount without immediately exporting their exact equivalent. A loud outcry was raised against this: it was said that I had ruined trade. But what was the consequence? Notwithstanding the closing of my ports, and in spite of the English, who ruled the seas, the Americans returned and submitted to my regulations! What might I not have done under more favorable circumstances?

"Thus I naturalized in France the manufacture of cotton, which includes:—

"1st. Spun-cotton.—We did not previously spin it ourselves; the English supplied us with it as a sort of favor.

"2d. The web.—We did not yet make it; it came to us from abroad.

"3d. The printing.—This was the only part of the manufacture that we performed ourselves. I wished to naturalize the two first branches; and I proposed to the Council of State that their importation should be prohibited. This excited great alarm. I sent for Oberkamp, and conversed with him a long time. I learned from him that this prohibition would doubtless produce a shock, but that, after a year or two of perseverance, it would prove a triumph, whence we should derive immense advantages. Then I issued my decree in spite of all; this was a true piece of statesmanship.

"I at first confined myself merely to prohibiting the web; then I extended the prohibition to spun cotton; and we now possess within ourselves the three branches of the cotton manufacture, to the great benefit of our population, and the injury and regret of the English—which proves that in civil government, as well as in war, decision of character is often indispensable to success.

I would trouble the Committee with only one other quotation, which I shall make from Lowe, and from hearing which the Committee must share with me in the mortification which I felt on perusing it. That author says: "It is now above forty years since the United States of America were definitively separated from us, and since their situation has afforded a proof that the benefit of mercantile intercourse may be retained, in all its extent, without the care of governing, or the expense of defending, these once regretted provinces." Is there not too much truth in this observation? By adhering to the foreign policy, which I have been discussing, do we not remain essentially British, in every thing but the form of our Government? Are not our interests, our industry, our commerce, so modified as to swell British pride, and to increase British power?

Mr. Chairman our Confederacy comprehends within its vast limits great diversity of interests—agricultural, planting, farming, commercial, navigating, fishing, manufacturing. No one of these interests is felt in the same degree, and cherished with the same solicitude, through all parts of the Union. Some of them are peculiar to particular sections of our common country. But all these great interests are confided to the protection of one Government—to the fate of one ship; and a most gallant ship it is, with a noble crew. If we prosper, and are happy, protection must be extended to all—it is due to all. It is the great principle on which obedience is demanded from all. If our essential interests cannot find protection from our own Government against the policy of foreign Powers, where are they to get it? We did not unite for sacrifice, but for preservation. The inquiry should be, in reference to the great interests of every section of the Union, (I speak not of minute subdivisions,) What would be done for those interests if that section stood alone and separated from the residue of the Republic? If the promotion of those interests would not injuriously affect any other section, then every thing should be done for them which would be done if it formed a distinct Government. If they come into absolute collision with the interests of another section, a reconciliation, if possible, should be attempted, by mutual concession, so as to avoid a sacrifice of the prosperity of either to that of the other. In such a case, all should not be done for one, which would be done if it were separated and independent, but something; and, in devising the measure, the good of each part and of the whole should be carefully consulted. This is the only mode by which we can preserve, in full vigor, the harmony of the whole Union. The South entertains one opinion, and imagines that a modification of the existing policy of the country, for the protection of American industry, involves the ruin of the South. The North, the East, the West, hold the opposite opinion, and feel, and contemplate, in a longer adherence to the foreign policy, as it now exists, their utter destruction. Is it true that the interests of these great sections of our country are irreconcilable with each other? Are we reduced to the sad and afflicting dilemma of determining which shall fall a victim to the prosperity of the other? Happily, I think, there is no such distressing alternative. If the North, the West, and the East, formed an independent State, unassociated with the South, can there be a doubt that the restrictive system would be carried to the point of prohibition of every foreign fabric of which they produce the raw material, and which they could manufacture? Such would be their policy, if they stood alone; but they are, fortunately, connected with the South, which believes its interest to require a free admission of foreign manufactures. Here, then, is a case for mutual concession, for fair compromise. The bill under consideration presents this compromise. It is a medium between the absolute exclusion and the unrestricted admission of the produce of foreign industry. It sacrifices the interest of neither section to that of the other; neither, it is true, gets all that it wants, nor is subject to all that it fears. But it has been said that the South obtains nothing in this compromise. Does it lose any thing? is the first question. I have endeavored to prove that it does not, by showing that a mere transfer is effected in the source of the supply of its consumption from Europe to America; and that the loss, whatever it may be, of the sale of its great staple in Europe, is compensated by the new market created in America. But does the South really gain nothing in this compromise? The consumption of the other sections, though somewhat restricted, is still left open, by this bill, to foreign fabrics purchased by Southern staples. So far its operation is beneficial to the South, and prejudicial to the industry of the other sections, and that is the point of mutual concession. The South will also gain by the extended consumption of its great staple, produced by an increased capacity to consume it, in consequence of the establishment of the home market. But the South cannot exert its industry and enterprise in the business of manufactures. Why not? The difficulties, if not exaggerated, are artificial, and may, therefore, be surmounted. But can the other sections embark in the planting occupations of the South? The obstructions which forbid them are natural, created by the immutable laws of God, and therefore unconquerable.

Other and animating considerations invite us to adopt the policy of this system. Its importance, in connexion with the general defence in time of war, cannot fail to be duly estimated. Need I recall to our painful recollection the sufferings, for the want of an adequate supply of absolute necessities, to which the defenders of their country's rights and our entire population were subjected during the late war? Or to remind the Committee of the great advantages of a steady and unfailing source of supply, unaffected alike in war and in peace? Its importance, in reference to the stability of our Union, that paramount and greatest of all our interests, cannot fail warmly to recommend it, or at least to conciliate the forbearance of every patriot bosom. Now our people present the spectacle of a vast assemblage of jealous rivals, all eagerly rushing to the sea board, jostling each other in their way, to hurry off to glutted foreign markets the perishable produce of their labor. The tendency of that policy, in conformity to which this bill is prepared, is to transform these competitors into friends and mutual customers; and, by the reciprocal exchanges of their respective productions, to place the Confederacy upon the most solid of all foundations, the basis of common interest. And is not Government called upon, by every stimulating motive, to adapt its policy to the actual condition and extended growth of our great Republic? At the commencement of our Constitution, almost the whole population of the United States was confined between the Alleghany Mountains and the Atlantic Ocean. Since that epoch, the western part of New York, of Pennsylvania, of Virginia, all the western States and territories, have been principally peopled. Prior to that period we had scarcely any interior. An interior has sprung up, as it were, by enchantment, and along with it new interests and new relations, requiring the parental protection of Government. Our policy should be modified accordingly, so as to comprehend all, and sacrifice none. And are we not encouraged by the success of past experience, in respect to the only article which has been adequately protected? Already have the predictions of the friends of the American system, in even a shorter time than their most sanguine hopes could have anticipated, been completely realized in regard to that article; and the consumption is now better and cheaper supplied with coarse cottons, than it was under the prevalence of the foreign system.

Even if the benefit of the policy were limited to certain sections of our country, would it not be satisfactory to behold American industry, wherever situated, active, animated, and thrifty, rather than persevere in a course which renders us subservient to foreign industry? But these benefits are two-fold, direct, and collateral, and in the one shape or the other, they will diffuse themselves throughout the Union. All parts of the Union will participate, more or less, in both. As to the direct benefit, it is probable that the North and the East will enjoy the largest share. But the West and the South will also participate in them. Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Richmond, will divide with the Northern capitalists the business of manufacturing. The latter city unites more advantages for its successful prosecution than any other place I know, Zanesville, in Ohio, only excepted. And where the direct benefit does not accrue, that will be enjoyed of supplying the raw material and provisions for the consumption of artisans. Is it not most desirable to put at rest and prevent the annual recurrence of this unpleasant subject, so well fitted, by the various interests to which it appeals, to excite irritation and to produce discontent? Can that be effected by its rejection? Behold the mass of petitions which lie on our table, earnestly and anxiously entreating the protecting interposition of Congress against the ruinous policy which we are pursuing. Will these petitioners, comprehending all orders of society, entire States and communities, public companies, and private individuals, spontaneously assembling, cease in their humble prayers by your lending a deaf ear? Can you expect that these petitioners, and others, in countless numbers, that will, if you delay the passage of this bill, supplicate your mercy, should contemplate their substance gradually withdrawn to foreign countries, their ruin slow, but certain, and as inevitable as death itself, without one expiring effort? You think the measure injurious to you; we believe our preservation depends upon its adoption. Our convictions, mutually honest, are equally strong. What is to be done? I invoke that saving spirit of mutual concession under which our blessed Constitution was formed, and under which alone it can be happily administered. I appeal to the South—to the high-minded, generous, and patriotic South—with which I have so often co-operated, in attempting to sustain the honor and to vindicate the rights of our country. Should it not offer, upon the altar of the public good, some sacrifice of its peculiar opinions? Of what does it complain? A possible temporary enhancement in the objects of consumption. Of what do we complain? A total incapacity, produced by the foreign policy, to purchase at any price, necessary foreign objects of consumption. In such an alternative, inconvenient only to it, ruinous to us, can we expect too much from Southern magnanimity? The just and confident expectation of the passage of this bill has flooded the country with recent importations of foreign fabrics. If it should not pass, they will complete the work of destruction of our domestic industry. If it should pass, they will prevent any considerable rise in the price of foreign commodities, until our own industry shall be able to supply competent substitutes.

To the friends of the tariff I would also anxiously appeal. Every arrangement of its provision does not suit each of you; you desire some further alterations; you would make it perfect. You want what you will never get. Nothing human is perfect. And I have seen, with great surprise, a piece signed by a member of Congress, published in the "National Intelligencer," stating that this bill must be rejected, and a judicious tariff brought in as its substitute. A judicious tariff! No member of Congress could have signed that piece; or, if he did, the public ought not to be deceived. If this bill do not pass, unquestionably no other can pass at this session, or probably during this Congress. And who will go home and say that he rejected all the benefits of this bill, because molasses has been subjected to the enormous additional duty of five cents per gallon? I call, therefore, upon the friends of the American policy to yield somewhat of their own peculiar wishes, and not to reject the practicable in the idle pursuit after the unattainable. Let us imitate the illustrious example of the framers of the Constitution, and always remembering that whatever springs from man partakes of his imperfections, depend upon experience to suggest, in future, the necessary amendments.

We have had great difficulties to encounter. 1. The splendid talents which are arrayed in this House against us. 2. We are opposed by the rich and powerful in the land. 3. The Executive Government, if any, affords us but a cold and equivocal support. 4. The importing and navigating interests, I verily believe from misconception, are adverse to us. 5. The British factors and the British influence are inimical to our success. 6. Long established habits and prejudices oppose us. 7. The reviewers and literary speculators, foreign and domestic. And, lastly, the leading presses of the country, including the influence of that which is established in this city, and sustained by the public purse.

From some of these, or other causes, the bill may be postponed, thwarted, defeated. But the cause is the cause of the country, and it must and will prevail. It is founded in the interests and affections of the people. It is as native as the granite deeply embosomed in our mountains. And, in conclusion, I would pray God, in His infinite mercy, to avert from our country the evils which are impending over it, and, by enlightening our councils, to conduct us into that path which leads to riches, to greatness, to glory.

When Mr. CLAY had concluded, Mr. RANKIN, of Mississippi, rose and spoke till past three o'clock, when he gave way for a motion that the Committee rise, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 1.

Mr. RICH, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Amasa Stetson," reported the same with an amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act confirming certain acts of James Miller, as Governor of the Territory of Arkansas, and for other purposes;" and "An act altering the times of holding the courts in the District of Columbia;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill to amend the several acts laying duties on imports, Mr. CONDUCT in the Chair.

Mr. RANKIN resumed and concluded the speech he commenced yesterday on the general principles of the bill. His remarks are given entire, as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I must leave to others the admiration of that wonderful system of policy adopted by England, which has raised her national debt to the enormous sum of 800,000,000 of pounds sterling, the interest of which is 30,000,000 per annum, a system which, by prohibitions and attempts to protect her manufactures, as I shall presently show, has made a large portion of her people paupers, and which compels her to pay annually, for England and Wales only, in the support of the poor, £6,000,000; a sum exceeding in amount the whole revenue of the United States; a policy which requires her to put a tax on malt, beer, and spirits distilled from grain, with the addition of leather, of £9,150,000; a policy which compels her, with a population one-third less than that of France, to raise a revenue of £44,000,000 for the support of Government, while France meets her expenses by a revenue of £37,000,000, (when it ought, having regard to her population, to be nearly £60,000,000;) a policy which requires every thing to be taxed, except the air her people breathe; others may admire this wonderful system, and "that stupendous monument of human wisdom, the British constitution;" but, I hope to be permitted to look with humble admiration on the Constitution, the institutions, and policy of my own country; a policy which, in less than half a century, has elevated us to a pinnacle of happiness and prosperity which no nation in Europe has reached, in the slow progress of more than ten centuries; a policy which leaves men to pursue wealth and happiness in that way which is most agreeable to them, protected, but not oppressed by legislation; a policy which does not propose to tax one portion of the community for the benefit of another; does not attempt to force into existence things for which we are not prepared; does not subject a man's home to the inquisitive and odious search of the exciseman; or waste the fruits of his industry for the tax gatherer; but which protects all classes, in their lawful pursuits, and fosters industry every where. Gentlemen may, if they please, call this "foreign policy a ruinous system." I have no hesitation in avowing myself its advocate. I am also an advocate for the purchase of an article manufactured by foreign hands, when I can procure it for a price one-third or one-half less than that manufactured in my own country. I do this, first, from a principle which governs almost every one; because it is my interest to do so; and secondly, because it is the interest of the community to which I belong. The public interest is but the aggregate of every individual interest in society. I am not the advocate of any system, the design of which is to make men wealthy without capital, industry, or economy, by imposing taxes on some more prosperous or industrious portion of the nation.

The South, sir, said Mr. R., has been often mentioned in the course of this discussion, and the patriotism of the South has been appealed to with peculiar force. What does the South demand of Congress? Only that her capital and industry may not be taxed for the benefit of some other section of the Union. She asks not that the North and the West be taxed for her benefit, (as has been alleged,) but to pay her proportions of the public burdens, as she necessarily does, by paying her portion of the duties imposed for the purposes of revenue, on the articles of foreign manufacture she consumes. It is the excellency of our system of collecting revenue, that it is wholly immaterial whether the duty be collected in New York, Philadelphia, or elsewhere; every individual pays his portion of that duty on the article he consumes—no matter where his residence may be—he pays no more—he can pay no more. The allegation, therefore, that the North and West are taxed for the benefit of the South, is without a shadow of foundation. The charge that our policy compels the freemen of the West to become “the slaves of slaves,” comes very ungraciously from the honorable Speaker, many of the products of manufactures of whose own State, and perhaps of his own plantation, pass through the hands of slaves, and to the use of which we might object, if the objection be a good one, and prefer the productions and manufactures of Ohio and Indiana, or those of the North. If the article or commodity suits the purchaser, both in price and quality, there can be no propriety in inquiring by what hands it was produced or manufactured; nor do I presume the gentleman himself would stoop to make such an inquiry.

The picture, said Mr. R., drawn by the Speaker, of the condition of our country, if true, would be melancholy indeed, and might strongly urge the interposition of Congress, for the relief of all, (with the exception of the manufacturing interest, which, I think, he admits to be rather more prosperous than any other,) could any general system of relief be devised. Such a gloomy picture, if confined to this House or to this nation, would be harmless, I am sure, because no one would discover its resemblance to the actual state of things. But foreign nations may believe it, and sympathize with us. Much of the gloom is, however, removed by his admission that the necessities of life, for which the poor of other nations are suffering, are every where here in great abundance; so abundant that they can neither be consumed nor sold; but are actually rotting in the barns and granaries. He represents the prices of cotton, rice, and tobacco, the great staples of the South, as rapidly declining also, and consequently, it will be unnecessary to adopt a course of legislation to reduce us more rapidly to the common level of distress. We must necessarily adapt ourselves to the state of things which exists, and may hereafter exist, and not endeavor, by mere legislation, to create wealth and capital where none exists. Of this system of legislation, I had supposed a portion of the West, at least, had received sufficient information, from their own experience to condemn it and even make it horrible. It was not sufficient that they had the means of living and becoming wealthy in the ordinary way, but they must become wealthy by the creation of banking institutions, and large issues of bank notes, which gave a factitious value to every thing; destroyed credit; called for a suspension of the collection of debts in the ordinary way; ruined individuals: all of which was consummated with general calamity, if not disgrace. From such a course of legislation, I wish the General Government, at least, to be exempted. The remedy consists in men conforming themselves to the existing condition of affairs, and which they will soon do, if undisturbed by vain and deceitful attempts to relieve them, all of which but sink them deeper in the abyss of misery.

I regret, said Mr. R., that this bill, calculated so deeply to affect all the interests and every class of industry, had not reached this House through the ordinary channel. It has been customary, in such cases, to receive a report of the probable effects of such a measure, upon the revenue and the industry of the country, from the officer who presides over its finances, accompanied by statements of such rates of duty as might be expedient or proper. For such a duty, the officer who directs that department ought to be, and no doubt is, better qualified by information, and a knowledge of the experience of this country, and of other countries, than any individual member, whose pursuits in life may have been diversified, and not much directed to the investigation of such subjects. Such a report should also have passed under the revision of that committee which examines the ways and means of the nation. But what have we presented for our adoption? A bill, reported by a Committee on Manufactures, the professed object of which is to protect manufactures. Thus, one class of industry assumes the privilege of saying to every other what amount they shall severally contribute to its support. Such a state of things is necessarily calculated to awaken suspicion, distrust, and alarm. But, on this subject, we are not left to suspect the design of this measure from its name and its source, as it bears the impress of its character in almost every feature which belongs to it. Many, and indeed most, of the duties proposed, amount to an immediate, or, at no very distant day a prohibition of the foreign manufacture; and the gentleman at the head of the Committee on Manufactures has had the candor to avow that such was its object. Against such a system I must protest.

I shall not, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. R., attempt to establish the unconstitutionality of this measure, but will leave that point to be discussed by other gentlemen. With those who believe that, under the power “to collect taxes,” “regulate commerce,” or “lay imposts,” we have the right to tax every other class of industry to force into existence a particular interest, it would be useless to argue, as they have found, and are determined to exercise, the power. I regret to say, sir, that I never have, since I have been in this House, found a majority of this body desirous and determined to exercise a power, that they have not found such power, if not in the letter of the Constitution, in the spirit of it; if not in the spirit, in what have been very appropriately called “the vagrant powers of the Constitution.”

There are some truths, sir, in political economy, as well as in mathematics, which derive but little force from illustration, and only require to be stated to be believed. Such, I humbly conceive, would be the declaration that all violent attempts to regulate and direct the pursuits of industry in society must produce an unnatural state of things. I know society is itself an artificial body compared with the savage state, which is the natural one. By the natural state of things, I only mean that where there is no attempt by law to regulate and direct the pursuits of men from those occupations and employments which they believe most advantageous. As the natural body is in the best condition when neither stimulants nor depletion is required, so is the political body the most sound and healthy where there are the fewest attempts to force industry from its ordinary and natural course. The proposed system leaves nothing to the discretion and discernment of men—nothing to its natural course. It is also true (and the Speaker admits that truth) that capital, if permitted, will always find its place of profitable employment, as naturally as water will find its common level. From the spirit of enterprise in this country, and the few habits we have to subdue, this truth is peculiarly applicable to the people of this country. What portion of the habitable globe; what howling wilderness, no matter what its depth; what ocean, no matter how remote, or what climate, no matter how inhospitable,—has not been visited by our adventurous people, in pursuit of wealth? Even the depths of ocean have been made tributary to their wishes in this pursuit. This bill proposes to direct the employment of capital, and leaves nothing to individual discretion. What, again, can be more true, than that free importation produces lowness and uniformity in the price of every thing we desire to purchase, by inviting competition, and enabling you to purchase from those who can produce or manufacture cheapest? In this way, you are not sensibly affected by the changes of season, or the destruction of crops, nor are you subjected to the extortion of those from whom you have no alternative but to buy at their own prices. It would, perhaps, add a pang to those of death to be murdered by the hand of a friend; and there can be but little satisfaction in knowing that you were robbed or taxed unnecessarily and improperly for the benefit of professed friends, instead of by those indifferent to your fate. This bill does not permit you to buy where you can buy cheapest, and sell where you can sell dearest, but compels you to purchase at any price the domestic manufacturer may please to demand.

“Will you not protect your own industry, your own manufactures,” has been echoed in every part of this Union, and often within the walls of this House? Yes; I will protect, so far as my vote goes, every species of industry; but no one exclusively. But let us understand the meaning of this word protection, which has been latterly used to signify any thing but protection. When foreign Governments give a bounty on a manufactured article when exported, and the duty imposed by our Government does counteract the effects of that bounty, we are strictly protecting our produce or manufacture, by imposing a duty that will prevent foreign producers or manufacturers from competing in our own market, and with our own producer or manufacturer, on terms of advantage. We also protect our industry or manufactures, when we impose a duty to prevent foreigners in our immediate vicinity from coming into our market with such produce as we raise in abundance—when their proximity to our shores, by subjecting them to but little expense, enables them to come there, and compete with our own people on equal, or nearly equal, terms. Such is the effect of our legislation, in relation to the fisheries, and the duty we impose on foreign sugar and cotton. The discriminating duties on tonnage has had also the effect of protecting our shipping against the regulations of foreign nations, and the competition of their seamen. In some cases it happens that your policy or your laws have created institutions, and forced the investiture of capital in manufactories, or otherwise; and, in all such cases, the Government cannot, consistently, at once abandon its course, by which ruin would fall upon a class of citizens invited to particular pursuit by existing laws, and resting on the faith of the Government. Some things in the tariff of 1816 were doubtless affected by this principle. But when an adequate protection is afforded, even by adventitious circumstances, there can be no necessity for claiming the interposition of the Government, for any thing beyond that adequate protection; and there is no propriety in the interference of the Government in such a case. The present duty laid upon foreign manufactures for the purposes of revenue, is estimated by those familiar with those subjects, to amount, on an average, to 40 or 50 per cent., and would, doubtless, give adequate protection, were we prepared to manufacture. On some things the duty is 7½, and on others 200 per cent. When you add to those duties the price of freight from the place of exportation, with insurance, commissions, and the various profits and charges, before they reach the consumer, the price is greatly enhanced from the original price of the manufacture. From this duty, together with freight, insurance, &c., the domestic manufacturer is exempted; and it necessarily operates as a premium to him of that amount, as he can add all those things from which he is exempted, to the price of every thing he manufactures, and sell at the same price as the foreign manufacturer. This is an indirect tax on the consumer, and is not noticed. It is a protection not to the industry of the farmer and planter, who does not believe when he purchases an article he wants of the merchant, that if his own manufacturers were at all prepared to manufacture, they ought to be able to sell it to him one-fourth or one-half cheaper; and that one-fourth or one-third, and, in many cases, one-half of the price he pays for an article, operates as a premium on domestic manufactures. When these facts are disclosed, the plain common sense of every man would induce him to say, at once, "why, these people are already sufficiently protected." Whence, then, this cry—"Will you not protect your own industry, your own manufactures?" It is all a delusion. Public men, instead of joining in that cry, should say to the people, your manufactures are already protected by a duty averaging 40 or 50 per cent.; and, if they cannot succeed with such protection, it is evident our country is not prepared to manufacture. When our millions of acres of unseated lands are populated, and it becomes an object to find employment for a portion of our people who cannot be employed in agriculture, and when the price of labor is reduced to something like the price of labor in Europe, we shall then manufacture; but, until that period arrives, it is vain to attempt to force them over obstacles they cannot surmount. These manufacturers, they might say, by protection, mean prohibition, and that foreign manufactures must be excluded by high duties, to enable them to obtain the monopoly of the market.

In the further prosecution of the examination of this interesting subject, and for the purpose of showing the effects of such a system on the whole community, I have, Mr. Chairman, proposed to examine its effects on the commerce, the agriculture, the manufactures, the revenue, the morals, and the liberty of the country. If no one of these great interests can be promoted, as I shall attempt to show, by the passing of this bill, it most certainly ought to be rejected.

Commerce, sir, (said Mr. R.) deals in the exchange of the raw material, the money, or the manufactured articles of one country for those of another. If we continue to exchange with other nations, as heretofore, no protection is afforded to our manufactures for what ceases to be consumed ceases to be imported; and, in proportion as we substitute our own for foreign fabrics, our commerce is diminished; so far as the present bill goes, and it goes far enough to exclude the most of the foreign manufactures we want, it excludes them from our market, which exclusion must be followed by almost the total annihilation of our commerce. But, it has been said that, "if we export we will import." We have heretofore imported necessities, and, I presume, according to the new doctrine, we shall import something which is not necessary, and which we cannot use. If it be true that, "if we export we will import," it must be equally true that, if we cease to import, we shall cease to export, and that importation and exportation keep pace with each other. The bill proposes to diminish our importations, and force us to consume our own productions and manufactures, and consequently, most seriously affects our commerce. The number of persons to be affected by this change is considerable, and they are a class of people whose labor and industry ought not to be sacrificed to promote those of the manufacturer, who less deserves your protection. In this branch of industry, which has arisen without your protection, except so far as I have stated protection was strictly due from the Government to its citizens, there are estimated to be 40,000 mariners employed, and, in the various employments of shipwrights, boat builders, sailmakers, chandlers, &c., 250,000, making an aggregate of 290,000 persons. The greatest number which the Speaker could find employment for under his new system, and that number much exaggerated, as must be evident from a knowledge of the powers of machinery, was 500,000 persons, and those must be employed by the loss either immediate or ultimate of something like $7,000,000 of our revenue. Is this just? Is this right? In this experiment, you jeopardize, if you do not destroy, as is probable, upwards of 800,000 tons of tonnage engaged in the foreign trade, and which produces annually, of national wealth, by mere labor, about $70,000. A considerable trade is carried on from the North to the West Indies in lumber and the various products of the soil, which is supposed to be worth about $150,000 per annum, and a trade in ice, which requires no capital, brings to the country $100,000. In return for these, the various products of the West Indies are imported to the United States. The proposed duty on molasses, fruits, and spirits, must utterly destroy this trade by its prohibitory action. Who does not remember that, in the last war, when treachery, defeat, and disaster, attended our first efforts, or when at best but doubtful success crowned the most brilliant achievements of our arms, the rapturous enthusiasm that filled every bosom at the victories achieved by our navy. The gallant spirits who covered themselves and the nation with glory; exalted us in our own estimation as a people; made every man, when in a foreign country, lay his hand on his breast, and proudly say, I am an American citizen, where, but shortly before, he concealed himself with shame; and established for us a name and an elevated standing among the nations of the earth, were not reared amidst the fumes of the oil and the noise of the machinery of a manufactory. They were "children of the deep, and nurselings of the storm;" their home was from infancy on ocean, and "their path the mountain wave." There they had learned to discharge their duty—to contemn danger, and disregard death. This school for our navy, for which there can be no substitute when our commerce is destroyed, gentlemen would destroy, and erect on its ruins a thing, as yet in this country, unknown—the untried system of forcing into existence manufactures. Commerce is the handmaid of agriculture and manufactures, and bears their surplus to other countries for a market. Without it, no nation has flourished, from the time of Carthage, of Venice, and the prosperous periods of the Spanish nation, down to that of England, which has excited the admiration, and called forth the eloquent eulogium of the Speaker of this House. Carthage and Venice, it is true, perished in consequence of the prosperity they attained by commerce; but, from the causes of their destruction we are happily free. Carthage was but a speck on the margin of the Mediterranean, and Venice like an excrescence from the ocean. The enemy had but to strike a single part of either, and the whole was destroyed.

APRIL, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

H. or R.

The rock of our strength is a widely extended country, and a vast preponderance of population, whose pursuits are agriculture. While that state of things exists, we are secure alike against domestic faction and foreign invasion. When a large proportion of our population shall have engaged in commerce and manufactures, and especially in manufactures, the stability of our Government will be diminished. A due proportion of a well regulated commerce brings to a nation the arts, the improvements, and the science of every nation with which it has intercourse. This commerce, which deserves so well the protecting hand of the Government, and which is represented by Mr. Speaker to be in a most languishing and deplorable situation already, ought not certainly to receive from the parental hand of the Government this decisive and fatal blow at its existence.

The main spring of agriculture and industry, is a market, in which we can exchange our surplus produce, our money, or our manufactures, for those of other countries. If the maxim of Mr. Speaker be true, that if they buy "of us nothing, we can buy of them nothing," it must be equally true, that, if we buy of them nothing, they can buy of us nothing. It is a good rule that works both ways. The object of this bill is, so far as possible, to force us to be independent of other nations, and produce the manufacture for ourselves. It is impossible that other nations can pay us in specie $47,000,000, which was the value of the exports of the United States to foreign nations, the last year, and which must, annually, increase, if they were so disposed. They have been enabled to trade with us, especially England, because we received her manufactures in exchange for our raw material; and when we destroy, or mutually diminish that exchange, she cannot, nor would it be her interest, to pursue that unprofitable trade. She will, of course, seek a market where she can trade to advantage. That she will find, in South America and elsewhere, where cotton, the raw material which she most wants, is raised in great abundance, and where her manufactured articles will be in demand. We shall thus, by our policy, find the means of diverting from ourselves our most profitable trade. This exchange with England, if not wholly destroyed, must be much diminished, by the operation of this system. She is supposed, in the last season, to have imported 420,000 bales of cotton; and the amount returned to us, in manufactured articles, after deducting for waste, is only estimated at 40,000 bales, which leaves 380,000 bales to be consumed elsewhere. This she was able to purchase, by the addition of the labor to that portion of the raw material returned to us manufactured; but the object of this bill is to exclude the manufactures, and with that, consequently, to destroy their means of purchasing. If the home market were a substantial substitute for this loss, we should have no reason to complain; but, it is evident it cannot be. England now manufactures 380,000 bales of cotton for her own use, and for the use of those with whom she trades, exclusively of the 40,000 bales returned to us manufactured. We cannot, then, expect a home market for more than 40,000 bales out of 420,000, as we have no market for any more, if manufactured, as we cannot, requiring high protecting duties at home, in addition to the present high duties, to enable us to compete with her in our own market, expect to vend our manufactures in Great Britain, or any other place where she trades. This all tends to show the impolicy of changing a system, when the change would so seriously affect one of our best articles of exportation. The evil effects of such a measure, would not be confined in its operation to that portion of the country immediately affected by it; but, as the South is dependent on the North and West for implements of husbandry, and all the means of subsistence, would necessarily destroy the market now opened to them, by destroying our means of purchasing and by compelling us to use those means which God and nature has placed within our reach, of supplying our own wants, from our own lands. The idea of a home market, for either our produce or manufactures, to any considerable extent, is most fallacious; it has no foundation in reason or truth; but is calculated to delude and deceive the people. This terrapin policy suits no nation with such varieties of soil and climate; such a spirit of enterprise, and such immense resources, as the American people possess.

We are, said Mr. R., necessarily an agricultural people; and many portions of our country must remain so, for years to come. This proceeds from the nature of our country, which differs from the densely populated portions of the old world, in affording to industry the enjoyment of the most fertile lands, at reduced prices; and from which a great abundance is produced, with but little labor. The price of labor is governed by the price for which the inferior soil can be cultivated, where they are compelled to cultivate such soil. The American farmer can, with the same labor, grow more grain than the farmer of any other nation. Hence, he can better afford to pay from 20 to 50 per cent. on goods of foreign manufacture, than have his attention directed from agriculture to domestic manufacture. This state of things will pass away when our population becomes too dense to be supported by the cultivation of the best soil, and to be employed in commerce. Whenever that period arrives, we are then, and not until then, prepared for manufacturing.

The corn laws of England, which prohibit the importation of grain, except when the scarcity very nearly produces famine, had their origin in the protection extended to the manufactures of silk and lace, which are now considered unimportant branches of their manufacturing establishments. The agriculturist demanded of his Government a similar protection to that given the manufacturer. This protection, so reasonable, when the system was commenced, she was compelled to give, and hence the corn laws. This whole system she would abandon if she could, or if she dare. A bad system, when once created by Government, cannot be readily abandoned. [Here Mr. R. read from Lowe's new statistical work, Appendix, page 33, a passage, to show the correctness of his statement, as to the origin of the corn laws, and the opinion of writers on political economy, as to their injurious effects.]

What would be the effect of free trade on England herself, provided her ports were opened to the agricultural products of other nations, and especially those of the United States? She would not then be reduced to the necessity of cultivating inferior soil, where great labor receives but little reward, and keeps up the price of bread; but the price of bread would be diminished, and with the diminished price of bread, the staff of life, the price of labor would fall; and, with the price of labor, the price of manufactured articles dependent on labor. Her manufactures, reduced in price, would enable her to have a monopoly of the market of the whole world. Their policy not only affects them injuriously, but is the best protection which could be presented to our manufactures, by keeping at a high price the necessities of life, labor, and the manufactures which she would be enabled to sell much lower in our market, by pursuing a contrary policy. Her manufactures, however, she must dispose of, or her people perish; and, in order to meet competition abroad, when a season of scarcity arrives, the manufacturer dare not raise the price of wages, because that would raise the price of manufactures, and destroy the sales abroad—throws on society a numerous class of weavers and laborers, clamorous for bread, because perishing with famine. This is the most fruitful source of pauperism in England, and which, it requires six million pounds of poor tax annually to alleviate, without regarding the immense individual suffering, the vices created by pinching want, the prosecutions and convictions, the infamy or execution of many of her citizens, who, if blessed with the distressing abundance which surrounds the people of this country, would have been valuable members of society. In this train follows, also, the rebellions that agitate society, and which require the power of military force to suppress. This is the admirable "American policy," which Mr. Speaker wishes to adopt in this country. A time must come when our country will be subjected to all these calamities; but I hope it is far distant, and I confess I am unwilling to hasten its approach. We must be contented with moderate profits, and not attempt to legislate the nation into wealth, either by issuing bank paper, or forcing into existence establishments which would, least of all, benefit the West, now most clamorous for them.

The manufacturers have been promised the South American markets, in which all their fabrics can be vended. It is truly ridiculous to require something at home, in addition to the protection of a duty averaging forty or fifty per cent. and then believe you can go into a foreign market and monopolize it, limited as that market must be. But I have shown you that, if your system be adopted, you will have driven England there with her manufactures, with whom it will be the interest of the South Americans to trade, because they will receive the raw material wanted by the English, in exchange for their manufactures. You can receive nothing scarcely but specie, unless you import, to the ruin of your own agriculturist, the cotton of South America.

New England is the only manufacturing part of this country, and yet her people do not demand this tariff at your hands. She has the capital, the industry, the economy, and the density of population, that prepares her for manufacturing. But for the emigration of her people to the West, she would now have advanced much further in that branch of industry. The manufacturers know well the effect of the competition created by forcing capital suddenly to any one employment, and generally only ask you to let them alone. Small establishments, which might secretly and silently work their way into an honorable and comfortable existence, with the numerous individuals now employed in manufacturing by hand, would all be prostrated by your policy, by the large manufacturing establishments, with immense capital and powerful labor-saving machinery. From your system, the nabobs, who are represented as hostile to it, would alone derive benefit. The Digest of Manufactures, prepared by the Secretary of State, shows that many of the manufactories of coarse cotton, after the tariff of 1816, perished by competition. They do not, like the Kilkenny cats, devour each other, all except the tails; but one great establishment rises on the ruins of all the surrounding inferior ones—gorged and bloated with the spoils, and smiling at the desolation created. The prudent manufacturer also fears a reaction, when the people shall have felt their revenue seriously diminished, and shall see a resort to excise or direct taxes necessary; when they have witnessed the prostration of commerce, and shall know, from experience, the delusion of this home market. Society, like a mighty collection of waters, rests peacefully, if undisturbed. A single wave cannot be raised from its bosom, and suddenly sink into tranquillity; but a thousand successive waves are borne impetuously to the shore, and are returned, broken and murmuring into the mass of waters. The people may not be satisfied with reducing things to their present situation.

When we are at all prepared, sir, said Mr. R., to manufacture, the present duties will be found a sufficient protection; and, until we have the requisite industry, economy, and capital, and a population which cannot be employed in agriculture and commerce, we vainly and imprudently attempt to force manufactures into existence. That we are not prepared, is demonstrated by the positions of the advocates of this bill. We have "infinite advantages (says Mr. Speaker) of soil and of internal navigation," &c. If we cannot manufacture with these advantages, and with large protection from duties, what does this prove, but that we are not ready to manufacture? What does the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures say, as to our natural advantages? "We have ten acres," says he, "for one in Europe, fit only for the culture of hemp;" and yet, it seems, we cannot manufacture even cotton, bagging, without a protecting duty of 50 per cent. We have territories of lead, and on navigable waters; yet it cannot be protected by a duty of 12½ per cent., the present duty; but a duty of 25 per cent. is necessary, and, on manufactured lead, higher in proportion. We have a climate which will produce wool every where, and a duty of 15 per cent. to protect it; yet we cannot have it produced in this country. We have iron ore in great abundance, fuel, and labor, and iron is now protected by a duty of at least 40 per cent.; yet the makers of iron are suffering for protection. We have grain in abundance, yes, "rotting in our barns and granaries," and a duty on foreign spirits averaging 200 per cent.; yet, this is not a sufficient protection to domestic industry. When you add to these advantages the low price of land, the abundance of fuel, convenience of navigation, and the exemption from the payment of freight, duty, insurance, commissions, &c., to which the foreign producer and manufacturer are subjected, and find we cannot grow or manufacture, is it not evident that the cause is not the want of protection; but that it proceeds from causes connected with the new and unsettled state of the country? As men advance gradually from infancy to old age, so does society. No people have been instantaneously a commercial or a manufacturing people. The natural state of man is the savage state—the next, the pastoral, and the next the agricultural. At the settlement of our country, we had passed the first stages, and had agricultural habits, received from the land of our fathers; and our commerce and manufactures are rising into existence as rapidly as they ought. Whenever agriculture, in any country, has a surplus which cannot be consumed by the producer, commerce rises. If a country has, at the same time, a surplus production, at any one point, which cannot be advantageously employed in agriculture, they are their own carriers; if not, other nations carry for them. When the people become too numerous to find employment in agriculture and commerce, they necessarily seek employment in manufactures. But a small portion of our country, and that certainly not the West, with its millions of unseated lands, has ever found that surplus population which prepares a nation to manufacture. The manufacturing age of any nation is the one which precedes and mingles with its decline. Not, indeed, often an enviable period in its history; because, as the markets fluctuate, as affected by war or peace, or the destruction of crops, it brings forth its swarms of paupers and a starving tumultuous people, imploring Government to relieve them from famine, and are ready to join any faction. In our country, with our free institutions and extended right of suffrage, the influence which the proprietor of a large manufactory must have over those dependent on him for bread, would be severely felt, in destroying the freedom of elections. The command over a man's means of subsistence and that of his family, independently of that servile disposition which dependence creates, gives a command over his will and his freedom. The slavish condition of the laborers employed in manufactories, and in which they only engage from necessity, has a tendency, also, to destroy both the spirit of patriotism and the physical energy on which the nation might rely, from her militia, in times of war. It is, therefore, calculated to impair our means of national defence and destroy the best feelings of patriotism. I know the correct manner in which the manufactories now established are conducted, and the attention paid to the preservation of morals. But these establishments are now in their infancy, and have a character to create. The time must come, as it has in other countries, when the proprietors will be more anxious to increase their wealth than preserve the morals of their laborers. All experience shows that the contagion of example and the effect of association, where a great number are collected together, tends to contaminate the morals of the whole. The people of cities hence, are less virtuous than the people dispersed, in their habitations, through the country. The Speaker, with a view to another point, states an important fact in relation to the increase of our population. We double our population, he says, in about twenty-five years, while scarcely any other nation has the same result in less than a century. To what other causes can that be attributed but to an exemption from a precarious support, to be obtained by labor in manufactories, and to the ease with which lands can be procured and a family supported, inviting to early marriages? I am not willing to destroy this course of national strength and wealth, by forcing men from agriculture. Who has not witnessed, with pleasure, the happy effects of emigration to the new and unseated parts of our country? A man, with his wife and family of small children, leaves a part of the country where the high price of lands prevent him either from being able to purchase or rent. His earthly substance, with the children unable to walk, are packed upon a horse, followed by himself and wife and those able to travel. In this way he pursues a journey of some hundreds if not thousands of miles, seats himself on lands that soon becomes his own; plenty smiles around him, and he dies with the pleasing thought that his children are freemen, and not slaves—the lords of the soil. On a people of such enterprise, thus educated, you can depend, in the day of battle. There is something in the freedom of the country, in the ownership of the soil—no matter whether the proprietor be seated on the fertile plain, or his habitation be perched near the eagle's nest on the mountain side—which inspires a feeling of independence and a love of country that nothing produced in any other situation can equal. With what enthusiasm, in the last war, did even mothers surrender their darling sons, the only prop of declining age, for their country's defence; and with what Spartan heroism did they offer their lives on the northern and northwestern frontier and on the plains of Orleans? While this proportion of this kind of population greatly exceeds all others, our national defence, liberty, and independence, are secure. Not so when the manufacturing class preponderates. We are then verging to old age and dissolution. I would not, willingly, drive men from those pursuits that make them independent, patriotic, wealthy, virtuous, and happy, to those which make them poor, dependent, servile, corrupt, miserable slaves. I would increase the number of the cultivators of the soil; for there, should ever liberty desert our country, will her last vestiges be found. If this be "foreign policy," I do not blush to be its advocate.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

This brings me, Mr. Chairman, to examine the probable effects of this bill on the revenue, should it pass into a law. Our mode of collecting the whole revenue of the country, from a duty on imports, and which is collected with little expense, and scarcely felt by the people, is peculiar to this country. It must fail whenever it becomes our interest to manufacture, instead of directing nearly our whole force to agriculture, finding it more advantageous to pay a duty averaging 40 or 50 per cent. on foreign manufactures, than to manufacture for ourselves. For, it is evident, when our state, as that of England does her, enables us to manufacture, the distance and expenses attending importation will not only protect our own manufactures, but prohibit importation. If this state of things be permitted to arrive gradually, we become better able to bear excise and direct taxes, and may gradually impose them to meet the deficiency in the revenue. If brought upon us, at this time, we are wholly unprepared to meet them, and I am certain would not bear them. That the design of this bill is to diminish importation, and to act as a prohibition, we have from the chairman of the committee who reported it to the House. He says we import, annually, upwards of $15,000,000 of foreign articles, which we can have as well, and better, in our own country, and which, I presume, it is intended to prohibit, as quickly as possible. If this bill will not answer the purpose, I have no doubt he would consent to report one which would. But, sir, no declaration of intention was necessary. No man can examine this bill without feeling that, regardless of the design, the effect would be to prohibit, or nearly so, the importation of goods, the duties on which, from a statement laid on our tables, amount to upwards of seven millions of dollars. But, admit it should not go the whole extent of prohibition to that amount, even a considerable portion could not be borne, and the Government supported, without resort to internal taxes. The mode of laying the duty on coarse cottons and woollens, is extremely exceptionable, because calculated to deceive. If the intention of the committee was to place a duty of from 93½ to 117 per cent. immediately, and from 104 to 130, after June, 1825, on coarse woollens called plains, and a duty of from 78 to 111 per cent. on printed calicoes, why not say so, in direct terms, and not make a duty nominally only 25 per cent. by fixing the price of a yard at one-third more than it cost, make duty much higher than it appears. The duty on coarse cottons, by the tariff of 1816, was nominally 25 per cent., but every yard was estimated to have cost 25 cents, a price more than three times its real cost, at the place of manufacture, and which made the duty really more than 80 per cent. Here let me remark, that, if the duty of 1816 on coarse cottons, operated as a prohibition, as it really did, the duty I have mentioned on coarse calicoes and plains ought to have, and would have, the same effect. The proposed duty on cotton shirting is from 49 to 70 per cent.; on cotton checks it is from 67½ to 70 per cent.; on brown Holland, 72 per cent.; on osnaburgs and cotton bagging, about 50 per cent.; and on paper, about 66 per cent. The articles are selected to show the general character of the bill, and to justify my remark, which I have made, that it is, in its nature, prohibitory. These calculations I have not made, but they are made by those much better acquainted with such things, and who, I presume, would not hazard their reputations by false statements. They are principally found in the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New York. These duties, if they operate to raise the prices, as they must, fall most heavily on a class of people the least able to bear such burdens, the poor and laboring class. A duty on fine cloths could either be paid by the rich, or would leave them the alternative of wearing something of an inferior quality; but the poor have no alternative but to buy at the prices for which they are offered, or do without them. The experience of the last war also shows, that when prices are unusually high, that portion of the community which can do so, resort to family manufactures, and that the use of all others is much diminished. These high duties, then, if attended with any thing like a corresponding high price of the domestic manufacture, instead of giving protection to domestic manufactures, would diminish the consumption, and force all who could to supply their wants by family manufactures. This was seen in the last war.

The effect of high duties, in producing smuggling, with all its concomitant evils, I never can view without horror. For smuggling, no country—not even England—is so well adapted as the United States. An immense seacoast, studded with islands, and extending from Passamaquoddy to the Sabine, and a large portion of that but thinly populated; by land, bounded on the East, the North, the Northwest, and the West, by the territories of other Governments, a portion of which has a chain of lakes united by rivers, to which there are thousands of inlets, affording facilities to smuggling. Hitherto the feelings of our people have been on the side of the Government, because the duties have been moderate, and, although we have the most virtuous people on earth, the experience of the restrictive measures preceding the last war, and the war itself, show that they can be corrupted. All men are liable to be operated on by their avarice or their necessities. A part of one of the best prayers ever uttered, is "Lead us not into temptation." Do not corrupt your people, by making it their interest to be corrupt, or because the demand for necessary clothing, which they cannot otherwise obtain, requires them to be corrupt. When you do, you will find Dirk Hateracks on your coast, and a people ready to deal with and protect him in his illicit trade. Some gentlemen here know that the famous Lafitte supplied one part of the country with goods, through Barataria, during the restrictive measures and the last war, and publicly walked the streets of New Orleans, in defiance of your public officers, and in contempt of your laws. To prevent this, you must increase the number of revenue officers, now under your moderate duties almost unnecessary, except for the mere purpose of collecting them.

But, sir, the gentlemen have found a remedy for the deficiency anticipated by themselves, by the prohibitory nature of this tariff, in the increase of duty on other articles. What are those articles? Molasses, spirits, fruits, and silks, I presume—the proposed duties on which must diminish the consumption, if not wholly prohibit the importation. If it were true that an increase of duty increased the revenue, it would be easy to collect the revenue from a few articles. Experience shows things will bear a reasonable duty, and no more. Go beyond that, and they are smuggled, they are adulterated, the consumption is diminished, or they are prohibited. The maxim of Dean Swift is true, when understood, that, in the science of political arithmetic, two and two do not always make four. Reducing the duty often increases the revenue, and an increase of the duty often diminishes the revenue, and the revenue does not always increase in the proportion the duty is increased. These positions I propose to illustrate by a few of the numerous examples drawn from the experience of England, France, and the United States. Previously to 1784, the duty on tea, in England, was four shillings a pound, and produced £180,000; and when reduced, in 1745, to one shilling per pound, produced, in 1746, £243,309 in revenue. In 1748, the duty on tea was again increased, and fluctuated between 64 and 119 per cent., until 1784, with but little increase of revenue; but the adulteration, by the use of sloe and ash leaves, was practised to an astonishing extent. In the year 1784, the duty was reduced to 12½ per cent., and in the two next years the consumption was trebled, and in 1819 100 per cent. In 1742, the high duties on spirits ceased, in consequence of which the revenue was increased, and morals improved. Let it be remarked, that foreign spirits is one of the items in this bill, and which now pays a duty of 200 per cent. on the average, and the duty on which it is proposed again to increase—a duty which is in its nature prohibitory, and from which we now derive a revenue of upwards of $2,000,000. In 1787, Mr. Pitt reduced the duty on wine 50 per cent., by which the revenue was increased. The duty on coffee was increased in 1805 one-third, by which the revenue was diminished one-eighth, and in 1806, one-sixteenth. It was again, in 1808, reduced from two shillings to seven pence per cwt.; and the revenue, which, for three years preceding the reduction, had averaged only £166,000, increased to £195,000. In 1800, the duty on glass was doubled, but there was no increase of the revenue. In 1813, the duty on leather was doubled, which might have been expected to double the revenue derived from that source; but, although it had previously produced £394,000, it only produced half a million. The duty on wine, subsequently to the time I have before mentioned, was increased; and, in consequence of that increase, the revenue was diminished one-fourth. A similar instance has been cited, in the course of this discussion, in relation to the revenue of the United States, of an increase of revenue on wines, corresponding with the diminished duty. In France, in 1775, Mr. Turgot is said to have reduced the duty, &c., on fish, in the Paris market; but the revenue was not thereby in the least diminished. From the high duties proposed on the articles from which it is expected the deficiency in the revenue is to be supplied, it appears to me, if experience teaches any thing, the examples I have cited teach us to hope for nothing like an increase of revenue. Although Mr. Speaker is prepared to recommend an excise, I confess I feel some horror at the name of an exciseman; and nothing but a full conviction that nothing else would support the honor, the welfare, and safety, of my country, would induce me to send this odious class of public officers among the people.

I have incidentally shown the corrupting influence of this policy on the morals of the country, by enlisting the feelings of the people against the Government, and in favor of the smuggler, and by collecting people together in numbers; and on the liberty of the country, by its influence on the freedom of elections, and the means of defence by land and sea.

It now becomes my duty, said Mr. R., to examine some of the reasons which are supposed to demand this extraordinary interposition of the Government to rescue a large portion of the people, if not the nation, from degradation and ruin. The balance of trade with other nations, it is said, is against us, as appears from the Treasury reports, and books of the custom-houses. Indeed, the balance of trade has in this way appeared against us constantly, from the origin of our Government, and foreign nations continue to deal with us, and we are not ruined. The very suggestion is so ridiculous, that had it been confined to the Philadelphia mint of pamphlets on the tariff, where, I believe, it originated, I should not have deemed it worthy of notice; but, as it has been echoed and re-echoed within these walls, I propose to give it some examination. Suppose an American merchant exports from one of the ports of the United States a cargo estimated at the custom-house at $5,000, which he carries to the West Indies, and, in exchange, obtains the produce of that country, worth $10,000, and which, instead of bringing immediately home, he disposes of in some port of Europe for a cargo of merchandise valued at $20,000, which he imports to the very place which he had previously left with a cargo valued at $5,000. In this instance the balance of trade appears to be against us, as we have imported $15,000 more than we have exported; yet, $15,000 are gained to the nation. Suppose, again, the merchant exports a cargo valued at $10,000 where exported, and which, at the port of destination, he is compelled to sell for $5,000, with which he returns to the United States; here, it would appear, we are doing an excellent business, because a balance of $5,000 more is exported than imported, as appears on the books of the custom-house; yet the nation has lost $5,000. The fallacy of this thing is, that, when our trade is prosperous, the balance is always apparently against us, but when our trade is most disastrous, the balance appears in our favor, in the way I have mentioned. To this you must add many cases where nothing is exported of any value, and where things of value are imported, the products of mere labor. Two or three cases of that kind may be mentioned. We have upwards of 800,000 tons of tonnage engaged in foreign trade and which brings to those engaged in it about $70,000 per annum, which is acquired by mere industry, is imported in the produce or manufactures of other countries, and appears, on the books of the custom-house, that amount against us, in "the balance of trade." A quantity of ice is annually carried from the North to the West India Islands, which brings to the United States, in the produce of those islands, about $100,000, and in that case, also, as nothing is exported that can be valued at the custom-house, a balance of trade of $100,000 appears against us. A most profitable trade to the Pacific presents also a large item in that balance of trade. A fishing vessel leaves New England and proceeds to the South Sea, where, by fishing or trade in furs, she is enabled to make a voyage to the East Indies or China, and returns with a cargo valued at $100,000, when her export was nothing; and, this, again, swells the apparently unfavorable balance of trade.

It is said, sir, and triumphantly said, "Shall we purchase more than we sell, and purchase to a disadvantage?" The meaning of this is, Are we fools, and our creditors worse fools? When an individual purchases more than he can pay for, from a merchant, his credit soon ceases. Englishmen know too well their own interest to continue such a ruinous business, even if we were disposed to encourage it.

It is asked, shall we encourage foreign workmen? I answer, yes; if to our mutual advantage; and for the same reason that a man employs a neighboring mechanic to make his boots and shoes, instead of making them himself or having them made in his own family.

"Our country is said to be perpetually draining of specie." And what is specie but a mere commodity, which we exchange for something we want more? Recent accounts say that from the abundance of specie in England, the exportation of it to this country has commenced. Water accumulated at any certain point soon finds its level, so silver seeks the place of demand, for it passes in and out of a country by a thousand secret channels. From the estimates on this subject, we have been drained, since the commencement of this Government, of more specie than we ever had.

"We must be independent of foreign nations." What God has decreed, man vainly attempts to counteract. The dependence of nations and parts of a nation on each other are marked in the varieties of soil and of climate, and in the dispensations of Providence. Why does not the soil and climate of the North bear the products of the South, or the South yield the products of the North? Why is the crop in one country parched by drought or blighted by mildew, while that of another yields an abundant harvest? These all teach men and nations that they are and must be dependent on each other, and on Him who formed the earth and directs the seasons, and who rules the affairs of men and of nations. The wealthiest and most powerful man is made dependent sometimes on the humblest person in society. This dependence pervades creation, is found among beings rational and irrational; things animate and inanimate.

Some have alleged, or at least intimated, that England has sent goods here to destroy our infant manufactures. Who can believe such a strange suggestion? What nation could afford to do it, if willing? At the time when England is supposed to have made this attempt at the destruction of our manufactures, her people, like ours, suffered from the sudden transition from war to peace, and her manufactures were sacrificed in our markets, while her commerce and her agriculture suffered at home. The war found employment for a large portion of her people, not only in the armies, but in the formation of those manufactures necessary for the supply of the army. Peace not only diverted the whole force previously employed for the army to manufacture for exportation, but also found in possession of the manufacturer a stock on hand which the war had prevented him from exporting and vending. Our merchants rushed to supply the wants of the country by importation. Hence, a scene of universal distress, both in England and America, followed the transition from war to peace, involving all classes in the common misery, and the goods which the merchant or manufacturer were compelled to sacrifice at this period, are doubtless those which gentlemen have fancied imported for the destruction of our infant manufacturers. All classes of men and of industry feel the loss of the market war creates, and time alone restores the equilibrium. Time has done the work which it would be madness to destroy.

The examples of England, France, and Spain, have been mentioned to show the effects of this admirable policy recommended for our adoption. From the description, one would suppose that all the information we have heretofore received from every source, as to the situation of the people of England, was false, and that she had scarcely a beggar or a pauper in her dominions; that her agriculture, her commerce, and her manufactures, were in a most flourishing condition; while we are actually a starving, depressed, miserable people, whose commerce languishes, whose agriculture is depressed, and who implore the aid of Government to save them from utter ruin. We look in vain in this country for the original of such a picture, and a search in England for that unexampled prosperity depicted in such glowing colors, would be equally fruitless. England compared with some other nations of Europe is comparatively prosperous as a nation; while a large portion of her people are without rights and privileges, a poor, wretched, starved, miserable population. Does even the comparative happiness she enjoys proceed from protection to her industry? No, sir; her natural advantages have caused her to triumph over a mistaken policy which she would now abandon, if she dare, or if she could without the destruction of interests and institutions which her own laws have created, and which it would be unjust and impolitic at once to destroy. Opening her ports to the produce of other countries, and especially that of the United States, where, from the low price and good quality of the lands, we produce much with little labor, would at once force the agriculturists of that country, now cultivating inferior soil, to abandon it, from an inability to raise any thing at prices which would enable them to compete with us in the market. It would make her what she is destined to be from her situation, the density of her population, and natural advantages—a manufacturing nation; but must, at the same time, prostrate her agriculture. Such a sudden change would be dangerous and unwise. But one period perhaps has arrived within any recent time, and that a most calamitous one for agriculture, when she could with safety have repealed her corn laws, and that was when the unusual abundance of crops in the year 1816, reduced the price of corn nearly to that for which it could be imported. I have already shown that the best protection for our manufactures proceeds from her corn laws, and that the very best protection she could give to her manufactures would be to open her ports to the productions of other countries, by which the price of bread, of labor, and of her manufactures, would be reduced. Is it true that her manufactures have flourished from the protection extended to them by Government? Such is not the opinion of Mr. Lowe. [Here Mr. R. read, from page 168 of Mr. Lowe's work, a passage to show that, of the whole manufacturing productions of England, consumed at home and abroad, estimated at £123,000,000; the cotton, woollens, and hardware, which is the most profitable portion of them, and which received no protection from the Government, by duty, amounted to £80,000,000; while the chief protection had been extended to the manufacture of silks and laces, admitted to be unprofitable.] England owes her prosperity to her situation, which makes her a commercial nation; to the limited extent of her territory, which denies employment to her people in agriculture; to her system of Government, which is comparatively free; and to religious toleration. The persecutions of the Huguenots on the Continent, also, brought her the most learned and skilful men in Europe, with a knowledge of manufactures, which gave the first impetus to that branch of her industry, and, in proportion, depressed those of the countries from which they were banished.

France, admitted by Mr. Speaker to be the next most prosperous nation of Europe, could not be expected, when deprived of the advantages of situation possessed by England, to equal her in those things dependent on situation. In addition to this, France has long been the scene of the most desolating internal war, while she has waged a perpetual war with all the Powers of Europe, by which her progress in those things that flourish most in times of peace was necessarily retarded. But her people are comparatively happy, and are less burdened with taxes on the necessities of life than the British subjects.

The example of Spain is most unfortunate for gentlemen who advocate this system of protection. Spain, among the most degraded, the most feeble, and the least prosperous of European nations, is, say the political writers, "a Government of imports, prohibitions, duties, and monopolies." The wealth of her foreign possessions, no doubt, contributed to hurl her from that eminence she once proudly occupied among the nations; but, as industry flourishes best when left free to pursue its own course, and seek its place of profitable employment, it is reasonable to suppose that restriction and prohibition contributed largely to crush and depress it.

Another evidence of a most deplorable state of things in this country is derived from a calculation that our exports do not increase in the ratio of our population, or, if they increase, are reduced in price. There is some satisfaction, even if this indicates a want of prosperity, which I am not willing to admit, that our population doubles under all those unfavorable circumstances attending our unhappy condition, in about twenty-five years and that of almost every other nation doubles in about a century. Let it be remembered, that a state of freedom and of plenty alone are favorable to a rapid increase of population. Is it not, let me ask, sir, reasonable to expect, when the peace of 1814, almost as universal as the war which preceded it, had turned millions from the destruction of their own species to the peaceful pursuits of industry, that the abundance in Europe created thereby should diminish their importations, and the price, especially of the products of agriculture?

Mr. Speaker says, if we had war on the continent of Europe we should have a market for our produce. So we should, because the employments of war, not of the soldier merely, as he constitutes but a small part of those to whom employment is given by war, would divert the attention of great numbers from the production of necessities. It produces an unnatural excitement, and gives a factitious value to every thing. And hence the return of peace, which ought to bring nothing but blessings, brings in its train a reduction of the price of every thing, and bankruptcy and ruin on all classes. It is the most depressed and dangerous crisis in the existence of a nation, as we are too apt to apply legislative remedy for what time alone can heal. Another cause why our exports should be diminished in price, if the want of a demand abroad were not sufficient, is, that, from the vast quantity of public lands within our limits, and the preference men have for breathing the free air of the country, the ratio of our population engaged in agriculture increases more rapidly than that of those engaged in other pursuits, and with that increase the agricultural productions also increase, and with that is the diminution of price. Hence, as Mr. Speaker justly observes, the price of the produce of every section of the country is falling, and must continue to fall; and commerce also feels the same effects. From this languishing and suffering, Mr. Speaker would most graciously relieve us by his policy, as the aged, deformed, and sick, of some countries, are relieved, by giving a finishing blow to their existence. The only remedy that can be safely applied to such an evil is to live on our abundance, and bring our expenditures down to the means we possess.

The effect of this system which is designed to tax the sugar, the cotton, and tobacco planter, and the grower of rice in the South, for the benefit of other sections of the country supposed to be less prosperous, would, as I have shown, destroy our market; because, if we do not import we cannot expect to export; or, as Mr. Speaker would have it, "if we export we will import;" or if we buy nothing of them, (other nations,) they can buy nothing of us; or, as Mr. Speaker would have it, "if they buy nothing of us, we can buy nothing of them." But all parts would feel this wound, as the cautery applied to one part of the body affects the whole system. The North would feel it in her navigating interest, now employed in carrying those raw materials to other nations, and returning with their manufactures, and in the destruction of our market for her produce and her manufactures used in agriculture. I have already shown that it must cripple, if not prostrate, her commerce, her ship-building, and her trade with the West Indies.

With the West, it appears to me like a rebellion of the members against the body. It is true we export, but the amount received from those exports is only apparently larger in our favor, inasmuch as we are the consumers of your produce, dependent on you for our implements of husbandry, the means of sustaining life, and almost every thing except our land and negroes; all of which draws much from the apparent profits and advantages. In proportion as you diminish our exportations, you diminish our means of purchasing from you, and destroy your own market. You will compel us to use those advantages of soil and of climate which God and nature have placed within our reach, and to live, as to you, as you desire us to live as to foreign nations—dependent on our own resources. I have already attempted to show that this home market is all a fallacy. When we consider the few who must be employed in consequence of the improvements in machinery; the limited nature of your market, from the inability of your manufacturers to compete in foreign markets, is it not reasonable to suppose that, if Great Britain, from her own soil, supports a population of upwards of 21,000,000, a very small proportion of whom are engaged in agriculture, that Pennsylvania, or Ohio, alone, could furnish bread for the very small proportion of 10,000,000 of people in this country, to be engaged in manufactures? The greatest number, and even that exaggerated greatly beyond a correct estimate, which Mr. Speaker could employ on manufactures, was 500,000, and these are to consume the surplus products of twenty out of the twenty-seven States and Territories of the United States, with some fractions of the remaining seven, stated by Mr. Speaker to be grain growing States and Territories. The idea, then, of a home market, is without reason or truth. The effect of this system would only be felt in the immediate vicinity of the large manufacturing establishments. Can you manufacture in the West? The principal article manufactured heretofore in Kentucky is cotton bagging. In this, you are now protected by a duty of 20 per cent., to which is added the 10 per cent. in calculation of the duties, which would make the whole duty about 22½ per cent. You have also "ten acres of land for one in Europe, fit only for the cultivation of hemp;" it requires little capital to manufacture hemp; your navigable streams enable you to transport it at a small expense, to the market; yet, you are not able to compete, in our own markets, with Inverness and Dundee, (names I have heard so often they sound harshly in my ear,) who purchase the hemp raised by the "serfs" of Russia, transport it to Scotland, and there manufacture it; afterwards transport it to the United States, paying freight, insurance, commissions, and profits, in addition to the duty of about 22½ per cent. Does not this show that the evil lies deeper than want of protection? That, if you could manufacture, your manufactures are already sufficiently protected? We are willing, from the South, to submit to any thing to which, as a people, we ought to submit; but we are not willing to have the industry of our people taxed to enable your manufacturers to demand of us 50 per cent., the proposed duty, more than we give for the foreign fabric. When we examine the provisions of this bill, we understand you to mean by protection, nothing less than prohibition, and by "keeping you steady," the exclusion of foreign manufactures. But, sir, suppose the West procures the passage, do you suppose Brother Jonathan will not reap the advantages of it? The people of New England have the necessary capital, industry, economy, and density of population, all of which must precede manufactures. These will enable them to sell their manufactures under the very walls of your manufacturing establishments. They will not manufacture the cotton bagging alone, but raise the hemp, and drive you from our market. Against Inverness and Dundee, the duty, and the peculiar advantages of your situation, give you reasonable protection; but, against this domestic competition, you can neither ask nor have any protection from the Government, unless, in the folly of legislating the people into wealth, and creating markets, we should attempt to protect the several sections of the Union against the competition of the other.

Opinions have been mentioned, and among others, that of the Executive Magistrate of the nation. I regret the course his communications have pursued, in relation to this subject, because they are calculated to keep alive the restless spirit of those who are anxious to adopt the policy of other nations, by intimating that something can, and probably ought, to be done. "I would he were either hot or cold." "A judicious revision of the tariff" means nothing—as almost the only question is, What is a judicious revision? If he would declare for or against the tariff, in the shape it has for years past been presented to this House, and agitated the nation, we could give to that opinion such weight as we might suppose it entitled to have; but at present we have nothing tangible, no opinion to support us, and no opinion to combat. The opinions of the Emperor Alexander and of Napoleon cannot thus be mistaken; and, so far as the opinions of monarchs and despots are entitled to weight, support the tariff. Their principles and opinions in favor of what Mr. Speaker was pleased to call "an American policy," in opposition to what he calls "a foreign policy," is better suited to their own arbitrary Governments, than to our Government of laws. Experience is better than opinion, and experience shows that the American policy, which imposes duty for revenue merely, or what I have described as falling strictly within the meaning of protection, and which has hitherto been called an American policy, can, in a few years, elevate a nation to unexampled prosperity; while the foreign policy, attempted to be introduced in its place, may be safely left to arbitrary Governments and the oppressed of other nations. This fair American, the bantling of Mr. Speaker, was born, has grown to manhood, and approached old age, in a foreign country—is not yet naturalized here, and I hope never will be.

"Be of good cheer," ye tariff-men; in the end you will triumph. Let me assure gentlemen, that such a triumph must be of short duration. There is but a step between the throne and the scaffold. When the people shall have discovered that this home market is all a fallacy; that the cry for the protection of manufactures, and domestic industry, has been raised by those interested, or seeking to be interested in such establishments; that it is a triumph over that truly American policy which has made us great and happy; and has established in its place that policy which has ground down and oppressed the people of other nations; that it exposes their houses to the scrutinizing and hateful inspection of the exciseman, and the fruits of their industry to be wasted by the tax gatherer; that it contaminates the morals of the people, prostrates all the best interests of the country, and saps the foundation of its liberty, this triumph will soon end. This beautiful fabric, erected with so much care and industry, will bury in its ruins its most zealous advocates. From such a triumph, may Heaven, in infinite mercy, deliver this nation.

When Mr. R. concluded—

Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, took the floor and continued his observations till past 3 o'clock, when he gave way for a motion that the Committee rise.

The House then adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 2.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Charles Gwynn, of Baltimore," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to an act to perfect certain locations and sales of the lands in Missouri, passed April 26, 1822," reported that, in the opinion of the committee, the said bill ought not to pass; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee to which was referred a Message from the President of the United States, in relation to the title of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, to certain tracts of land, made a report, accompanied by a bill providing for the disposition of three several tracts of land, in Tuscarawas county, in the State of Ohio, and for other purposes; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act concerning certain acts of James Miller, as Governor of the Territory of Arkansas, and for other purposes," was read twice, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act altering the times of holding the courts of the District of Columbia," was read twice, and ordered to be read a third time to-day.

The Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill to authorize the executors of John B. Mebane to collect certain arrears of internal tax, were discharged from the further consideration of the same, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1824," with amendments. The Senate have also passed a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts providing for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land in St. Helena and Jackson Courthouse land districts;" in which amendments and last mentioned bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act altering the time for holding the courts in the District of Columbia," was read the third time; when a motion was made, by Mr. LITTLE, that the bill be laid on the table.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill "to amend the several acts laying duties on imports," Mr. CONDUCT in the Chair.

Mr. WEBSTER resumed and concluded his speech on the general principles of the bill, and in opposition to its passage in its present shape. His speech follows entire:

Mr. Chairman: I will avail myself of the present occasion to make some remarks on certain principles and opinions which have been recently advanced, and on those considerations which, in my judgment, ought to govern us in deciding upon the several and respective parts of this very important and complex measure. I can truly say that this is a painful duty. I deeply regret the necessity, which is likely to be imposed upon me, of giving a general affirmative or negative vote on the whole of the bill. I cannot but think this mode of proceeding liable to great objections. It exposes both those who support, and those who oppose, the measure, to very unjust and injurious misapprehensions. There may be good reasons for favoring some of the provisions of the bill, and equally strong reasons for opposing others; and these provisions do not stand to each other in the relation of principal and incident. If that were the case, those who are in favor of the principal might forego their opinions upon incidental and subordinate provisions. But the bill proposes enactments entirely distinct, and different from one another in character and tendency. Some of its clauses are intended merely for revenue; and, of those which regard the protection of home manufactures, one part stands upon very different grounds from those of other parts. So that probably every gentleman who may ultimately support the bill, will vote for much which his judgment does not approve; and those who oppose it, will oppose something which they would very gladly support.

Being intrusted with the interests of a district highly commercial, and deeply interested in manufactures also, I wish to state my opinions on the present measure; not as on a whole, for it has no entire and homogeneous character; but as on a collection of different enactments, some of which meet my approbation, and some of which do not.

And allow me, sir, in the first place, to state my regret, if, indeed, I ought not to express a warmer sentiment, at the names, or designations, which Mr. Speaker has seen fit to adopt for the purpose of describing the advocates and the opposers of the present bill. It is a question, he says, between the friends of an "American policy," and those of a "foreign policy." This, sir, is an assumption which I take the liberty most directly to deny. Mr. Speaker certainly intended nothing invidious or derogatory to any part of the House by this mode of denominating friends and enemies. But there is power in names, and this manner of distinguishing those who favor and those who oppose particular measures, may lead to inferences to which no member of the House can submit. It may imply that there is a more exclusive and peculiar regard to American interests in one class of opinions than in another. Such an implication is to be resisted and repelled. Every member has a right to the presumption that he pursues what he believes to be the interest of his country, with as sincere a zeal as any other member. I claim this in my own case; and, while I shall not, for any purpose of description, or convenient arrangement, use terms which may imply any disrespect to other men's opinions, much less any imputations of other men's motives, it is my duty to take care that the use of such terms by others, be not, against the will of those who adopt them, made to produce a false impression. Indeed, sir, it is a little astonishing, if it seemed convenient to Mr. Speaker, for the purposes of distinction, to make use of the terms "American policy," and "foreign policy," that he should not have applied them in a manner precisely the reverse of that in which he has in fact used them. If names are thought necessary, it would be well enough, one would think, that the name should be, in some measure, descriptive of the thing; and since Mr. Speaker denominates the policy which he recommends "a new policy in this country;" since he speaks of the present measure as a new era in our legislation; since he professes to invite us to depart from our accustomed course, to instruct ourselves by the wisdom of others, and to adopt the policy of the most distinguished foreign States, one is a little curious to know with what propriety of speech this imitation of other nations is denominated an "American policy," while, on the contrary, a preference for our own established system, as it now actually exists, and always has existed, is called a "foreign policy." This favorite American policy is what America has never tried; and this odious foreign policy is what, as we are told, foreign States have never pursued. Sir, that is the truest American policy which shall most usefully employ American capital, and American labor, and best sustain the whole population. With me it is a fundamental axiom, it is interwoven with all my opinions, that the great interests of the country are united and inseparable; that agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, will prosper together, or languish together; and that all legislation is dangerous which proposes to benefit one of these without looking to consequences which may fall on the others.

Passing from this, sir, I am bound to say that Mr. Speaker began his able and impressive speech at the proper point of inquiry; I mean the present state and condition of the country; although I am so unfortunate, or rather, although I am so happy, as to differ from him very widely in regard to that condition. I dissent entirely from the justice of that picture of distress which he has drawn. I have not seen the reality, and know not where it exists. Within my observation there is no cause for so gloomy and terrifying a representation. In respect to the New England States, with the condition of which I am, of course, most acquainted, the present appears to me a period of very general prosperity. Not, indeed, a time for great profits and sudden acquisition; not a day of extraordinary activity and successful speculation. There is, no doubt, a considerable depression of prices, and, in some degree, a stagnation of business. But the case presented by Mr. Speaker was not one of depression, but of distress; of universal, pervading, intense distress, limited to no class, and to no place. We are represented as on the very verge and brink of national ruin. So far from acquiescing in these opinions, I believe there has been no period in which the general prosperity was better secured, or rested on a more solid foundation. As applicable to the Eastern States, I put this remark to their Representatives, and ask them if it is not true. When has there been a time in which the means of living have been more accessible and more abundant? when labor was rewarded, I do not say with a larger, but with a more certain success? Profits, indeed, are lower; in some pursuits of life, which it is not proposed to benefit, but to burden, by this bill, very low. But still I am unacquainted with any proofs of extraordinary distress. What, indeed, are the general indications of the state of the country? There is no famine nor pestilence in the land, nor war, nor desolation. There is no writhing under the burden of taxation. The means of subsistence are abundant; and at the very moment when the miserable condition of the country is asserted, it is admitted that the wages of labor are high, in comparison with those of any other country. A country, then, enjoying a profound peace, a perfect civil liberty, with the means of subsistence cheap and abundant, with the reward of labor sure, and its wages higher than anywhere else, cannot be represented in gloom, melancholy, and distress, but by the effort of extraordinary powers of tragedy.

Even if, in judging of this question, we were to regard only those proofs to which we have been referred, we shall probably come to a conclusion somewhat different from that which has been drawn. Our exports, for example, although certainly less than in some years, were not, last year, so much below an average, formed upon the exports of a series of years, and putting those exports at a fixed value, as might be supposed. The exports of agricultural products, of animals, of the products of the forest, of the sea, together with gunpowder, spirits, and sundry unenumerated articles, amounted, in the several years, to the following sums, viz:

1804 -	-	-	-	-	-	33,842,316
1807 -	-	-	-	-	-	38,465,854

Coming up, now, to our own times, and taking the exports of the years 1821, 1822, and 1823, of the same articles and products, at the same prices, they stand thus:

In 1821 -	-	-	-	-	-	$45,643,175
1822 -	-	-	-	-	-	48,782,295
1823 -	-	-	-	-	-	55,863,491

Mr. Speaker has taken the very extraordinary year of 1803, and, adding to the exportation of that year, what he thinks ought to have been a just augmentation, in proportion to the increase of our population, he swells the result to a magnitude, which, when compared with our actual exports, would exhibit a great deficiency. But is there any justice in this mode of calculation? In the first place, as before observed, the year 1803 was a year of extraordinary exportation. By reference to the accounts, that of the article of flour, for example, there was an export that year of 1,300,000 barrels; but the very next year it fell to 800,000, and the next year to 700,000. In the next place, there never was any reason to expect that the increase of our exports of agricultural products, would keep pace with the increase of our population. That would be against all experience. It is, indeed, most desirable, that there should be an augmented demand for the products of agriculture; but, nevertheless, the official returns of our exports do not show that absolute want of all foreign market, which has been so strongly stated.

But there are other means by which to judge of the general condition of the people. The quantity of the means of subsistence consumed, or, to make use of a phraseology better suited to the condition of our own people, the quantity of the comforts of life enjoyed, is one of those means. It so happens, indeed, that it is not so easy in this country, as elsewhere, to ascertain facts, of this sort, with accuracy. Where most of the articles of subsistence and most of the comforts of life are taxed, there is, of course, great facility in ascertaining, from official statements, the amount of consumption. But in this country, most fortunately, the Government neither knows, nor is concerned to know, the annual consumption; and estimates can only be formed in another mode, and in reference only to a few articles. Of these articles, tea is one. Its use is not quite a luxury, and yet is something above the absolute necessities of life. Its consumption, therefore, will be diminished in times of adversity, and augmented in times of prosperity. By deducting the annual export from the annual import, and taking a number of years together, we may arrive at a probable estimate of consumption. The average of eleven years, from 1790 to 1800, inclusive, will be found to be two millions and a half of pounds. From 1801 to 1812, inclusive, three millions seven hundred thousand; and the average of the last three years, to wit, 1821, 1822, and 1823, five millions and a half. Having made a just allowance for the increase of our numbers, we shall still find, I think, from these statements, that there is no distress which has limited our means of subsistence and enjoyment.

In forming an opinion of the degree of general prosperity, we may regard, likewise, the progress of internal improvements, the investment of capital in roads, bridges, and canals. All these prove a balance of income over expenditure; they are evidence that there is a surplus of profits, which the present generation is usefully vesting for the benefit of the next. It cannot be denied that, in this particular, the progress of the country is steady and rapid.

We may look, too, to the expenses of education. Are our colleges deserted? Do fathers find themselves less able than usual to educate their children? It will be found, I imagine, that the amount paid for the purpose of education is constantly increasing, and that the schools and colleges were never more full than at the present moment. I may add that the endowment of public charities, the contributions to objects of general benevolence, whether foreign or domestic, the munificence of individuals towards what ever promises to benefit the community, are all so many proofs of national prosperity. And, finally, there is no defalcation of revenue, no pressure of taxation.

The general result, therefore, of a fair examination of the present condition of things, seems to me to be that there is a considerable depression of prices and curtailment of profit; and, in some parts of the country, it must be admitted there is a great degree of pecuniary embarrassment, arising from the difficulty of paying debts which were contracted when prices were high. With these qualifications, the general state of the country may be said to be prosperous; and these are not sufficient to give to the whole face of affairs any appearance of general distress.

Supposing the evil, then, to be a depression of prices, and a partial pecuniary pressure, the next inquiry is into the causes of that evil; and it appears to me that there are several; and, in this respect, I think, too much has been imputed, by Mr. Speaker, to the single cause of the diminution of exports. Connected, as we are, with all the commercial nations of the world, and having observed great changes to take place elsewhere, we should consider whether the causes of those changes have not reached us, and whether we are not suffering by the operation of those causes, in common with others. Undoubtedly there has been a great fall in the price of all commodities throughout the commercial world, in consequence of the restoration of a state of peace. When the allies entered France in 1814, prices rose astonishingly fast and very high. Colonial produce, for instance, in the ports of this country, as well as elsewhere, sprung up suddenly from the lowest to the highest extreme. A new and vast demand was created for the commodities of trade. These were the natural consequences of the great political changes which then took place in Europe.

We are to consider, too, that our own war created new demand, and that a Government expenditure of 25,000,000 or 30,000,000 a year, had the usual effect of enhancing prices. We are obliged to add, that the paper issues of our banks carried the same effect still further. A depreciated currency existed in a great part of the country—depreciated to such an extent as that, at one time, exchange between the centre and the north, was as high as 20 per cent. The Bank of the United States was instituted to correct this evil; but, for causes which it is not necessary now to enumerate, it did not, for some years, bring back the currency of the country to a sound state. This depreciation of the circulating currency was so much, of course, added to the nominal prices of commodities, and these prices thus unnaturally high, seemed, to those who looked only at the appearance, to indicate great prosperity. But such prosperity is more specious than real. It would have been better, probably, as the shock would have been less, if prices had fallen sooner. At length, however, they fell; and, as there is little doubt that certain events in Europe had an influence in determining the time at which this fall should take place, I will advert shortly to some of the principal of those events.

In May, 1819, the British House of Commons decided, by an unanimous vote, that the resumption of cash payments by the Bank of England should not be deferred beyond the ensuing February. The restriction had been continued from time to time, and from year to year, Parliament always professing to look to the restoration of a specie currency, whenever it should be found practicable. Having been in July, 1818, continued to July, 1819, it was understood that, in the interim, the important question of the time at which cash payments should be resumed, should be finally settled. In the latter part of the year '18, the circulation of the bank had been greatly reduced, and a severe scarcity of money was felt in the London market. Such was the state of things in England. On the Continent, other important events took place. The French Indemnity Loan had been negotiated in the Summer of 1818, and the proportion of it belonging to Austria, Russia, and Prussia, had been sold. This created an unusual demand for gold and silver in these Eastern States of Europe. It has been stated, that the amount of the precious metals transmitted to Austria and Russia in that year, was at least twenty millions sterling. Other large sums were sent to Prussia and to Denmark. The effect of this sudden drain of specie, felt first at Paris, was communicated to Amsterdam and Hamburg, and all other commercial places in the north of Europe.

The paper system of England had certainly communicated an artificial value to property. It had encouraged speculation, and excited overtrading. When the shock therefore came, and this violent pressure for money acted at the same moment on the Continent and in England, inflated and unnatural prices could be kept up no longer. A reduction took place, which has been estimated to have been at least equal to a fall of 30, if not 40 per cent. The depression was universal; and the change was felt in the United States severely, though not equally so in every part of them. There are those, I am aware, who maintain that the events to which I have alluded did not cause the great fall of prices; but that that fall was natural and inevitable, from the previously existing state of things, the abundance of commodities, and the want of demand. But that would only prove that the effect was produced in another way, rather than by another cause. If these great and sudden calls for money did not reduce prices, but prices fell, as of themselves, to their natural state, still the result is the same; for we perceive that after these new calls for money, prices could not be kept longer at their unnatural height.

About the time of these foreign events, our own bank system underwent a change; and all these causes, in my view of the subject, concurred to produce the great shock which took place in our commercial cities, and through many parts of the country. The year 1819 was a year of numerous failures, and very considerable distress, and would have furnished far better grounds than exist at present, for that gloomy representation of our condition which has been presented. Mr. Speaker has alluded to the strong inclination which exists, or has existed, in various parts of the country to issue paper money, as a proof of great existing difficulties. I regard it rather as a very productive cause of those difficulties; and the Committee will not fail to observe, that there is, at this moment, much the loudest complaint of distress precisely where there has been the greatest attempt to relieve it by systems of paper credit. And, on the other hand, content, prosperity, and happiness, are most observable in those parts of the country, where there has been the least endeavor to administer relief by law. In truth, nothing is so baneful, so utterly ruinous to all true industry, as interfering with the legal value of money, or attempting to raise artificial standards to supply its place. Such remedies suit well the spirit of extravagant speculation, but they sap the very foundation of all honest acquisition. By weakening the security of property, they take away all motive for exertion. Their effect is to transfer property. Whenever a debt is allowed to be paid by any thing less valuable than the legal currency in respect to which it was contracted, the difference, between the value of the paper given in payment and the legal currency, is precisely so much property taken from one man and given to another, by legislative enactment. When we talk, therefore, of protecting industry, let us remember that the first measure for that end, is to secure it in its earnings; to assure it that it shall receive its own. Before we invent new modes of raising prices, let us take care that existing prices are not rendered wholly unavailable, by making them capable of being paid in depreciated paper. I regard, sir, this issue of irredeemable paper as the most prominent and deplorable cause of whatever pressure still exists in the country; and, further, I would put the question to the members of this Committee, whether it is not from that part of the people who have tried this paper system, and tried it to their cost, that this bill receives the most earnest support? And I cannot forbear to ask, further, whether this support does not proceed rather from a general feeling of uneasiness under the present condition of things, than from the clear perception of any benefit which the measure itself can confer? Is not all expectation of advantage centered in a sort of vague hope, that change may produce relief? Debt certainly presses hardest, where prices have been longest kept up by artificial means. They find the shock lightest, who take it soonest; and I fully believe that, if those parts of the country which now suffer most, had not augmented the force of the blow by deferring it, they would have now been in a much better condition than they are. We may assure ourselves, once for all, sir, that there can be no such thing as payment of debts by legislation. We may abolish debts indeed; we may transfer property, by visionary and violent laws. But we deceive both ourselves and our constituents, if we flatter, either ourselves or them, with the hope that there is any relief against whatever pressure exists, but in economy and industry. The depression of prices and the stagnation of business, have been in truth the necessary result of circumstances. No Government could prevent them, and no Government can altogether relieve the people from their effect. We had enjoyed a day of extraordinary prosperity; we had been neutral while the world was at war, and had found a great demand for our products, our navigation, and our labor. We had no right to expect that that state of things would continue always. With the return of peace, foreign nations would struggle for themselves, and enter into competition with us in the great objects of pursuit.

Now, sir, what is the remedy for existing evils? what is the course of policy suited to our actual condition? Certainly it is not our wisdom to adopt any system that may be offered to us without examination, and in the blind hope that whatever changes our condition may improve it. It is better that we should "Bear those ills we have,

Than fly to others that we know not of."

We are bound to see that there is a fitness and an aptitude in whatever measures may be recommended to relieve the evils that afflict us; and before we adopt a system that professes to make great alterations, it is our duty to look carefully to each leading interest of the community, and see how it may probably be affected by our proposed legislation.

And, in the first place, what is the condition of our commerce? Here we must clearly perceive that it is not enjoying that rich harvest which fell to its fortune during the continuance of the European wars. It has been greatly depressed, and limited to small profits. Still, it is elastic and active, and seems capable of recovering itself in some measure from its depression. The shipping interest, also, has suffered severely, still more severely, probably, than commerce. If any thing should strike us with astonishment, it is that the navigation of the United States should be able to sustain itself. Without any Government protection whatever, it goes abroad to challenge competition with the whole world; and, in spite of all obstacles, it has yet been able to maintain 800,000 tons in the employment of foreign trade. How, sir, do the ship-owners and navigators accomplish this? How is it that they are able to meet, and in some measure overcome, universal competition? Not, sir, by protection and bounties; but by unwearied exertion, by extreme economy, by unshaken perseverance, by that manly and resolute spirit which relies on itself to protect itself. These causes alone enable American ships still to keep their element, and show the flag of their country in distant seas. The rates of insurance may teach us how thoroughly our ships are built, and how skilfully and safely they are navigated. Risks are taken, as I learn, from the United States to Liverpool, at one per cent.; and from the United States to Canton and back, as low as three per cent. But when we look to the low rate of freight, and when we consider, also, that the articles entering into the composition of a ship, with the exception of wood, are dearer here than in other countries, we cannot but be utterly surprised that the shipping interest has been able to sustain itself at all. I need not say that the navigation of the country is essential to its honor and its defence. Yet, instead of proposing benefit for it in this hour of its depression, we propose by this measure to lay upon it new and heavy burdens. In the discussion, the other day, of that provision of the bill which proposes to tax tallow for the benefit of the oil merchants and whalers, we had the pleasure of hearing eloquent eulogiums upon that portion of our shipping employed in the whale fishery, and strong statements of its importance to the public interest. But the same bill proposes a severe tax upon that interest for the benefit of the iron manufacturer and the hemp grower. So that the tallow chandlers and soap boilers are sacrificed to the oil merchants, in order that these again may contribute to the manufacturers of iron and the growers of hemp.

If such be the state of our commerce and navigation, what is the condition of our home manufactures? How are they amidst the general depression? Do they need further protection? and if any, how much? On all these points, we have had much general statement, but little precise information. In the very elaborate speech of Mr. Speaker, we are not supplied with satisfactory grounds of judging in these various particulars. Who can tell, from any thing yet before the Committee, whether the proposed duty be too high or too low on any one article? Gentlemen tell us that they are in favor of domestic industry; so am I. They would give it protection; so would I. But then all domestic industry is not confined to manufactures. The employments of agriculture, commerce, and navigation, are all branches of the same domestic industry; they all furnish employment for American capital and American labor. And when the question is, whether new duties shall be laid, for the purpose of giving further encouragement to particular manufactures, every reasonable man must ask himself, both, whether the proposed new encouragement be necessary, and, whether it can be given without injustice to other branches of industry.

It is desirable to know, also, somewhat more distinctly, how the proposed means will produce the intended effect. One great object proposed, for example, is, the increase of the home market for the consumption of agricultural products. This certainly is much to be desired; but what provisions of the bill are expected wholly, or principally, to produce this, is not stated. I would not suggest that some increase of the home market may not follow from the adoption of this bill, but all its provisions have not an equal tendency to produce this effect. Those manufactures which employ most labor, create of course, most demand for articles of consumption; and those create least, in the production of which capital and skill enter as the chief ingredients of cost. I cannot, sir, take this bill, merely because a committee has recommended it. I cannot espouse a side and fight under a flag. I wholly repel the idea, that we must take this law, or pass no law on the subject. What should hinder us from exercising our own judgments upon these provisions, singly and severally? Who has the power to place us, or why should we place ourselves in a condition where we cannot give to every measure, that is distinct and separate in itself, a separate and distinct consideration? Sir, I presume no member of the Committee will withhold his assent from what he thinks right, until others will yield their assent to what they think wrong. There are many things in this bill acceptable probably to the general sense of the House. Why should not these provisions be passed into a law, and others left to be decided upon their own merits, as a majority of the House shall see fit? To some of these provisions I am myself decidedly favorable; to others I have great objections; and I should have been very glad of an opportunity of giving my own vote distinctly on propositions, which are, in their own nature, essentially and substantially distinct from one another.

But, sir, before expressing my own opinion upon the several provisions of this bill, I will advert for a moment to some other general topics. We have heard much of the policy of England, and her example has been repeatedly urged upon us, as proving, not only the expediency of encouragement and protection, but of exclusion and direct prohibition also. I took occasion the other day to remark, that more liberal notions were growing prevalent on this subject; that the policy of restraints and prohibitions was getting out of repute, as the true nature of commerce became better understood; and that, among public men, those most distinguished, were most decided in their reprobation of the broad principle of exclusion and prohibition. Upon the truth of this representation, as matter of fact, I supposed there could not be two opinions among those who had observed the progress of political sentiment in other countries, and were acquainted with its present state. In this respect, however, it would seem, that I was greatly mistaken. We have heard it again and again declared, that the English Government still adheres, with immovable firmness, to its old doctrines of prohibition; that although journalists, theorists, and scientific writers, advance other doctrines, yet the practical men, the legislators, the government of the country, are too wise to follow them. It has even been most sagaciously hinted, that the promulgation of liberal opinions on these subjects, is intended only for a delusion upon other nations, to cajole them into the folly of liberal ideas, while England retains to herself all the benefits of the admirable old system of prohibition. We have heard from Mr. Speaker a warm commendation of the complex mechanism of this system. The British Empire, it is said, is, in the first place, to be protected against the rest of the world; then the British isles against the colonies; next, the isles respectively against each other—England herself, as the heart of the empire, being protected most of all, and against all.

Truly, sir, it appears to me, that Mr. Speaker's imagination has seen system, and order, and beauty, in that, which is much more justly considered as the result of ignorance, partiality, or violence. This part of English legislation has resulted, partly from considering Ireland as a conquered country, partly from the want of a complete union, even with Scotland, and partly from the narrow views of colonial regulation, which in early and uninformed periods, influenced the European States.

And, sir, I imagine, nothing would strike the public men of England more singularly, than to find gentlemen of real information, and much weight, in the councils of this country, expressing sentiments like these, in regard to the existing state of these English laws. I have never said, indeed, that prohibitory laws did not exist in England; we all know they do; but the question is, does she owe her prosperity and greatness to these laws? I venture to say, that such is not the opinion of the public men now in England, and the continuance of the laws, even without any alteration, would not be evidence that their opinion is different from what I have represented it; because the laws having existed long, and great interests having been built up on the faith of them, they cannot now be repealed, without great and overwhelming inconvenience. Because a thing has been wrongly done, it does not therefore follow that it can now be undone; and this is the reason, as I understand it, upon which exclusion, prohibition, and monopoly, are suffered to remain in any degree in the English system; and for the same reason, it will be wise in us to take our measures, on all subjects of this kind, with great caution. We may not be able, but at the hazard of much injury to individuals, hereafter to retrace our steps. And yet, whatever is extravagant, or unreasonable, is not likely to endure. There may come a moment of strong re-action; and if no moderation be shown in laying on duties, there may be little scruple in taking them off. It may here be observed, that there is a broad and marked distinction between entire prohibition, and reasonable encouragement. It is the one thing by duties or taxes on foreign articles, to awaken a home competition in the production of the same articles; it is another thing to remove all competition by a total exclusion of the foreign article; and it is quite another thing still, by total prohibition, to raise at home, manufactures not suited to the climate, the nature of the country, or the state of the population. These are substantial distinctions, and although it may not be easy, in every case, to determine which of them applies to a given article, yet, the distinctions themselves exist, and in most cases, will be sufficiently clear to indicate the true course of policy; and, unless I have greatly mistaken the prevailing sentiment in the councils of England, it grows every day more and more favorable to the diminution of restrictions, and to the wisdom of leaving much (I do not say every thing, for that would not be true) to the enterprise and the discretion of individuals. I should certainly not have taken up the time of the Committee to state at any length the opinions of other Governments, or of the public men of other countries, upon a subject like this; but an occasional remark made by me the other day, having been so directly controverted, especially by Mr. Speaker, in his observations yesterday, I must take occasion to refer to some proofs of what I have stated.

What, then, is the state of English opinion? Every body knows that, after the termination of the late European war, there came a time of great pressure in England. Since her example has been quoted, let it be asked in what mode her Government sought relief. Did it aim to maintain artificial and unnatural prices? Did it maintain a swollen and extravagant paper circulation? Did it carry further the laws of prohibition and exclusion? Did it draw closer the cords of colonial restraint? No, sir, but precisely the reverse. Instead of relying on legislative contrivances and artificial devices, it trusted to the enterprise and industry of the people; which it sedulously sought to excite, not by imposing restraint, but by removing it, wherever its removal was practicable. In May, 1820, the attention of the Government having been much turned to the state of foreign trade, a distinguished member* of the House of Peers brought forward a parliamentary motion upon that subject, followed by an ample discussion; and a full statement of his own opinions. In the course of his remarks, he observed, "That there ought to be no prohibitory duties, as such; for that it was evident, that where a manufacture could not be carried on, or a production raised, but under the protection of a prohibitory duty, that manufacture or that produce could not be brought to market but at a loss. In his opinion, the name of strict prohibition might, therefore, in commerce, be got rid of altogether; but he did not see the same objection to protecting duties, which, while they admitted of the introduction of commodities from abroad similar to those which we ourselves manufactured, placed them so much on a level, as to allow a competition between them." "No axiom," he added, "was more true than this: that it was by growing what the territory of a country could grow most cheaply, and by receiving from other countries what it could not produce except at too great an expense, that the greatest degree of happiness was to be communicated to the greatest extent of population."

In assenting to the motion, the first Minister† of the Crown expressed his opinion of the great advantage resulting from unrestricted freedom of trade.

"Of the soundness of that general principle," he observed, "I can entertain no doubt. I can entertain no doubt of what would have been the great advantages to the civilized world, if the system of unrestricted trade had been acted upon by every nation, from the earliest period of its commercial intercourse with its neighbors. If to those advantages there could have been any exceptions, I am persuaded that they would have been but few; and I am also persuaded that the cases to which they would have referred, would not have been, in themselves, connected with the trade and commerce of England. But we are now in a situation in which I will not say that a reference to the principle of unrestricted trade can be of no use, because such a reference may correct erroneous reasoning; but in which it is impossible for us, or for any country in the world, but the United States of America, to act unreservedly on that principle. The commercial regulations of the European world have been long established, and cannot suddenly be departed from."

Having supposed a proposition to be made to England, by a foreign State, for free commerce and intercourse, and an unrestricted exchange of agricultural products, and of manufactures, he proceeds to observe:

"It would be impossible to accede to such a proposition. We have risen to our present greatness under a different system. Some suppose that we have risen in consequence of that system; others of whom I am one, believe that we have risen in spite of that system. But, whichever of these hypotheses be true, certain it is, that we have risen under a very different system than that of free and unrestricted trade. It is utterly impossible, with our debt and taxation, even if they were but half their existing amount, that we can suddenly adopt the system of free trade."

Lord Ellenborough, in the same debate, said,

"That he attributed the general distress then existing in Europe, to the regulations that had taken place since the destruction of the French power. Most of the States on the Continent had surrounded themselves as with walls of brass, to inhibit intercourse with other States. Intercourse was prohibited, even in districts of the same State, as was the case in Austria and Sardinia. Thus, though the taxes on the people had been lightened, the severity of their condition had been increased. He believed that the discontent which pervaded most parts of Europe, and especially Germany, was more owing to commercial restrictions, than to any theoretical doctrines on Government; and that a free communication among them would do more to restore tranquillity, than any other step that could be adopted. He objected to all attempts to frustrate the benevolent intentions of Providence, which had given to various countries various wants, in order to bring them together. He objected to it as antisocial; he objected to it, as making commerce the means of barbarizing, instead of enlightening nations. The state of the trade with France was the most disgraceful to both countries; the two greatest civilized nations of the world, placed at a distance of scarcely twenty miles from each other, had contrived, by their artificial regulations, to reduce their commerce with each other to a mere nullity."

Every member, speaking on this occasion, agreed in the general sentiments favorable to unrestricted intercourse, which had thus been advanced; one of them remarking, at the conclusion of the debate, that "the principles of free trade, which he was happy to see so fully recognised, were of the utmost consequence; for, though, in the present circumstances of the country, a free trade was unattainable, yet their task hereafter was to approximate to it. Considering the prejudices and interests which were opposed to the recognition of that principle, it was no small indication of the firmness and liberality of Government, to have so fully conceded it."

Sir, we have seen, in the course of this discussion, that several gentlemen have expressed their high admiration of the silk manufacture of England. Its commendation was begun, I think, by the honorable member from Vermont, who sits near me, who thinks that that alone gives conclusive evidence of the benefits produced by attention to manufactures, inasmuch as it is a great source of wealth to the nation, and has amply repaid all the costs of its protection. Mr. Speaker's approbation of this part of the English example, was still warmer. Now, sir, it does so happen, that both these gentlemen differ very widely on this point, from the opinions entertained in England, by persons of the first rank, both of knowledge and of power. In the debate to which I have already referred, the proposer of the motion urged the expediency of providing for the admission of the silks of France into England.

"He was aware," he said, "that there was a poor and industrious body of manufacturers, whose interests must suffer by such an arrangement; and therefore he felt that it would be the duty of Parliament to provide for the present generation, by a large parliamentary grant. It was conformable to every principle of sound justice to do so, when the interests of a particular class were sacrificed to the good of the whole."

In answer to these observations, Lord Liverpool said that, with reference to several branches of manufactures, time, and the change of circumstances, had rendered the system of protecting duties merely nominal; and that, in his opinion, if all the protecting laws which regarded both the woollen and cotton manufactures, were to be repealed, no injurious effects would thereby be occasioned.

"But," he observes, "with respect to silk, that manufacture in this kingdom is so completely artificial, that any attempt to introduce the principles of free trade with reference to it, might put an end to it altogether. I allow that the silk manufacture is not natural to this country. I wish we had never had a silk manufactory. I allow that it is natural to France; I allow, that it might have been better, had each country adhered exclusively to that manufacture, in which each is superior; and had the silks of France been exchanged for British cottons. But I must look at things as they are; and when I consider the extent of capital, and the immense population, consisting, I believe, of about 50,000 persons engaged in our silk manufacture, I can only say, that one of the few points in which I totally disagree with the proposer of the motion, is the expediency, under existing circumstances, of holding out any idea, that it would be possible to relinquish the silk manufacture, and to provide for those who live by it, by parliamentary enactment. Whatever objections there may be to the continuance of the protecting system, I repeat, that it is impossible altogether to relinquish it. I may regret that the system was ever commenced; but, as I cannot recall that act, I must submit to the inconvenience by which it is attended, rather than expose the country to evils of greater magnitude."

Let it be remembered, sir, that these are not the sentiments of a theorist, nor the fancies of speculation; but the operative opinions of the first Minister of England, acknowledged to be one of the ablest and most practical statesmen of his country. Sir, gentlemen could have hardly been more unfortunate than in the selection of the silk manufacture in England, as an example of the beneficial effects of that system which they would recommend. It is, in the language which I have quoted, completely artificial. It has been sustained by I know not how many laws, breaking in upon the plainest principles of general expediency. At the last session of Parliament, the manufacturers petitioned for the repeal of three or four of these statutes, complaining of the vexatious restrictions which they impose on the wages of labor; setting forth, that a great variety of orders has from time to time been issued by magistrates under the authority of these laws, interfering, in an oppressive manner, with the minutest details of the manufacture; such as limiting the number of threads to an inch; restricting the widths of many sorts of work; and determining the quantity of labor not to be exceeded without extra wages; that by the operation of these laws, the rate of wages, instead of being left to the recognised principles of regulation, has been arbitrarily fixed by persons whose ignorance renders them incompetent to a just decision; that masters are compelled by law to pay an equal price for all work, whether well or ill performed; and that they are totally prevented the use of improved machinery, it being ordered, that work, in the weaving of which machinery is employed, shall be paid precisely at the same rate as if done by hand; that these acts have frequently given rise to the most vexatious regulations, the unintentional breach of which has subjected manufacturers to ruinous penalties; and that, the introduction of all machinery being prevented, by which labor might be cheapened, and the manufacturers being compelled to pay at a fixed price, under all circumstances, they are prevented from affording employment to their workmen, in times of stagnation of trade, but are compelled to stop their looms. And finally, they complain, that, notwithstanding these grievances under which they labor, while carrying on their manufacture in London, the law still prohibits them, while they continue to reside there, from employing any portion of their capital in the same business in any other part of the kingdom, where it might be more beneficially conducted. Now, sir, absurd as these laws must appear to be to every man, the attempt to repeal them did not, as far as I recollect, altogether succeed. The weavers were too numerous, their interests too great, or their prejudices too strong; and this notable instance of protection and monopoly still exists, to be lamented in England, with as much sincerity as it seems to be admired here.

In order further to show the prevailing sentiment of the English Government, I would refer to a report of a select committee of the House of Commons, at the head of which was the vice president of the board of trade, (Mr. Wallace,) in July, 1820.

"The time," say that committee, "when monopolies could be successfully supported, or would be patiently endured, either in respect to subjects against subjects, or particular countries against the rest of the world, seems to have passed away. Commerce, to continue undisturbed, and secure, must be, as it was intended to be, a source of reciprocal amity between nations, and an interchange of productions, to promote the industry, the wealth, and the happiness, of mankind."

In moving for the reappointment of the committee, in February, 1823, the same gentleman said:

"We must also get rid of that feeling of appropriation, which exhibited itself in a disposition to produce every thing necessary for our own consumption, and to render ourselves independent of the world. No notion could be more absurd or mischievous; it led, even in peace, to an animosity and rancor, greater than existed in time of war. Undoubtedly there would be great prejudices to combat, both in this country and elsewhere, in the attempt to remove the difficulties which are most obnoxious. It would be impossible to forget the attention which was in some respects due to the present system of protections; although that attention ought certainly not to be carried beyond the absolute necessity of the case."

And in a second report of the committee, drawn by the same gentleman, in that part of it which proposes a diminution of duties on timber from the north of Europe, and the policy of giving a legislative preference to the importation of such timber in the log, and a discouragement of the importation of deals, it is stated that the committee reject this policy, because, among other reasons, "it is founded on a principle of exclusion, which they are most averse to see brought into operation, in any new instance, without the warrant of some evident and great political expediency." And on many subsequent occasions, the same gentleman has taken occasion to observe, that he differed from those who thought that manufactures could not flourish without restrictions on trade; that old prejudices of that sort were dying away, and that more liberal and just sentiments were taking their place. These sentiments appear to have been followed by important legal provisions, calculated to remove restrictions and prohibitions, where they were most severely felt; that is to say, in several branches of navigation and trade.

They have relaxed their colonial system, they have opened the ports of their islands, and have done away the restriction which limited the trade of the colony to the mother country. Colonial products can now be carried directly from the islands to any part of Europe; and it may not be improbable, considering our own high duties on spirits, that that article may be exchanged hereafter by the English West India colonies, directly, for the timber and deals of the Baltic.

It may be added, that Mr. Lowe, whom the gentleman has cited, says that nobody supposes that the three great staples of English manufactures, cotton, woollen, and hardware, are benefited by any existing protecting duties; and that one object of all these protecting laws is usually overlooked, and that is, that they have been intended to reconcile the various interests to taxation: the corn law, for example, being designed as some equivalent to the agricultural interest for the burden of tithes and of poor rates.

In fine, sir, I think it is clear that, if we now embrace the system of prohibitions and restrictions, we shall show an affection for what others have discarded, and be attempting to ornament ourselves with cast-off apparel.

Sir, I should not have gone into this prolix detail of opinions from any consideration of their special importance on the present occasion; but, having happened to state that such was the actual opinion of the Government of England at the present time, and the accuracy of this representation having been so confidently denied, I have chosen to put the matter beyond doubt or cavil, although at the expense of these tedious citations. I shall have occasion, hereafter, of referring more particularly to sundry recent British enactments, by way of showing the diligence and spirit with which that Government strives to sustain its navigating interest, by opening the widest possible range to the enterprise of individual adventurers. I repeat, that I have not alluded to these examples of a foreign State as being fit to control our own policy. In the general principle, I acquiesce. Protection, when carried to the point which is now recommended; that is, to entire prohibition, seems to me, destructive of all commercial intercourse between nations. We are urged to adopt the system upon general principles; and what would be the consequence of the universal application of such a general principle, but that nations would abstain entirely from all intercourse with one another? I do not admit the general principle; on the contrary, I think freedom of trade to be the general principle, and restriction the exception. And it is for every State, taking into view its own condition, to judge of the propriety, in any case, of making an exception, constantly preferring, as I think all wise Governments will, not to depart without urgent reason from the general rule.

There is another point in the existing policy of England, to which I would most earnestly invite the attention of the Committee; I mean the warehouse system, or what we usually call the system of drawback. Very great prejudices appear to me to exist with us on that subject. We seem averse to the extension of the principle. The English Government, on the contrary, appear to have carried it to the extreme of liberality. They have arrived, however, at their present opinions, and present practice, by slow degrees. The transit system was commenced about the year 1803, but the first law was partial and limited. It admitted the importation of raw materials for exportation, but it excluded almost every sort of manufactured goods. This was done for the same reason that we propose to prevent the transit of Canadian wheat through the United States—the fear of aiding the competition of the foreign article with our own, in foreign markets. Better reflection, or more experience, has induced them to abandon that mode of reasoning, and to consider all such means of influencing foreign markets as nugatory; since, in the present active and enlightened state of the world, nations will supply themselves from the best sources, and the true policy of all producers, whether of raw materials, or of manufactured articles, is, not vainly to endeavor to keep other venders out of the market, but to conquer them in it, by the quality and the cheapness of their articles. The present policy of England, therefore, is, to allure the importation of commodities into England, there to be deposited in English warehouses, thence to be exported in assorted cargoes, and thus enabling her to carry on a general export trade to all quarters of the globe. Articles of all kinds, with the single exception of tea, may be brought into England, from any part of the world, in foreign as well as British ships, there warehoused, and again exported, at the pleasure of the owner, without the payment of any duty, or Government charge whatever.

While I am upon this subject, I would take notice also of the recent proposition in the English Parliament to abolish the tax on imported wool; and it is observable, that those who support this proposition give the same reasons as have been offered here, within the last week, against the duty which we propose on the same article. They say, that their manufacturers require a cheap and coarse wool, for the supply of the Mediterranean and Levant trade, and that, without a more free admission of the wool of the Continent, that trade will all fall into the hands of the Germans and Italians, who will carry it on through Leghorn and Trieste. While there is this duty on foreign wool to protect the wool growers of England, there is on the other hand a prohibition on the exportation of the native article, in aid of the manufacturers. The opinion seems to be gaining strength, that the true policy is to abolish both.

Laws have long existed in England, preventing the emigration of artisans, and the exportation of machinery; but the policy of these, also, has become doubted, and an inquiry has been instituted in Parliament into the expediency of repealing them. As to the emigration of artisans, say those who disapprove the laws, if that were desirable, no law could effect it; and as to the exportation of machinery, let us fabricate and export it, as we would any other commodity. If France is determined to spin and weave her own cotton, let us, if we may, still have the benefit of furnishing the machinery.

I have stated these things, sir, to show what seems to be the general tone of thinking and reasoning on these subjects in that country, the example of which has been so much pressed upon us. Whether the present policy of England be right or wrong, wise or unwise, it cannot, as it seems clearly to me, be quoted as an authority for carrying further the restrictive and exclusive system, either in regard to manufactures or trade. To re-establish a sound currency, to meet at once the shock, tremendous as it was, of the fall of prices, to enlarge her capacity for foreign trade, to open wide the field of individual enterprise and competition, and to say, plainly and distinctly, that the country must relieve itself from the embarrassments which it felt, by economy, frugality, and renewed efforts of enterprise; these appear to be the general outline of the policy which England has pursued.

Mr. Chairman: I will say a few words upon a topic, but, for the introduction of which into this debate, I should not have given the Committee, on this occasion, the trouble of hearing me. Some days ago, I believe it was when we were settling the controversy between the oil merchants and the tallow chandlers, the Balance of Trade made its appearance in debate, and I must confess, sir, that I spoke of it, or rather, spoke to it, somewhat freely and irreverently. I believe I used the hard names which have been imputed to me; and I did it simply for the purpose of laying the spectre, and driving it back to its tomb. Certainly, sir, when I called the old notion on this subject nonsense, I did not suppose that I should offend any one, unless the dead should happen to hear me. All the living generation, I took it for granted, would think the term very properly applied. In this, however, I was mistaken. The dead and the living rise up together to call me to account, and I must defend myself as well as I am able.

Let us inquire, then, sir, what is meant by an unfavorable balance of trade, and what the argument is, drawn from that source. By an unfavorable balance of trade, I understand, is meant that state of things in which importation exceeds exportation. To apply it to our own case, if the value of goods imported, exceed the value of those exported, then the balance of trade is said to be against us, inasmuch as we have run in debt to the amount of this difference. Therefore, it is said that, if a nation continue long in a commerce like this, it must be rendered absolutely bankrupt. It is in the condition of a man that buys more than he sells; and how can such a traffic be maintained without ruin? Now, sir, the whole fallacy of this argument consists in supposing that, whenever the value of imports exceeds that of exports, a debt is necessarily created to the extent of the difference: whereas, ordinarily, the import is no more than the result of the export, augmented in value by the labor of transportation. The excess of imports over exports, in truth, usually shows the gains, not the losses, of trade; or, in a country that not only buys and sells goods, but employs ships in carrying goods also, it shows the profits of commerce, and the earnings of navigation. Nothing is more certain than that, in the usual course of things, and taking a series of years together, the value of our imports is the aggregate of our exports and our freights. If the value of commodities, imported in a given case, did not exceed the value of the outward cargo, with which they were purchased, then it would be clear to every man's common sense, that the voyage had not been profitable. If such commodities fell far short in value of the cost of the outward cargo, then the voyage would be a very losing one; and yet it would present exactly that state of things which, according to the notion of a balance of trade, can alone indicate a prosperous commerce. On the other hand, if the return cargo were found to be worth much more than the outward cargo, while the merchant, having paid for the goods exported, and all the expenses of the voyage, finds a handsome sum yet in his hands, which he calls profits, the balance of trade is still against him, and whatever he may think of it, he is in a very bad way. Although one individual, or all individuals gain, the nation loses; while all its citizens grow rich, the country grows poor. This is the doctrine of the balance of trade. Allow me, sir, to give an instance tending to show how unaccountably individuals deceive themselves, and imagine themselves to be somewhat rapidly mending their condition, while they ought to be persuaded that, by that infallible standard, the balance of trade, they are on the high road to ruin. Some years ago, in better times than the present, a ship left one of the towns of New England with seventy thousand specie dollars. She proceeded to Mocha, on the Red Sea, and there laid out these dollars in coffee, drugs, spices, &c. With this new cargo she proceeded to Europe; two-thirds of it were sold in Holland for $130,000, which the ship brought back and placed in the same bank from the vaults of which she had taken her original outfit. The other third was sent to the ports of the Mediterranean, and produced a return of $25,000 in specie, and $15,000 in Italian merchandise. These sums together make $170,000 imported, which is $100,000 more than was exported, and is, therefore, proof of an unfavorable balance of trade, to that amount, in this adventure. We should find no great difficulty, sir, in paying off our balances if this were the nature of them all.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that all these obsolete and exploded notions had their origin in very mistaken ideas of the true nature of commerce. Commerce is not a gambling among nations for a stake, to be won by some and lost by others. It has not the tendency necessarily to impoverish one of the parties to it, while it enriches the other; all parties gain, all parties make profits, all parties grow rich, by the operations of just and liberal commerce. If the world had but one clime, and but one soil; if all men had the same wants and the same means, on the spot of their existence, to gratify those wants; then, indeed, what one obtained from the other by exchange, would injure one party in the same degree that it benefited the other; then, indeed, there would be some foundation for the balance of trade. But Providence has disposed our lot much more kindly. We inhabit a various earth. We have reciprocal wants, and reciprocal means for gratifying one another's wants. This is the true origin of commerce, which is nothing more than an exchange of equivalents, and from the rude barter of its primitive state, to the refined and complex state in which we see it, its principle is uniformly the same; its only object being, in every stage, to produce that exchange of commodities between individuals and between nations, which shall conduce to the advantage and to the happiness of both. Commerce between nations has the same essential character as commerce between individuals, or between parts of the same nation. Cannot two individuals make an interchange of commodities which shall prove beneficial to both, or in which the balance of trade shall be in favor of both? If not, the tailor and the shoemaker, the farmer and the smith, have hitherto very much misunderstood their own interest. And with regard to the internal trade of a country, in which the same rule would apply as between nations, do we ever speak of such an intercourse being prejudicial to one side because it is useful to the other? Do we ever hear that, because the intercourse between New York and Albany is advantageous to one of those places, it must, therefore, be ruinous to the other?

May I be allowed, sir, to read a passage on this subject from the observations of a gentleman, in my opinion one of the most clear and sensible writers and speakers of the age upon subjects of this sort:*

"There is no political question on which the prevalence of false principles is so general, as in what relates to the nature of commerce and to the pretended balance of trade; and there are few which have led to a greater number of practical mistakes, attended with consequences extensively prejudicial to the happiness of mankind. In this country, our parliamentary proceedings, our public documents, and the works of several able and popular writers, have combined to propagate the impression that we are indebted for much of our riches to what is called the balance of trade." "Our true policy would surely be to profess, as the object and guide of our commercial system, that which every man who has studied the subject must know to be the true principle of commerce, the interchange of reciprocal and equivalent benefit. We may rest assured that it is not in the nature of commerce to enrich one party at the expense of the other. This is a purpose at which, if it were practicable, we ought not to aim; and which, if we aimed at, we could not accomplish."

These remarks, I believe, sir, were written some ten or twelve years ago. They are in perfect accordance with the opinions advanced in more elaborate treatises, and now that the world has returned to a state of peace, and commerce has resumed its natural channels, and different nations are enjoying, or seeking to enjoy, their respective portions of it, all see the justness of these ideas; all see, that, in this day of knowledge and of peace, there can be no commerce between nations but that which shall benefit all who are parties to it.

If it were necessary, Mr. Chairman, I might ask the attention of the Committee to recur to a document before us, on this subject, of the balance of trade. It will be seen by reference to the accounts, that, in the course of the last year, our total export to Holland exceeded two millions and a half; our total import from the same country was but $700,000. Now can any man be wild enough to make any inference from this of the gain or loss of our trade with Holland for that year? Our trade with Russia for the same year produced a balance the other way; our import being two millions, and our export being but half a million. But this has no more tendency to show the Russian trade a losing trade, than the other statement has to show that the Dutch trade has been a gainful one. Neither of them, by itself, proves any thing.

Springing out of this notion of a balance of trade, there has been another idea, which has been much dwelt upon in the course of this debate; that is, that we ought not to buy of nations who do not buy of us; for example, that the Russian trade is a trade disadvantageous to the country, and ought to be discouraged, because, in the ports of Russia, we buy more than we sell. Now allow me to observe, in the first place, sir, that we have no account showing how much we do sell in the ports of Russia. Our official returns show us only what is the amount of our direct exports to her ports. But then we all know that the proceeds of other of our exports go to the same market, though indirectly. We send our own products, for example, to Cuba, or to Brazil; we there exchange them for the sugar and the coffee of those countries, and these articles we carry to St. Petersburg, and there sell them. Again; our exports to Holland and Hamburg are connected directly or indirectly with our imports from Russia. What difference does it make, in sense or reason, whether a cargo of iron be bought at St. Petersburg by the exchange of a cargo of tobacco, or whether the tobacco has been sold on the way, in a better market, in a port of Holland, the money remitted to England, and the iron paid for by a bill on London? There might indeed have been an augmented freight, there might have been some saving of commissions, if tobacco had been in brisk demand in the Russian market. But still there is nothing to show that the whole voyage may not have been highly profitable. That depends upon the original cost of the article here, the amount of freight and insurance to Holland, the price obtained there, the rate of exchange between Holland and England; the expense, then, of proceeding to St. Petersburg, the price of iron there, the rate of exchange between that place and England, the amount of freight and insurance home, and, finally, the value of the iron, when brought to our own market. These are the calculations which determine the fortune of the adventure; and nothing can be judged of it, one way or the other, by the relative state of our imports or exports with Holland, England, or Russia.

I would not be understood to deny that it may often be our interest to cultivate a trade with countries that most require such commodities as we can furnish, and which are capable also of directly supplying our own wants. This is the simplest and most original form of all commerce, and is, no doubt, highly beneficial. And some countries are so situated, doubtless, that commerce in this original form, or something near it, may be all that they can, without considerable inconvenience, carry on. Our trade, for example, with Madeira and the Western Islands, has been useful to the country as furnishing a demand for some portion of our agricultural products, which probably could not have been bought, had we not received their products in return. Countries situated still further from the great marts and highways of the commercial world, may afford, still stronger instances of the necessity and utility of conducting commerce on the original principle of barter, without much assistance from the operations of credit and exchange. All I would be understood to say, is, that it by no means follows that that must be a losing trade with any country, from which we receive more of her products than she receives of ours. And since I was supposed the other day, in speaking upon this subject, to have advanced opinions which not only this country ought to reject, but which also other countries, and those the most distinguished for skill and success in commercial intercourse, do reject, I will ask leave to refer again to the discussion which I first mentioned, in the English Parliament, relative to the foreign trade of that country.

"With regard (says the mover of the proposition*) to the argument employed against renewing our intercourse with the north of Europe—namely, that those who supplied us with timber from that quarter would not receive British manufactures in return, it appeared to him futile and ungrounded. If they did not send direct for our manufactures at home, they would send for them to Leipsic, and other fairs of Germany. Were not the Russian and Polish merchants purchasers there to a great amount? But he would never admit the principle that a trade was not profitable, because we were obliged to carry it on with the precious metals, or that we ought to renounce it, because our manufactures were not received by the foreign nation, in return for its produce. Whatever we received must be paid for in the produce of our land and labor, directly or circuitously, and he was glad to have the noble Earl† marked concurrence in this principle."

Referring ourselves again, sir, to the analogies of common life—no one would say that a farmer or a mechanic should buy only where he can do so by the exchange of his own produce, or his own manufacture. Such exchange may be often convenient; and, on the other hand, the cash purchase may be often more convenient. It is the same in the intercourse of nations. Indeed, Mr. Speaker has placed this argument on very clear grounds. It has been said, in the early part of the debate, that if we cease to import English cotton fabrics, England would no longer continue to purchase our cotton. To this, Mr. Speaker has replied, with great force and justice, that as she must have cotton in large quantities, she will buy the article where she can find it best and cheapest; and that it would be quite ridiculous in her, manufacturing as she still would be, for her own vast consumption, and the consumption of millions in other countries, to reject our uplands, because we had learned to manufacture a part of them for ourselves. And would it not be equally ridiculous in us, if the commodities of Russia were both cheaper and better suited to our wants than could be found elsewhere, to abstain from commerce with her, because she will not receive in return other commodities which we have to sell, but which she has no occasion to buy?

Intimately connected, sir, with this topic, is another, which has been brought into the debate; I mean the evil so much complained of—the exportation of specie. We hear gentlemen imputing the loss of market at home to a want of money, and this want of money to the exportation of the precious metals. We hear the India and China trade denounced as a commerce conducted on our side, in a great measure, with gold and silver. These opinions, sir, are clearly void of all just foundation, and we cannot too soon get rid of them. There are no shallower reasoners than those political and commercial writers who would represent it to be the only true and gainful end of commerce, to accumulate the precious metals. These are articles of use, and articles of merchandise, with this additional circumstance belonging to them, that they are made, by the general consent of nations, the standard by which the value of all other merchandise is to be estimated. In regard to weights and measures, something drawn from external nature is made a common standard, for the purposes of general convenience; and this is precisely the office performed by the precious metals, in addition to those uses to which, as metals, they are capable of being applied. There may be of these too much or too little, in a country, at a particular time, as there may be of any other articles. When the market is overstocked with them, as it often is, their exportation becomes as proper and as useful as that of other commodities, under similar circumstances. We need no more repine, when the dollars, which have been brought here from South America, are despatched to other countries, than when coffee and sugar take the same direction. We often deceive ourselves by attributing to a scarcity of money, that which is the result of other causes. In the course of this debate, the honorable member from Pennsylvania has represented the country as full of every thing but money. But this I take to be a mistake. The agricultural products, so abundant in Pennsylvania, will not, he says, sell for money; but they will sell for money as quick as for any other article which happens to be in demand. They will sell for money, for example, as easily as for coffee, or for tea, at the prices which properly belong to those articles. The mistake lies in imputing that to want of money, which arises from want of demand. Men do not buy wheat because they have money, but because they want wheat. To decide whether money be plenty or not, that is, whether there be a large portion of capital unemployed or not, when the currency of a country is metallic, we must look, not only to the prices of commodities, but also to the rate of interest. A low rate of interest, a facility of obtaining money on loans, a disposition to invest in permanent stocks, all of which are proofs that money is plenty, may nevertheless often denote a state not of the highest prosperity. They may, and often do, show a want of employment for capital; and the accumulation of specie shows the same thing. We have no occasion for the precious metals as money, except for the purposes of circulation, or rather of sustaining a safe paper circulation. And whenever there be a prospect of a profitable investment abroad, all the gold and silver, except what these purposes require, will be exported. For the same reason, if a demand exist abroad for sugar and coffee, whatever amount of those articles might exist in the country beyond the wants of its own consumption, would be sent abroad to meet the demand. Besides, sir, how could it ever occur to any body that we should continue to export gold and silver, if we did not continue to import them also? If a vessel take our own products to the Havana or elsewhere, exchange them for dollars, proceed to China, exchange them for silks and teas, bring these last to the ports of the Mediterranean, sell them there for dollars, and return to the United States; this would be a voyage resulting in the importation of the precious metals. But if she had returned from Cuba, and the dollars obtained there had been shipped direct from the United States to China, the China goods sold in Holland, and the proceeds brought home in the hemp and iron of Russia, this would be a voyage in which they were exported. Yet every body sees that both might be equally beneficial to the individuals and to the public. I believe, sir, that, in point of fact, we have enjoyed great benefit in our trade with India and China, from the liberty of going from place to place all over the world, without being obliged in the mean time to return home—a liberty not heretofore enjoyed by the private traders of England in regard to India and China. Suppose the American ship to be at Brazil, for example, she could proceed with her dollars direct to India, and in return could distribute her cargo in all the various ports of Europe or America: while an English ship, if a private trader, being at Brazil, must first return to England, and then could only proceed in the direct line from England to India. This advantage our countrymen have not been backward to improve; and in the debate to which I have already so often referred, it was stated, not without some complaint of the inconvenience of exclusion, and the natural sluggishness of monopoly, that American ships were at that moment fitting out in the Thames, to supply France, Holland, and other countries on the Continent, with tea; while the East India Company would not do this of themselves, nor allow any of their fellow countrymen to do it for them.

There is yet another subject, Mr. Chairman, upon which I would wish to say something, if I might presume upon the continued patience of the Committee. We hear, sometimes, in the House, and continually out of it, of the rate of exchange, as being one proof that we are on the downward road to ruin. Mr. Speaker himself has adverted to that topic, and I am afraid that his authority may give credit to opinions clearly unfounded, and which lead to very false and erroneous conclusions. Sir, let us see what the facts are. Exchange on England has recently risen one or one and a half per cent., partly owing, perhaps, to the introduction of this bill into Congress. Before this recent rise, and for the last six months, I understand its average may have been about seven and a half per cent. advance. Now, supposing this to be the real, and not merely, as it is, the nominal par of exchange between us and England, what would it prove? Nothing, except that funds were wanted, in England, for commercial operations, to be carried on either in England or elsewhere. It would not necessarily show that we were indebted to England; for, if we had occasion to pay debts in Russia or Holland, funds in England would naturally enough be required for such a purpose. And even if it did prove that a balance was due England, at the moment, it would have no tendency to explain to us whether our commerce with England had been profitable or unprofitable. But it is not true, in point of fact, that the real price of exchange is seven and a half per cent. advance, nor, indeed, that there is, at the present moment, any advance at all. That is to say, it is not true that merchants will give such an advance, or any advance, for money in England, more than they would give for the same amount, in the same currency, here. It will strike every one, who reflects upon it, that, if there were a real difference of seven and a half per cent., money would be immediately shipped to England; because the expense of transportation would be far less than that difference; or commodities of trade would be shipped to Europe, and the proceeds remitted to England. If it could so happen that American merchants should be willing to pay ten per cent. premium for money in England, or, in other words, that a real difference to that amount, in the exchange, should exist, its effects would be immediately seen in new shipments of our own commodities to Europe, because this state of things would create new motives. A cargo of tobacco, for example, might sell at Amsterdam for the same price as before; but if its proceeds, when remitted to London, were advanced, as they would be in such case, ten per cent. by the state of exchange, this would be so much added to the price, and would operate, therefore, as a motive for the exportation; and in this way national balances are, and always will be, adjusted.

To form any accurate idea of the true state of exchange between two countries, we must look at their currencies, and compare the quantities of gold and silver which they may respectively represent. This usually explains the state of the exchanges; and this will satisfactorily account for the apparent advance, now existing, on bills drawn on England. The English standard of value is gold; with us, that office is performed by gold, and by silver also, at a fixed relation to each other. But our estimate of silver is rather higher, in proportion to gold, than most nations give it; it is higher, especially, than in England, at the present moment. The consequence is, that silver, which remains a legal currency with us, stays here, while the gold has gone abroad; verifying the universal truth, that, if two currencies be allowed to exist, of different values, that which is cheapest will fill up the whole circulation. For as much gold as will suffice to pay here a debt of a given amount, we can buy in England more silver than would be necessary to pay the same debt here; and from this difference in the value of silver arises wholly, or in a great measure, the present apparent difference in exchange. Spanish dollars sell now, in England, for four shillings and nine pence sterling per ounce; equal to one dollar and six cents. By our standard, the same ounce is worth one dollar and sixteen cents; being a difference of about nine per cent. The true par of exchange, therefore, is nine per cent. If a merchant here pay one hundred Spanish dollars for a bill on England, at nominal par, in sterling money, that is, for a bill for £22 10s., the proceeds of this bill, when paid in England, in the legal currency, will there purchase, at the present price of silver, one hundred and nine Spanish dollars. Therefore, if the nominal advance on English bills do not exceed nine per cent., the real exchange is not against this country; in other words, it does not show that there is any pressing or particular occasion for the remittance of funds to England.

As little can be inferred from the occasional transfer of United States stock to England. Considering the interest paid on our stocks, the entire stability of our credit, and the accumulation of capital in England, it is not at all wonderful that investments should occasionally be made in our funds. As a sort of countervailing fact, it may be stated that English stocks are now actually holden in this country, though probably not to any considerable amount.

I will now proceed, sir, to state some objections which I feel, of a more general nature, to the course of Mr. Speaker's observations.

He seems to me to argue the question as if all domestic industry were confined to the production of manufactured articles; as if the employment of our own capital, and our own labor, in the occupations of commerce and navigation, were not as emphatically domestic industry as any other occupation. Some other gentlemen, in the course of the debate, have spoken of the price paid for every foreign manufactured article, as so much given for the encouragement of foreign labor, to the prejudice of our own. But is not every such article the product of our own labor as truly as if we had manufactured it ourselves? Our labor has earned it, and paid the price for it. It is so much added to the stock of national wealth. If the commodity were dollars, nobody would doubt the truth of this remark: and it is precisely as correct in its application to any other commodity as to silver. One man makes a yard of cloth at home; another raises agricultural products, and buys a yard of imported cloth. Both these are equally the earnings of domestic industry, and the only questions that arise in the case are two: the first is, which is the best mode, under all the circumstances, of obtaining the article; the second is, how far this first question is proper to be decided by Government, and how far it is proper to be left to individual discretion. There is no foundation for the distinction which attributes to certain employments the peculiar appellation of American industry; and it is, in my judgment, extremely unwise, to attempt such discriminations. We are asked, what nations have ever attained eminent prosperity without encouraging manufactures? I may ask, what nation ever reached the like prosperity without promoting foreign trade? I regard these interests as closely connected, and am of opinion that it should be our aim to cause them to flourish together. I know it would be very easy to promote manufactures, at least for a time, but probably only for a short time, if we might act in disregard of other interests. We could cause a sudden transfer of capital, and a violent change in the pursuits of men. We could exceedingly benefit some classes by these means. But what, then, becomes of the interests of others? The power of collecting revenue by duties on imports, and the habit of the Government of collecting almost its whole revenue in that mode, will enable us, without exceeding the bounds of moderation, to give great advantages to those classes of manufactures which we may think most useful to promote at home. What I object to is the immoderate use of the power—exclusions and prohibitions; all of which, as I think, not only interrupt the pursuits of individuals, with great injury to themselves, and little or no benefit to the country, but also often divert our own labor, or, as it may very properly be called, our own domestic industry, from those occupations in which it is well employed and well paid, to others, in which it will be worse employed, and worse paid. For my part, I see very little relief to those who are likely to be deprived of their employments, or who find the prices of the commodities which they need, raised, in any of the alternatives which Mr. Speaker has presented. It is nothing to say that they may, if they choose, continue to buy the foreign article; the answer is, the price is augmented: nor that they may use the domestic article; the price of that also is increased. Nor can they supply themselves by the substitution of their own fabric. How can the agriculturist make his own iron? How can the ship owner grow his own hemp?

But I have yet a stronger objection to the course of Mr. Speaker's reasoning; which is, that he leaves out of the case all that has been already done for the protection of manufactures, and argues the question as if those interests were now, for the first time, to receive aid from duties on imports. I can hardly express the surprise I feel that Mr. Speaker should fall into the common modes of expression used elsewhere, and ask if we will give our manufactures no protection. Sir, look to the history of our laws; look to the present state of our laws. Consider that our whole revenue, with a trifling exception, is collected at the custom-house, and always has been; and then say what propriety there is in calling on the Government for protection, as if no protection had heretofore been afforded. The real question before us, in regard to all the important clauses of the bill, is not whether we will lay duties, but whether we will augment duties. The demand is for something more than exists, and yet it is pressed as if nothing existed. It is wholly forgotten that iron and hemp, for example, already pay a very heavy and burdensome duty; and, in short, from the general tenor of Mr. Speaker's observations, one would infer that, hitherto, we had rather taxed our own manufactures than fostered them by taxes on those of other countries. We hear of the fatal policy of the tariff of 1816; and yet the law of 1816 was passed avowedly for the benefit of manufacturers, and, with very few exceptions, imposed on imported articles very great additions of tax; in some important instances, indeed, amounting to a prohibition.

Sir, on this subject it becomes us at least to understand the real posture of the question. Let us not suppose that we are beginning the protection of manufactures, by duties on imports. What we are asked to do is, to render those duties much higher, and therefore, instead of dealing in general commendations of the benefits of protection, the friends of the bill, I think, are bound to make out a fair case for each of the manufactures which they propose to benefit. The Government has already done much for their protection, and it ought to be presumed to have done enough, unless it should be shown, by the facts and considerations applicable to each, that there is a necessity for doing more.

On the general question, sir, allow me to ask if the doctrine of prohibition, as a general doctrine, be not preposterous? Suppose all nations to act upon it; they would be prosperous, then, according to the argument, precisely in the proportion in which they abolished intercourse with one another. The less of mutual commerce the better, upon this hypothesis. Protection and encouragement may be, and are, doubtless, sometimes, wise and beneficial, if kept within proper limits; but, when carried to an extravagant height, or the point of prohibition, the absurd character of the system manifests itself. Mr. Speaker has referred to the late Emperor Napoleon, as having attempted to naturalize the manufacture of cotton in France. He did not cite a more extravagant part of the projects of that ruler, that is, his attempt to naturalize the growth of that plant itself in France; whereas, we have understood that considerable districts in the south of France, and in Italy, of rich and productive lands, were at one time withdrawn from profitable uses, and devoted to raising, at great expense, a little bad cotton. Nor have we been referred to the attempts, under the same system, to make sugar and coffee from common culinary vegetables; attempts which served to fill the print shops of Europe, and to show us how easy is the transition from what some think sublime, to that which all admit to be ridiculous. The folly of some of these projects has not been surpassed, nor hardly equalled, unless it be by the philosopher in one of the satires of Swift, who so long labored to extract sunbeams from cucumbers.

The poverty and unhappiness of Spain have been attributed to the want of protection to her own industry. If by this it be meant that the poverty of Spain is owing to bad Government and bad laws, the remark is, in a great measure, just. But these very laws are bad because they are restrictive, partial, and prohibitory. If prohibition were protection, Spain would seem to have had enough of it. Nothing can exceed the barbarous rigidity of her colonial system, or the folly of her early commercial regulations. Unenlightened and bigoted legislation, the multitude of holidays, miserable roads, monopolies on the part of Government, restrictive laws, that ought long since to have been abrogated, are generally, and I believe truly, reckoned the principal causes of the bad state of the productive industry of Spain. Any partial improvement in condition, or increase of her prosperity, has been, in all cases, the result of relaxation, and the abolition of what was intended for favor and protection.

In short, sir, the general sense of this age sets, with a strong current, in favor of freedom of commercial intercourse, and unrestrained individual action. Men yield up their notions of monopoly and restriction, as they yield up other prejudices, slowly and reluctantly; but they cannot withstand the general tide of opinion.

Let me now ask, sir, what relief this bill proposes to some of those great and essential interests of the country, the condition of which has been referred to as proof of national distress; and which condition, although I do not think it makes out a case of distress, yet does indicate depression.

And first, as to our foreign trade. The Speaker has stated that there has been a considerable falling off in the tonnage employed in that trade. This is true, lamentably true. In my opinion, it is one of those occurrences which ought to arrest our immediate, our deep, our most earnest attention. What does this bill propose for its relief? Sir, it proposes nothing but new burdens. It proposes to diminish its employment, and it proposes, at the same time, to augment its expense, by subjecting it to heavier taxation. Sir, there is no interest, in regard to which a stronger case for protection can be made out, than the navigating interest. Whether we look at its present condition, which is admitted to be depressed; the number of persons connected with it, and dependent upon it for their daily bread; or its importance to the country in a political point of view, it has claims upon our attention which cannot be exceeded. But what do we propose to do for it? I repeat, sir, simply to burden and to tax it. By a statement which I have already submitted to the Committee, it appears that the shipping interest pays, annually, more than half a million of dollars in duties on articles used in the construction of ships. We propose to add nearly, or quite, fifty per cent. to this amount, at the very moment that we bring forth the languishing state of this interest, as a proof of national distress. Let it be remembered that our shipping employed in foreign commerce, has, at this moment, not the shadow of Government protection. It goes abroad upon the wide sea to make its own way, and earn its own bread, in a professed competition with the whole world. Its resources are its own frugality, its own skill, its own enterprise. It hopes to succeed, if it shall succeed at all, not by extraordinary aid of Government, but by patience, vigilance, and toil. This right arm of the nation's safety strengthens its own muscle by its own efforts, and by unwearied exertion in its own defence becomes strong for the defence of the country.

No one acquainted with this interest can deny that its situation, at this moment, is extremely critical. We have left it hitherto to maintain itself or perish; to swim if it can, and to sink if it cannot. But at this moment of its apparent struggle, can we, as men, can we, as patriots, add another stone to the weight that threatens to carry it down? Sir, there is a limit to human power and to human effort. I know the commercial marine of this country can do almost every thing, and bear almost every thing. Yet some things are impossible to be done; and some burdens may be impossible to be borne; and as it was the last ounce that broke the back of the camel, so the last tax, although it were even a small one, may be decisive as to the power of our marine to sustain the conflict in which it is now engaged with all the commercial nations on the globe.

Again, Mr. Chairman, the failures and the bankruptcies which have taken place in our large cities have been mentioned as proving the little success attending commerce and its general decline. But this bill has no balm for those wounds. It is very remarkable, that, when losses and disasters of certain manufacturers, those of iron, for instance, are mentioned, it is done for the purpose of invoking aid for the distressed. Not so with the losses and disasters of commerce; these last are narrated, and not unfrequently much exaggerated, to prove the ruinous nature of the employment, and to show that it ought to be abandoned, and the capital engaged in it turned to other objects.

It has been often said, sir, that our manufactures have to contend, not only against the natural advantages of those who produce similar articles in foreign countries, but also against the action of foreign Governments, who have great political interest in aiding their own manufactures to suppress ours. But have not these Governments as great an interest to cripple our marine, by preventing the growth of our commerce and navigation? What is it that makes us the object of the highest respect, or the most suspicious jealousy to foreign States? What is it that most enables us to take high relative rank among the nations? I need not say that this results, more than from any thing else, from that quantity of military power which we can cause to be water borne, and of that extent of commerce, which we are able to maintain throughout the world.

Mr. Chairman, I am conscious of having detained the Committee much too long with these observations. My apology for now proceeding to some remarks upon the particular clauses of the bill, is, that, representing a district at once commercial and highly manufacturing, and being called upon to vote upon a bill containing provisions so numerous and so various, I am naturally desirous to state as well what I approve, as what I would reject.

The first section proposes an augmented duty upon woollen manufactures. This, if it were unqualified, would no doubt be desirable to those who are engaged in that business. I have myself presented a petition from the woollen manufacturers of Massachusetts, praying an augmented ad valorem duty upon imported woollen cloths; and I am prepared to accede to that proposition, to a reasonable extent. But then this bill proposes, also, a very high duty upon imported wool; and, as far as I can learn, a majority of the manufacturers are at least extremely doubtful whether, taking these two provisions together, the state of the law is not better for them now than it would be if this bill should pass. It is said this tax on raw wool will benefit the agriculturist; but I know it to be the opinion of some of the best informed of that class, that it will do them more hurt than good. They fear it will check the manufacturer, and consequently check his demand for their article. The argument is, that a certain quantity of coarse wool, cheaper than we can possibly furnish, is necessary to enable the manufacturer to carry on the general business, and that if this cannot be had, the consequence will be, not a greater, but a less, manufacture of our own wool. I am aware that very intelligent persons differ upon this point; but, if we may safely infer from that difference of opinion, that the proposed benefit is at least doubtful, it would be prudent perhaps to abstain from the experiment. Certain it is that the same course of reasoning has occurred, as I have before stated, on the same subject, when a renewed application was made to the English Parliament to repeal the duty on imported wool, I believe scarcely two months ago; those who support the application, pressing urgently the necessity of an unrestricted use of the cheap, imported raw material, with a view to supply, with coarse cloths, the markets of warm climates, such as those of Egypt and Turkey, and especially a vast new created demand in the South American States.

As to the manufactures of cotton, it is agreed, I believe, that they are generally successful. It is understood that the present existing duty operates pretty much as a prohibition over those descriptions of fabrics to which it applies. The proposed alteration would probably enable the American manufacturer to commence competition with higher priced fabrics; and so would, perhaps, an augmentation less than is here proposed. I consider the cotton manufactures not only to have reached, but to have passed, the point of competition. I regard their success as certain, and their growth as rapid as the most impatient could well expect. If, however, a provision of the nature of that recommended here, were thought necessary to commence new operations in the same line of manufacture, I should cheerfully agree to it, if it were not at the cost of sacrificing other great interests of the country. I need hardly say that, whatever promotes the cotton and woollen manufactures, promotes most important interests of my constituents. They have a great stake in the success of those establishments, and, as far as those manufactures are concerned, would be as much benefited by the provisions of this bill as any part of the community. It is obvious, too, I should think, that, for some considerable time, manufactures of this sort, to whatever magnitude they may rise, will be principally established in those parts of the country where population is most dense, capital most abundant, and where the most successful beginnings have been already made.

But if these be thought to be advantages, they are greatly counterbalanced by other advantages enjoyed by other portions of the country. I cannot but regard the situation of the West as highly favorable to human happiness. It offers, in the abundance of its new and fertile lands, such assurances of permanent property and respectability to the industrious, it enables them to lay such sure foundations for a competent provision for their families, it makes such a nation of freeholders, that it need not envy the happiest and most prosperous of the manufacturing communities. We may talk as we will of well-fed and well-clothed day laborers or journeymen; they are not, after all, to be compared, either for happiness, or respectability, with him who sleeps under his own roof, and cultivates his own fee-simple inheritance.

With respect to the proposed duty on glass, I would observe, that, upon the best means of judging which I possess, I am of opinion, that the Chairman of the Committee is right, in stating, that there is, in effect, a bounty upon the exportation of the British article. I think it entirely proper, therefore, to raise our own duty by such an amount as shall be equivalent to that bounty.

And here, Mr. Chairman, before proceeding to those parts of the bill to which I most strenuously object, I will be so presumptuous, as to take up a challenge which Mr. Speaker has thrown down. He has asked us, in a tone of interrogatory indicative of the feeling of anticipated triumph, to mention any country in which manufactures have flourished, without the aid of prohibitory laws. He has demanded, if it be not policy, protection, aye, and prohibition, that have carried other States to the height of their prosperity, and whether any one has succeeded with such tame and inert legislation as ours. Sir, I am ready to answer this inquiry.

There is a country, not undistinguished among the nations, in which the progress of manufactures has been far more rapid than in any other, and yet unaided by prohibitions or unnatural restrictions. That country, the happiest which the sun shines on, is our own.

The woollen manufactures of England have existed from the early ages of the monarchy. Provisions, designed to aid and foster them, are in the black-lettered statutes of the Edwards and the Henrys. Ours, on the contrary, are but of yesterday; and yet, with no more than the protection of existing laws, they are already at the point of close and promising competition. Sir, nothing is more unphilosophical than to refer us, on these subjects, to the policy adopted by other nations in a very different state of society, or to infer that what was judged expedient by them, in their early history, must also be expedient for us, in this early part of our own. This would be reckoning our age chronologically, and estimating our advance by our number of years, when, in truth, we should regard only the state of society, the knowledge, the skill, the capital, the enterprise, which belong to our times. We have been transferred from the stock of Europe, in a comparatively enlightened age, and our civilization and improvement date back as early as her own. Her original history is also our original history; and if, since the moment of separation, she has gone ahead of us, in some respects, it may be said, without violating truth, that we have kept up in others, and, in others again, are ahead ourselves. We are to legislate, then, with regard to the present actual state of society; and our own experience shows us that, commencing manufactures at the present highly enlightened and emulous moment, we need not imitate the clumsy helps, with which, in less auspicious times, Governments have sought to enable the ingenuity and industry of their people to hobble along.

The English cotton manufactures began about the commencement of the last reign. Ours can hardly be said to have commenced, with any earnestness, until the application of the power loom, in 1816, not more than eight years ago. Now, sir, I hardly need again speak of its progress, its present extent, or its assurance of future enlargement. In some sorts of fabrics we are already exporters, and the products of our manufactures are, at this moment, in the South American markets. We see, then, what can be done without prohibition or extraordinary protection, because we see what has been done; and I venture to predict that, in a few years, it will be thought wonderful that these branches of manufactures, at least, should have been thought to require additional aid from Government.

Mr. Chairman: The best apology for laws of prohibition and laws of monopoly, will be found in that state of society, not only unenlightened, but sluggish, in which they are most generally established. Private industry, in those days, required strong provocatives, which Governments were seeking to administer by these means.—Something was wanted to actuate and stimulate men, and the prospects of such profits as would, in our times, excite unbounded competition, would hardly move the sloth of former ages. In some instances, no doubt, these laws produced an effect, which, in that period, would not have taken place without them. But our age is wholly of a different character, and its legislation takes another turn. Society is full of excitement; competition comes in place of monopoly; and intelligence and industry ask only for fair play and an open field. Profits, indeed, in such a state of things, will be small, but they will be extensively diffused; prices will be low, and the great body of the people prosperous and happy. It is worthy of remark, that, from the operation of these causes, commercial wealth, while it is increased beyond calculation in its general aggregate, is, at the same time, broken and diminished in its subdivisions. Commercial prosperity should be judged of therefore rather from the extent of trade, than from the magnitude of its apparent profits. It has been remarked, that Spain, certainly one of the poorest nations, made very great profits on the amount of her trade; but with little other benefit than the enriching of a few individuals and companies. Profits to the English merchants engaged in the Levant and Turkey trade, were formerly very great, and there were richer merchants in England some centuries ago, considering the comparative value of money, than at the present highly commercial period. When the diminution of profits arises from the extent of competition, it indicates rather a salutary than an injurious change.*

The true course then, sir, for us to pursue, is, in my opinion, to consider what our situation is, what our means are, and how they can be best applied. What amount of population have we, in comparison with our extent of soil, what amount of capital and labor, at what price? As to skill, knowledge, and enterprise, we may safely take it for granted, that, in these particulars, we are on an equality with others. Keeping these considerations in view, allow me to examine two or three of those provisions of the bill to which I feel the strongest objections.

To begin with the article of iron. Our whole annual consumption of this article is supposed by the chairman of the committee to be 48,000 or 50,000 tons. Let us suppose the latter. The amount of our own manufacture he estimates, I think, at 17,000 tons. The present duty on the imported article is $15 per ton, and as this duty causes, of course, an equivalent augmentation of the price of the home manufacture, the whole increase of price is equal to $750,000 annually. This sum we pay on a raw material, and on an absolute necessity of life. The bill proposes to raise the duty from $15 to $22½ per ton, which would be equal to $1,125,000 on the whole annual consumption. So that, suppose the point of prohibition which is aimed at by some gentlemen to be attained, the consumers of the article would pay this last mentioned sum every year to the producers of it, over and above the price at which they could supply themselves with the same article from other sources. There would be no mitigation of this burden, except from the prospect, whatever that might be, that iron would fall in value, by domestic competition, after the importation should be prohibited. It will be easy, I think, to show that it cannot fall; and supposing for the present that it shall not, the result will be, that we shall pay annually a sum of $1,125,000, constantly augmented, too, by increased consumption of the article, to support a business that cannot support itself. It is of no consequence to the argument that this sum is expended at home; so it would be, if we taxed the people to support any other useless and expensive establishment, to build another Capitol for example, or incur an unnecessary expense of any sort. The question still is, are the money, time, and labor, well laid out in these cases? The present price of iron at Stockholm, I am assured by importers, is $53 per ton on board, $48 per ton in the yard before loading, and probably not far from $40 at the mines. Freight, insurance, &c., may be fairly estimated at $15, to which add our present duty of $15 more, and these two last sums, together with the cost on board at Stockholm, give $83 as the cost of Swedes iron in our market. In fact it is said to have been sold last year at $81½ to $82 per ton. We perceive, by this statement, that the cost of iron is doubled in reaching us from the mine in which it is produced. In other words, our present duty, with the expense of transportation, gives an advantage to the American over the foreign manufacturer, of one hundred per cent. Why, then, cannot the iron be manufactured at home? Our ore is said to be as good, and some of it better. It is under our feet, and the chairman of the committee tells us that it might be wrought by persons who otherwise will not be employed. Why, then, is it not wrought? Nothing could be more sure of constant sale. It is not an article of changeable fashion, but of absolute, permanent necessity, and such, therefore, as would always meet a steady demand. Sir, I think it would be well for the chairman of the committee to revise his premises, for I am persuaded that there is an ingredient properly belonging to the calculation which he has misstated or omitted. Swedes iron in England pays a duty, I think, of about $27 per ton; yet it is imported in considerable quantities, notwithstanding the vast capital, the excellent coal, and, more important than all, perhaps, the highly improved state of inland navigation in England; although I am aware that the English use of Swedes iron may be thought to be owing in some degree to its superior quality.

Sir, the true explanation of this appears to me to lie in the different prices of labor; and here, I apprehend, is the grand mistake in the argument of the chairman of the committee. He says it would cost the nation, as a nation, nothing to make our ore into iron. Now, I think, it would cost us precisely that which we can worst afford; that is, great labor. Although bar iron is very properly considered a raw material in respect to its various future uses, yet, as bar iron, the principal ingredient in its cost is labor. Of manual labor, no nation has more than a certain quantity, nor can it be increased at will. As to some operations, indeed, its place may be supplied by machinery; but there are other services which machinery cannot perform for it, and which it must perform for itself. A most important question for every nation, as well as for every individual to propose to itself, is, how it can best apply that quantity of labor which it is able to perform?

Labor is the great producer of wealth; it moves all other causes. If it call machinery to its aid, it is still employed, not only in using the machinery, but in making it. Now, with respect to the quantity of labor, as we all know, different nations are differently circumstanced. Some need, more than any thing, work for hands; others require hands for work; and, if we ourselves are not absolutely in the latter class, we are still, most fortunately, very near it. I cannot find that we have those idle hands, of which the chairman of the committee speaks. The price of labor is a conclusive and unanswerable refutation of that idea; it is known to be higher with us than in any other civilized State, and this is the greatest of all proofs of general happiness. Labor in this country is independent and proud. It has not to ask the patronage of capital, but capital solicits the aid of labor. This is the general truth, in regard to the condition of our whole population, although in the large cities there are, doubtless, many exceptions. The mere capacity to labor in common agricultural employments gives to our young men the assurance of independence. We have been asked, sir, by the chairman of the committee, in a tone of some pathos, whether we will allow to serfs of Russia and Sweden the benefit of making iron for us? Let me inform the gentleman, sir, that those same serfs do not earn more than seven cents a day, and that they work in those mines, for that compensation, because they are serfs. And, let me ask the gentleman further, whether we have any labor in this country that cannot be better employed than in a business which does not yield the laborer more than seven cents a day? This, it appears to me, is the true question for our consideration. There is no reason for saying that we will work iron because we have mountains that contain the ore. We might, for the same reason, dig among our rocks for the scattered grains of gold and silver which might be found there. The true inquiry is, can we produce the article in a useful state at the same cost, or nearly at the same cost, or at any reasonable approximation towards the same cost, at which we can import it?

Some general estimates of the price and profits of labor, in those countries from which we import our iron, might be formed by comparing the reputed products of different mines, and their prices, with the number of hands employed. The mines of Danemora are said to yield about four thousand tons, and to employ in the mines twelve hundred workmen. Suppose this to be worth fifty dollars per ton; any one will find, by computation, that the whole product would not pay, in this country, for one-quarter part of the necessary labor. The whole export of Sweden was estimated, a few years ago, at 400,000 ship-pounds, or about 54,000 tons. Comparing this product with the number of workmen usually supposed to be employed in the mines which produce iron for exportation, the result will not greatly differ from the foregoing. These estimates are general, and might not conduct us to a precise result; but we know, from intelligent travellers, and eye-witnesses, that the price of labor, in the Swedish mines, does not exceed seven cents a day.*

The true reason, sir, why it is not our policy to compel our citizens to manufacture our own iron, is, that they are far better employed. It is an unproductive business, and they are not poor enough to be obliged to follow it. If we had more of poverty, more of misery, and something of servitude; if we had an ignorant, idle, starving, population, we might set up for iron makers against the world.

The Committee will take notice, Mr. Chairman, that, under our present duty, together with the expense of transportation, our manufacturers are able to supply their own immediate neighborhood; and this proves the magnitude of that substantial encouragement which these two causes concur to give. There is little or no foreign iron, I presume, used in the county of Lancaster. This is owing to the heavy expense of land carriage; and, as we recede farther from the coast, the manufacturers are still more completely secured, as to their own immediate market, against the competition of the imported articles. But what they ask, is to be allowed to supply the seacoast, at such a price as shall be formed by adding to the cost at the mines the expense of land carriage to the sea; and this appears to me most unreasonable. The effect of it would be to compel the consumer to pay the cost of two land transportations; for, in the first place, the price of iron at the inland furnaces, will always be found to be at, or not much below, the price of the imported article in the seaport, and the cost of transportation to the neighborhood of the furnace; and to enable the home product to hold a competition with the imported in the sea-

* The price of labor in Russia may be pretty well collected from Tooke's "View of the Russian Empire." "The workmen in the mines and the foundries are, indeed, all called master-people; but they distinguish themselves into masters, undermasters, apprentices, delvers, servants, carriers, washers, and separators. In proportion to their ability, their wages are regulated, which proceed from fifteen to upwards of thirty roubles per annum. The provisions which they receive from the magazines are deducted from this pay." The value of the rouble at that time (1799) was about twenty-four pence sterling, or forty-five cents of our money.

"By the edict of 1799," it is added, "a laborer with a horse shall receive, daily, in Summer, twenty, and in Winter twelve copecks; a laborer, without a horse, in Summer, ten, in Winter, eight copecks."

A copeck is the hundredth part of a rouble, or about half a cent of our money. The price of labor may have risen, in some degree, since that period, but probably not much.

port, the cost of another transportation downward, from the furnace to the coast, must be added. Until our means of inland commerce be improved, and the charges of transportation by that means lessened, it appears to me wholly impracticable, with such duties as any one would think of proposing, to meet the wishes of the manufacturers of this article. Suppose we were to add the duty proposed by this bill, although it would benefit the capital invested in works near the sea, and the navigable rivers, yet the benefit would not extend far into the interior. Where, then, are we to stop, or what limit is proposed to us?

The freight of iron has been afforded from Sweden to the United States as low as eight dollars per ton. This is not more than the price of fifty miles land carriage. Stockholm, therefore, for the purpose of this argument, may be considered as within fifty miles of Philadelphia. Now, it is at once a just and a strong view of this case, to consider, that there are, within fifty miles of our market, vast multitudes of persons who are willing to labor in the production of this article for us, at the rate of seven cents per day, while we have no labor which will not command, upon the average, at least five or six times that amount. The question is, then, shall we buy this article of these manufacturers, and suffer our own labor to earn its greater reward, or shall we employ our own labor in a similar manufacture, and make up to it, by a tax on consumers, the loss which it must necessarily sustain?

I proceed, sir, to the article of hemp. Of this we imported last year, in round numbers, 6,000 tons, paying a duty of $30 a ton, or $180,000 on the whole amount; and this article, it is to be remembered, is consumed almost entirely in the usages of navigation. The whole burden may be said to fall on one interest. It is said we can produce this article, if we will raise the duties. But why is it not produced now; or why, at least, have we not seen some specimens? For the present is a very high duty when expenses of importation are added. Hemp was purchased at St. Petersburg, last year, at $101 67 per ton. Charges attending shipment, &c., $14 25. Freight may be stated at $30 per ton, and our existing duty is $30 more. These three last sums, being the charges of transportation, amount to a protection of near 75 per cent. in favor of the home manufacturer, if there were any such. And we ought to consider, also, that the price of hemp at St. Petersburg is increased by all the expense of transportation from the place of growth to that port; so that probably the whole cost of transportation, from the place of growth to our market, including our duty, is equal to the first cost of the article; or, in other words, is a protection in favor of our own product of 100 per cent.

And since it is stated that we have great quantities of fine land for the production of hemp, of which I have no doubt, the question recurs, why is it not produced? I speak of the water rotted hemp, for it is admitted that that which is dew rotted is not sufficiently good for the requisite purposes. I cannot say whether the cause be in climate, in the process of rotting, or what else, but the fact is certain, that there is no American water rotted hemp in the market. We are acting, therefore, upon a hypothesis. Is it not reasonable that those who say that they can produce the article, shall at least prove the truth of that allegation before new taxes are laid on those who use the foreign commodity? Suppose this bill passes, the price of hemp is immediately raised $14 80 per ton, and this burden falls immediately on the ship-builder; and no part of it, for the present, will go for the benefit of the American grower, because he has none of the article that can be used, nor is it expected that much of it will be produced for a considerable time. Still, the tax takes effect upon the imported article; and the ship owners, to enable the Kentucky farmer to receive an additional $14 on his ton of hemp, whenever he may be able to raise and manufacture it, pay, in the mean time, an equal sum per ton into the Treasury on all the imported hemp which they are still obliged to use; and this is called "protection!" Is this just or fair? A particular interest is here burdened, not only for the benefit of another particular interest, but burdened also beyond that, for the benefit of the Treasury. It is said to be important for the country that this article should be raised in it; then, let the country bear the expense, and pay the bounty. If it be for the good of the whole, let the sacrifice be made by the whole, and not by a part. If it be thought useful and necessary, from political considerations, to encourage the growth and manufacture of hemp, Government has abundant means of doing it. It might give a direct bounty, and such a measure would, at least, distribute the burden equally; or, as Government itself is a great consumer of this article, it might stipulate to confine its own purchases to the home product, so soon as it should be shown to be of the proper quality. I see no objection to this proceeding, if it be thought to be an object to encourage the production. It might easily, and perhaps properly, be provided, by law, that the Navy should be supplied with American hemp, the quality being good, at any price not exceeding, by more than a given amount, the current price of foreign hemp in our market. Every thing conspires to render some such course preferable to the one now proposed. The encouragement in that way would be ample; and, if the experiment should succeed, the whole subject would be gained; and if it should fail, no considerable loss or evil would be felt by any one.

I stated some days ago, and I wish to renew the statement, what was the amount of the proposed augmentation of the duties on iron and hemp in the cost of a vessel. Take the case of a common ship, at 300 tons, not coppered, nor copper fastened.

It would stand thus by the present duties:

14½ tons iron, for hull, &c..	$15 per ton	$217 50
10 tons of hemp at $30	- - -	300 00
40 bolts Russia duck at $2	- - -	80 00
20 bolts Ravens duck at $1 25	- - -	25 00
On articles of ship chandlery, &c.	- - -	40 00

$662 50

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

APRIL, 1824.

The bill proposes to add:
$7 40 per ton on iron, which will be	-	$107 30
$14 80 per ton on hemp, equal to	-	148 00
And on duck, by the late amendment of the bill, say 25 per cent.	-	25 00
		$280 30

But to the duties on iron and hemp, should be added those paid on copper, whenever that article is used. By the statement which I furnished the other day, it appeared that the duties received by Government, on articles used in the construction of a vessel of 359 tons, with copper fastenings, amounted to $1,056. With the augmentations of this bill, they would be equal to $1,400. Now, I cannot but flatter myself, Mr. Chairman, that, before the Committee will consent to this new burden upon the shipping interest, it will very deliberately weigh the probable consequences. I would again urgently solicit its attention to the condition of that interest. We are told that Government has protected it, by discriminating duties, and by an exclusive right to the coasting trade. But it would retain the coasting trade, by its own natural efforts, in like manner, and with more certainty, than it now retains any portion of foreign trade. The discriminating duties are now abolished, and, while they existed, they were nothing more than countervailing measures; not so much designed to give our navigation an advantage over that of other nations, as to put it upon an equality; and we have, accordingly, abolished ours, when they have been willing to abolish theirs. Look to the rate of freights. Were they ever lower, or even so low? I ask gentlemen who know, whether the harbor of Charleston and the river of Savannah be not crowded with ships seeking employment, and finding none? I would ask the gentlemen from New Orleans, if their magnificent Mississippi do not exhibit, for furlongs, a forest of masts? The condition, sir, of the shipping interest, is not that of those who are insisting on high profits, or struggling for monopoly; but it is the condition of men content with the smallest earnings, and anxious for their bread. The freight of cotton has formerly been three pence sterling, from Charleston to Liverpool, in time of peace. It is now I know not what, or how many, fractions of a penny; I think, however, it is stated at five eighths.

The producers, then, of this great staple, are able, by means of this navigation, to send it, for a cent a pound, from their own doors to the best market in the world.

Mr. Chairman, I will now only remind the Committee that, while we are proposing to add new burdens to the shipping interest, a very different line of policy is followed by our great commercial and maritime rival. It seems to be announced as the sentiment of the Government of England, and undoubtedly it is its real sentiment, that the first of all manufactures is the manufacture of ships. A constant and wakeful attention is paid to this interest, and very important regulations, favorable to it, have been adopted within the last year, some of which I will beg leave to refer to, with the hope of exciting the notice, not only of the Committee, but of all others who may feel, as I do, a deep interest in this subject. In the first place, a general amendment has taken place in the register acts, introducing many new provisions, and, among others, the following:

A direct mortgage of the interest of a ship is allowed, without subjecting the mortgagee to the responsibility of an owner.

The proportion of interest held by each owner is exhibited in the register, thereby facilitating both sales and mortgages, and giving a new value to shipping among the moneyed classes.

Shares, in the ships of co-partnerships, may be registered as joint property, and subject to the same rules as other partnership effects.

Ships may be registered in the name of trustees, for the benefit of joint stock companies; and many other regulations are adopted with the same general view of rendering the mode of holding the property as convenient and as favorable as possible.

By another act, British registered vessels, of every description, are allowed to enter into the general and the coasting trade in the India seas, and may trade to and from India, with any part of the world, except China.

By a third, all limitations and restrictions, as to latitude and longitude, are removed from ships engaged in the Southern whale fishery. These regulations, I presume, have not been made without first obtaining the consent of the East India Company; so true is it found, that real encouragement of enterprise oftener consists, in our days, in restraining or buying off monopolies and prohibitions, than in imposing or extending them.

The trade with Ireland is turned into a free coasting trade; light duties have been reduced, and various other beneficial arrangements made, and still others proposed. I might add, that, in favor of general commerce, and as showing their confidence in the principles of liberal intercourse, the British Government has perfected the warehouse system, and authorized a reciprocity of duties with foreign States, at the discretion of the Privy Council.

This, sir, is the attention which our great rival is paying to these important subjects, and we may assure ourselves that, if we do not keep alive a sense of our own interests, she will not only beat us, but will deserve to beat us.

Sir, I will detain you no longer. There are some parts of this bill which I highly approve; there are others in which I should acquiesce; but those to which I have now stated my objections appear to me so destitute of all justice, so burdensome, and so dangerous to that interest which has steadily enriched, gallantly defended, and proudly distinguished us, that nothing can prevail upon me to give it my support.

When Mr. WEBSTER had concluded—

Mr. WOOD, of New York, stated that he rose with much reluctance, after the several able and intelligent gentlemen who had opposed the policy of the bill before the Committee; nor did he rise so much with a view to reply to what they had advanced, as to state the grounds of his own vote—that as no one had suggested the reasons which influenced his opinion, he deemed it his duty to state them to the Committee.

Sir, said Mr. W., the object of the bill before the Committee is to aid the industry of the country, by adjusting the proportions of the several branches to the state of the country; to aid the introduction and progress of manufacturing industry, by relieving it from the pressure of European competition; to sustain agriculture by providing a domestic market for provisions and raw materials; and to secure a permanent and increasing commerce by providing the materials which are necessary to sustain it. The produce of industry is the nutriment of commerce; and our shipping cannot, for any length of time, exceed the number which that will sustain.

Peace in Europe has cut off the carrying trade, and diminished our commerce in provisions, and the future prosperity of our foreign commerce is involved in the success of our domestic manufactures. However desirable it may be to cherish and enlarge so important a branch of national industry, it would be delusive to expect it to thrive and prosper without employment.

The power of regulating its intercourse with other nations belongs to every independent government. It may admit the productions of other countries, or exclude them. It may admit them freely, or under what modifications it may deem proper. The only way in which domestic manufactures can be aided is, by the imposition of duties; and this power in the distribution of authority between the General Government and those of the States, is allotted to Congress, and they have complete sovereignty over the subject.

It will not be denied that it is the duty of Government to exercise its powers in such manner as will be most conducive to the interests of the country.

In order to form a correct judgment on the subject, it is necessary to examine what are the duties of Government in relation to the industry of its citizens.

This is an important branch of political economy; but, in examining it, very little aid is to be derived from the existing treaties on that subject.

It is the province of political economy to devise the means of promoting the wealth and happiness of nations, and to aid the Government in executing its duties in relation to public industry.

The various writers on this subject have employed themselves principally in abstract and theoretical investigations respecting national wealth, and in estimating the comparative value of different employments of capital and labor, but seem to have framed their several systems without much regard to those elementary principles which lie at the foundation of society, and have omitted to point out the rules necessary to guide the interference of Government, or to define the purposes that require it, and are to be promoted by it, without which, no system of economy can be of much practical utility.

In the absence of all authority, we are compelled to resort to the exercise of our own reason, and to deduce the rules that ought to guide us, from the principles of human nature and of civil society; and I shall now proceed, with the utmost diffidence, to submit the result of my reflections to the candid consideration of the Committee.

Government is instituted for the benefit of the whole community, and is bound to consult the good of the whole; the very existence of society involves some restraint on natural rights, and requires that particular interests should be subordinate to the interests of the whole. A Government like ours, embracing a variety of climate and productions, necessarily requires mutual sacrifices to secure the general welfare. All measures relative to public industry should have reference to the situation of the country, the state of society, the condition of the population, and to the nature and character of the policy of the nation.

It is a constituent principle of the social contract, that the property and employment of the citizens should be conformable with the object of the association, and the ends of its political institutions.

The General Government cannot reach the employments of industry in any other way than by the imposition of duties, and it is the duty of Congress to exercise the power to advance the prosperity of the nation.

It is the duty of Government to introduce and cherish all such branches of industry as are necessary to supply the wants and secure the defence of the nation. This policy is enjoined by the maxim, that a nation should, in time of peace, prepare for war.

A dependence on other nations for necessities of this character, might endanger the safety of the nation; our Navy is a most precious reliance for the defence of the nation, and I humbly conceive it would be true policy to foster the production of the materials necessary to the construction and equipment of our ships, rather than to rely wholly on Russia and Sweden for them. What would be our condition without them in a state of war with those Powers, or with a Power that could exclude us from the Baltic?

The establishments necessary for the fabrication of clothing and arms should be introduced at any sacrifice. No imaginary advantage to be derived from cheaper productions would compensate for the mischiefs that would result from the want of the means of self-subsistence and self-defence in time of war.

A dependence on the exchange of our raw productions of agriculture for manufactured goods, in time of peace, subjects us to all the inconveniences that result from the changes and fluctuations of foreign markets.

Foreign markets are affected by changes in the industry of the country; by changes of policy; by an alteration in their relations with other Powers;—and all intercourse is suspended by a war with this country.

The exchange of our raw productions of agriculture for the manufactured goods of other nations adds to the industry and wealth of other nations, while it retards the growth and development of our own resources. The industry of the nation is the property of the nation, and requires protection against the interference or encroachment of that of other nations, as much as any other species of property.

It is said that the statesmen of Great Britain are opposed to the policy of supporting their manufactures by protecting duties. If this be true, it is because they no longer need support; they have derived all the benefit that protecting duties can give; they have acquired all the skill and facility in production which can result from three hundred years of protection. By this policy their manufacturing industry has attained a perfection which sets all competition at defiance. Her statesmen are governed by the same principle now as formerly. It was then her interest to impose restraints, and it is now her interest to remove them, with regard to such branches as are beyond competition.

Suppose England, with her present population, to be without manufactures, what would be her course of policy? She would be obliged to send a large proportion of her population to her colonies, or to support them as paupers, or provide them with employment. It would be as impossible for her to withstand the overwhelming competition of France and Holland, as it now is for us to embark in competition with her. She would find it necessary to adopt a system of the most rigid restriction, and to pursue the same course of policy that the nation adopted under Edward IV., and for the same reason.

Every consideration of interest and policy requires the introduction of those branches of manufactures that are necessary to supply the wants and secure the defence of the country.

It is the duty of Government to provide employment for all those whom the existing branches of industry will not accommodate, and who are idle for want of employment.

Production and consumption are the great engines of industry. Their reciprocal influence, like the opposite powers of a machine, keep society constantly in motion. If production exceeds consumption, idleness ensues; if consumption exceeds production, it will produce a more vigorous industry, until the balance is restored. The prosperity of a country without foreign commerce consists in an exact balance between production and consumption.

A difference in climate, soil, and industry, in different nations, renders their respective productions mutually beneficial; and it is the policy of commercial nations to produce more than is necessary for their own consumption, and to maintain a vigorous and diversified industry, by the mutual exchange of their peculiar productions.

A limited portion of the population of every agricultural country is adequate to the supply of its wants. The number of the surplus is different in different countries, and is modified by climate, soil, and state of society. In Great Britain, it is stated by Lowe, that 33 per cent. of the population supply the country with provisions; 46 per cent. are engaged in trade and manufactures; and that 21 per cent. comprise all the unproductive classes. From his tables of production, consumption, and exportation, it appears that, of the number engaged in manufactures, 28 per cent. supply the domestic consumption, and 18 per cent. are employed for exportation, or foreign consumption.

In the United States, it appears, from the returns of the last census, that 83 per cent. of our population are engaged in agriculture, and only 4½ in trade and manufactures.

The market which has heretofore sustained the excess of our agricultural industry is diminished; and, allowing one-half of our population to be able to supply us with provisions, and an agriculturist to produce as much here as in Great Britain, 33 per cent. of our population do not produce what less than half the number could produce, with the inducement of a market. The unproductive classes, with such as are unoccupied for want of employment, make up the remaining 12½ per cent. of our population.

It is estimated that one-half of our population would be competent to supply the country with provisions; that 25 per cent. could furnish us with the necessary manufactures; that 10 per cent. would embrace all the unproductive classes; and that the remaining 15 per cent. might be employed in agriculture or manufactures for exportation.

Whether the population of a country is more or less numerous, without a foreign market, a portion of the population will be without any sure and constant employment; the production will exceed the consumption of the country, and new branches of industry will become necessary.

The permanent excess of production over consumption is the only correct criterion by which the necessity of a division of labor is to be determined. This does not depend on any particular ratio of the population to the extent of country, or to the square mile. This is altogether arbitrary and uncertain.

It has been alleged that the United States are not populous enough for manufactures; that Great Britain contains 165 to a square mile, and that the whole territory of the United States does not contain four to a square mile.

It would have been as fair to have added Canada and New Holland to Great Britain, as the region beyond the Mississippi to the United States; and that would have made the ratio less unequal. Lowe estimates the population of England, in 1377, some time after the woollen manufacture was established in that country, at 2,300,000, which is only about forty-six to a square mile; which is less than that of some of the States; and states, that there were only eighteen towns that contained above 3,000 inhabitants. The superior capacity of the United States for manufactures, is so obvious, that it would be a waste of time to make the comparison.

It is not the density of population in the country, but the collection of people in towns and villages, that facilitates a division of labor and furnishes a sufficiency of hands, and a market, that will support a diversified industry. There is no certain rule, but the one before stated; when production exceeds consumption, and a portion of the people are without occupation, for want of employment, the period has arrived when a division of labor has become necessary. This rule is certain, simple, without ambiguity, and admits of universal application.

The disposition, or employment of the surplus population, is a proper subject of legislative regulation. This involves no interference with private rights, and is no violation of the freedom of industry; the object is to provide employment for those who have none, whose industry is repressed by the policy or interfering industry of other nations, and which nothing short of legislative interference can relieve.

The growth of our manufactures is as effectually prevented by the moral restraints imposed by the superior advantages of those countries with whom we have a free and regular commercial intercourse, as if they were under legal restrictions, and no power less than that of the nation can control those obstacles.

This is an important branch of public policy; it is the true foundation of political economy, the basis of national wealth; every system that is not erected on this foundation, rests on the sand.

The interference of Government to secure employment to this class of the population, is absolutely necessary to render the nation industrious. Industry will always be in proportion to its reward. If a farmer has no market for his surplus productions, the supply of his own wants will be the measure of his exertions; and if there be no foreign demand for the surplus produce of the country, the industry of the nation will be limited to the supply of the nation. The want of a market for surplus productions as effectually limits the exertions of industry, as if the surplus was liable to the grasp of a licensed plunderer, as is now the case in Turkey. Whether the surplus of the farmer perishes on his hands, or is taken from him by force, the effect on industry is the same.

It is the policy of Government to provide objects for the occupation of all the citizens. The general prevalence of industry among the great mass of the people is indispensable to good order, peace, and domestic security; to prevent idleness, pauperism, and crime, and all those mischiefs which usually result from an unoccupied and necessitous population.

The interference of Government to provide employment for labor, is necessary to encourage marriage and foster the increase of population. The increase of population is usually in proportion to the means of acquiring subsistence. Man is the only being on earth that is endowed with moral and intellectual powers—to multiply the number, is to subserve the designs of Providence, by extending the empire of moral excellence; numbers also contribute to the wealth and glory of a nation.

Marriage lies at the foundation of society; it involves the tenderest relations of life; is the nurseries of all the virtues, and the constant scene of their exercise. It is in domestic society that the principles of order, subordination, industry, and virtue, are acquired, and youth are trained for the duties of riper years. An inability to provide support for a family deters from marriage, and retards the increase of population; it is fostered by a thriving state of society—by peace and security—and by all those moral and physical causes which encourage industry and insure its reward.

Again, the interference of Government to procure employment for the surplus population is required to increase the wealth of the nation.

National wealth consists in the improvements and productions of industry, and in the general distribution of the necessaries and comforts of life among the great body of the people.

The great sources of national wealth are agriculture, manufactures, internal trade, and foreign commerce. Each of these branches of business contributes more or less to sustain the industry of the nation—united they multiply the operations of labor, and lay the most secure and solid foundation for the increase of consumable commodities, the genuine ingredients of national wealth. It is necessary to the health of the body politic, that each of these branches should be in proportion to the peculiar office which it is destined to perform in the operations of the industry of the nation.

A disproportion in the organs necessary to enable it to perform its proper functions, deforms society as much as a disproportion in the necessary members would deform the human body—they are all necessary, and intimately connected—the prosperity of one is interwoven with that of the other.

Agriculture furnishes subsistence and raw materials—manufacturing industry fabricates and improves the raw materials for use and consumption, and furnishes a new stock of rich and valuable articles, which commerce exchanges for the produce and manufactures of other countries. The invention of modern times has greatly aided and extended manufacturing industry, by furnishing the means of supplying the place, and avoiding the expense of manual labor, by machinery.

The annual production of Great Britain and Ireland, exclusive of pasture and food for beasts, is estimated by Mr. Lowe at £330,000,000, which is derived from the following sources:

Agriculture	-	-	-	£117,000,000
Mines and minerals, including coal	-	-	-	9,000,000
Manufactures	-	-	-	114,000,000
Internal trade and banking	-	-	-	35,000,000
Foreign commerce and shipping	-	-	-	46,000,000
Coasting trade	-	-	-	2,000,000
Fisheries, exclusive of Newfoundland	-	-	-	2,000,000
Foreign income remitted	-	-	-	5,000,000
				£330,000,000

Manufactures contribute more than twenty-five per cent. of the whole production—the income from internal trade is less than that from foreign commerce. This is to be ascribed to the limited extent of the country. Internal trade increases with the extent of the country, the variety of climate it embraces, and the facilities of its internal communication. The internal trade of China is said to be equal to the whole trade of the several States of Europe with each other.

It is stated in an official report that the exports and imports of France in 1789 amounted to nearly 800,000,000 of francs, and that the whole was not a fifteenth part of her internal commerce. The profits of the industry which manufactures and internal trade put in motion, are earned within the country, and operate exclusively for its benefit, by augmenting the income and improving the resources of the country, while foreign commerce benefits the industry and resources of all nations indiscriminately.

No country on earth has so many natural facilities for internal intercourse as the United States, and in no country, when our resources come to be fully developed, will it be more productive.

Again, the interference of Government in relation to its surplus population, is necessary to fix the character and policy of the nation. It is the occupation or employment of the surplus population that forms the political character of the nation.

The policy which we have heretofore pursued was adapted to the existing state of the country in relation to the war in Europe, but is not suited to the new state of things which has resulted from a general peace; nor is the political character of the nation fully settled; our moral and physical energies may be devoted to war and conquest, or to peace and the cultivation of the arts, which improve and adorn society according to the direction we give to the passions of our surplus population.

Men are governed by their passions; and it is the province of a wise Government to avail itself of the passions of the people, and to render them subservient to the true interest of the nation. That to which it gives the ascendancy, characterizes the policy of the nation, and fixes its destiny—this will be illustrated by a recurrence to history.

It was the policy of the Romans to render every other passion subservient to the love of military glory, and that formed the distinguishing trait in their national character. The Greeks gave the ascendancy to the love of literary fame, and that formed the most prominent feature in the character of the nation.

These two nations are thus characterized by the great Roman poet, in the form of an ancient prophecy, depicting their future destinies:

Excudent alii spirantia mollius æra,
Credo equidem; vivos ducent de marmore vultus;
Orabunt causas melius: cœlique meatus
Describent radio, et surgentia sidera dicent;
Tu regere imperio populos, Romane, memento:
Hæ tibi erunt artes: pacisque imponere morem,
Parcere subjectis, et debellare superbos.

"Let others better mould the running mass
Of metals; and inform the breathing brass;
And soften into flesh a marble face;
Plead better at the bar, describe the skies,
And when the stars descend, and when they rise;
But, Rome, 'tis thine alone, with awful sway,
To rule mankind, and make the world obey!
Disposing peace and war—thy own majestic sway—
To tame the proud—the fettered slave to free;—
These are imperial arts, and worthy thee!"—DRYDEN.

The disposition of the surplus population has formed the character and policy of every nation.

It was the policy of Egypt and India, as it is that of China, to avoid intercourse with foreign nations, and to live within themselves. They employed their surplus population in vast military establishments, and in public works. To this policy must be ascribed the canals, the magnificent temples, and the pyramids of Egypt, and to the same policy must be ascribed the great wall and the canals of China. They were obliged to preserve a balance between the different departments of industry, in order to secure the subsistence of the nation; every occupation is discouraged in China that would be likely to draw from agriculture the proportion necessary to subsist the nation.

So nicely is the balance of production and consumption adjusted, that foreign commerce, by diverting labor from agriculture to manufactures, would endanger the subsistence of the nation.

It is not from caprice, therefore, but on the soundest maxims of her policy, that China interdicts the extension of foreign commerce to her citizens.

The effect of an anti-commercial policy is to limit industry, and to multiply the proportion of unproductive hands; to retard the progress of improvement; to keep the nation stationary; to render it selfish and unsocial; and to cherish a spirit of jealousy and hostility towards other nations.

The policy of Rome was war and extension of empire. She had no friendly intercourse with other nations, and employed the whole of her surplus population in her armies. The love of military glory absorbed every other passion: to be distinguished in war was the highest ambition of her Consuls, and her soldiers, and military prowess formed the themes of her poets and historians. This policy was hostile to the peace and independence of all nations, and ultimately subjected them to her dominion, and rendered her the mistress of the world.

In Europe, before the decline of the feudal system, every man was a soldier. To that system succeeded the practice of employing mercenaries in time of war, who in peace formed a banditti, and covered Europe with rapine and disorder. To relieve the country from this scourge, recourse was had to standing armies, in which the surplus population was employed.

After the discovery of America, and the passage to India by the Cape of Good Hope, the surplus population of Europe was taken off by colonization. In the meantime, the arts were introduced into Italy from Constantinople. Towns were erected, with certain immunities favorable to liberty and industry. The influence of these communities, in aiding the sovereigns to curb the power of the nobility; in suppressing robbery; in repressing the spirit of war, by giving employment to the people; in improving agriculture, and in increasing the comforts of society, and the wealth of the country, procured their establishment throughout Europe. These communities were the birth-place and nursery of manufactures in different countries, and are enumerated by all the writers on the subject, as one of the principal causes of civilization in Europe. A demand for the products of industry, which pervades society in every stage of its progress, rendered intercourse between the several nations more frequent, removed their mutual jealousies and prejudices, which had kept them in perpetual wars, and improved the manners and ameliorated the condition of the people.

Commerce and manufactures introduced a new era in the history of Europe. The several nations adopted a policy more congenial with the natural rights of men and the improved state of society than war.

The good effects of industry in tempering the violence of the passions, and in enlisting them on the side of law and order, led the sovereigns of Europe to foster the establishments of industry in their dominions. New objects of desire brought new passions into exercise, and secured the ascendancy of that which is more universal and constant in its operation than any other, and better adapted to the ends of the social union.

They are thus taught by experience to estimate the influence of the passions on society, and the importance of giving effect to that, the prevalence of which is intimately connected with the peace, order, and prosperity, of society; the great secret of modern policy—the true foundation of public security.

They substituted the love of property for the love of military glory, and lessened the inducements to war by making peace the interest of the great body of the people, by a productive industry. This policy characterizes all their regulations that are intended to secure employment to their surplus population. They encouraged manufactures by securing to them the domestic market, and by providing a market for them in other nations, by stipulations with those nations for the mutual exchange of their productions.

The effect of which policy is to increase the quantity of industry—to lessen the number of unproductive hands—to facilitate the means of subsistence and comfort, and to render the whole population contented and happy.

The United States since they were independent, have until recently, found it their interest to continue the policy that was imposed on them by Great Britain while colonies; they have devoted themselves almost exclusively to agriculture, and have exported their provisions and raw materials, and exchanged them for the manufactured goods of other countries, and chiefly for those of Great Britain.

While the war in Europe continued, the demand for our provisions created an active industry, and gave employment to all our citizens. The peace in Europe, by enabling those countries to augment the products of agriculture, has destroyed the demand for our provisions, and has left us without a market for our surplus productions, or with a very limited one; many articles of agricultural produce cannot be sold for the cost of production; this has paralyzed agricultural industry; the farmers have contracted their operations and diminished the number of their hands.

Improved land has fallen, and become the most unprofitable subject for the investment of capital. The whole estimate of real estate in New York fell 18 per cent. under the advantage of a vast expenditure, from 1815 to 1821. Many, who a few years since, purchased their farms on credit, have been obliged to sell them at a sacrifice. In many cases of partial payments, farms have been sold for less than the sum for which they were mortgaged, and the owners are ruined. The uncertainty of a market for the productions of agriculture forbids purchases on credit, and a large class of industrious citizens are without any certain or constant means of employment.

Our manufacturers are excluded from our own markets as well as from those of other countries by the superior advantages of British manufacturers. Their industry languishes, and many of them are thrown out of employment, as well as the farmers; many of our forges are abandoned; factories erected at great expense, are shut up; many flouring mills are idle, and many vessels are lying at our wharves for want of freight. The number of paupers, especially that class which require only occasional relief, is rapidly increasing. The expense of paupers in New York increased from 1815 to 1822, from $245,000 to $470,000.

Permanent paupers to the whole population in England are in the ratio - - of 1 to 22
In Pennsylvania - - - of 1 to 265
In Delaware - - - of 1 to 227
In New York - - - of 1 to 220
In Connecticut - - - of 1 to 150
In New Hampshire - - of 1 to 100
In Massachusetts - - - of 1 to 68

Perseverance in our present condition will increase and aggravate these evils. It is the settled policy of the manufacturing nations of Europe to derive the means of subsistence from their own soil, and without a market for our surplus productions or a division of labor by the introduction of new branches of industry, a portion of our population will be without employment.

What is the true policy of the nation in relation to its surplus population?

No plan will afford permanent relief that is not calculated to embrace the whole mass of our surplus population in every stage of society to the utmost extent of its future increase. It is calculated that the United States will, at no very distant period, contain 200,000,000 people, and if we divide this population as that of Great Britain is now divided, the surplus will amount to 36,000,000, of which, at least 3,600,000 will be men capable of bearing arms.

The whole of these people must be supported; Government must enable them to support themselves, or must support them, or they will be compelled to seek subsistence by means less favorable to the peace and good order of society. It is the province of a wise policy to guard by prudential provisions against an event so unpropitious as the last.

The direction which we now give to the employment of our surplus population is of the highest importance; it is destined to endure for ages, to fix the character and policy of an immense empire, and through its influence to affect the moral condition of the world.

Government must mould the passions to its views, or the passions will mould the Government to suit their gratification: let the current once take its course, you in vain attempt to change its direction; it wears a deeper and deeper channel, till at length every impediment that can be interposed to obstruct its progress, will be swept away by its impetuosity.

The time has arrived, in the progress of society in the United States, when a division of labor has become necessary; it will not be possible much longer to prevent it; prudence requires that we should make provision for its introduction. If we forbear to refuse to act, a policy may be forced on us which may be contrary to our wishes, and hostile to the interests of the nation. We must direct the course of our policy, or accident will determine it. We may now direct and control the popular passions; we may give them an impulse that may fix the character and policy of the nation conformable to our wishes; but an attempt to restrain them, when once they have become inflamed by a favorite pursuit, would be in vain.

There are only three courses for us to pursue: we must adopt the policy of China, of Rome, or of modern Europe.

The policy of China is unsocial, hostile to industry, to population, to the cultivation of the intellectual powers, and to all those improvements that are derived from the mutual intercourse of nations.

It would be incompatible with our moral feelings and habits, as well as views of national prosperity, to imitate the policy of that singular Government.

Shall we adopt that of Rome, and employ our surplus population in wars, for the extension of empire? A military policy would require that the whole energies of the nation should be directed to the improvement of its physical force; that a military spirit should pervade the nation; that the love of military glory should absorb every other passion; and that distinction in war should become the highest object of ambition.

Conquests must be achieved, the empire must be enlarged, your generals must be rewarded with the governments of the conquered countries, and your treasury supplied by taxes levied on them.

What would be the end of this policy? Lift the veil that hides futurity from your view; cast your eyes down the long vista of time; behold a future Pompey returning from his government, loaded with wealth and military honors, seeking a new command; behold, on the other hand, a future Cæsar, preferring his claim to a choice of the provinces, and returning with his legions to support his pretensions; see the State divided, distracted, and terrified, by the conflict between these mighty conquerors. The sword decides the contest; victory inclines for Cæsar; and now, without a rival, he is no longer satisfied with half of the empire, he claims the whole; and the Senate, the last hope of the Republic, overawed by his fortune, submits to the conqueror, and liberty expires!

Who can contemplate this picture, without shrinking from the thought of a military policy?

What has happened may happen again; human nature is the same in every age, and the tendency of the passions, in like circumstances, is the same. The spirit of conquest lessens the force of domestic attachments, relaxes the ties that bind society together, and enfeebles the restraints of moral obligation.

The spirit of the age, the state of society, our local situation, and the principles of our political institutions, forbid our adopting the policy of Rome, or becoming a conquering nation.

Our true policy consists in the improvement of our physical and moral condition, not in the extension of empire. It is our interest, in imitation of the policy of modern Europe, by a productive industry, to give employment to all our citizens, to insure the means of subsistence to all—to make peace the interest of all, by a community of interests, by a common participation in the enjoyments of society, and by all those ties by which the social union is cemented, and the country endeared to its citizens.

The only practicable course to effect these purposes is to introduce and foster a branch of industry which will contribute to the supply of our own wants and will furnish productions which are in demand in other countries, and to secure a market for them, by establishing commercial intercourse with those countries. No branch of industry can be compared with manufactures in this respect.

Most nations raise their own provisions, but few supply themselves wholly with manufactured goods. There are no commodities for which there is so universal and uniform a market—they are an object of desire to the civilized man and to the savage; the demand for them is co-extensive with the habitable earth, and will be coeval with its duration.

The durable nature of most manufactures, and the general demand for them, render them much fitter to sustain the changes and fluctuations of foreign markets, than the productions of agriculture.

The labor of that portion of our population, which exceeds the number necessary to maintain our present rate of agricultural productions, is competent to produce the greater part of necessary manufactures.

The establishment of manufactures would divide the labor of agriculture between provisions and raw materials, would furnish a domestic market for a portion of them, and would reduce the surplus for exportation within the limits of the demand for foreign consumption.

The introduction of manufacturing establishments among us cannot be effected without some difficulty; but the advantages that will result to the community will compensate for the sacrifice.

Such are the advantages of the British manufacturer over the American, that the duties heretofore laid, together with all the incidental expenses, do not prevent his underselling him in our own market, except in a few cases in which they were intended to be prohibitory. The superiority of the British manufacturer results from low wages, which lessen the price of production, and an unlimited market, which enables him to sell for a small profit, or at a low price. The price of labor is in proportion to the expense of living and the scarcity of hands. There is very little difference in the expense of living; clothing is dearer, but provisions are cheaper here than there. The expense of a pauper is very nearly the same in the two countries.

Hands are scarcer and common laborers live better here than in Great Britain; this last circumstance is the result of the state of society, and the equality of our political institutions, and it is not the wish of patriotism that it should be otherwise.

Hands are, however, in sufficient numbers for the establishments that would be erected for some time to come, and the number will increase as they may be required for new employments. Besides, the price of labor is relative, it is in proportion to the compensation of other employments, and the price of all other things, and the difference is almost wholly done away by the use of machinery.

The American capitalist has no encouragement to invest his capital in manufacturing establishments, unless he can be assured of the domestic market, and this cannot be assured to him in any other way than by the imposition of duties equal to the difference in the price at which the British and American manufacturer can afford to sell the same article in our market.

The additional duty will necessarily enhance the price of the goods to the consumer, until it is reduced by the acquisition of skill, experience, and an extended market, by the American manufacturer.

The additional price, however, is not, as has been alleged, for the exclusive benefit of the manufacturer. It is divided among all who in any respect contribute to the production of the article. The farmer will receive a portion of it in the increased price of the raw materials and provisions which he furnishes. The workmen will receive a part of it in their wages, and the manufacturer will only retain the ordinary profit on his capital.

Nor is the additional price secured by the duty advanced by the consumers without a consideration; they are compensated by the augmented demand and increased price of their labor and commodities. The additional price will, indeed, be divided among all classes of society, and all will be reimbursed by the impulse it will give to the industry of all.

The additional duties will secure to the country all the advantages which can result to its industry and wealth, from the fabrication of nearly thirty millions of manufactured goods, which now add to the industry and resources of other nations.

If the duties in the bill are not properly graduated, they may be altered; that forms no objection to the principle.

There is very little doubt if our industry is directed to such manufactures as are aided by machinery, and employed on such raw materials as the country produces in sufficient quantity, and at a reasonable rate, but that they will succeed under a reasonable protection. Skill and experience will follow, capital will be accumulated, and our manufacturers will soon be able to supply our own wants at a reasonable price, and to sustain a competition with foreign manufacturers in foreign markets.

The successful establishment of manufactures will give activity to agriculture, will cement our Union by the ties of mutual interest, by creating an internal trade between the different sections of the country, by beneficial exchanges of raw materials and provisions for manufactured goods, will provide materials for a permanent and increasing foreign commerce, will diffuse the means of comfort among the poorer classes of the community, and will augment the wealth, strength, and happiness of the nation.

But the policy embraced by the bill is recommended by still higher considerations. It will repress the spirit of conquest, will secure the peace of the country by making its continuance the interest of all our citizens, and it will have a salutary influence on the moral condition of the world, by exhibiting an example of a people living under free institutions, wholly devoted to the pursuits of private industry and the cultivation of the arts which improve and adorn society—cultivating a friendly intercourse with all nations, and contributing, by mutual exchanges of the products of their industry, and a reciprocation of good offices to the happiness of all.

Under a conviction that the policy involved in the bill will contribute to these results, and render the country a blessing to the world, I shall conclude my remarks with regard to it with the wish of Father Paul, in relation to his country—"esto perpetua."

When Mr. Wood had taken his seat—

Mr. GARNETT said, although the immediate subject before the Committee was a motion to strike out the minimum on cottons, following the example of those who had preceded him in the debate, he should take the opportunity to offer some of his views on the general merits of the bill. He did not intend to take so wide a range as some of the gentlemen who had spoken; for, if he had the inclination, he had not the physical ability to be elaborate.

More important consequences, said Mr. G., than those involved in the policy of this bill, could scarcely be presented to the hopes or the fears of the nation. It is a policy which, departing from the true and safe design of the Constitution, which limits the power of taxation to raising revenue, assumes a principle that renders it undefinable and illimitable—a principle, which, under the pretext of promoting the national wealth and independence, enables the Government to destroy the revenue; to violate the rights of property; to change the political relations of the States that compose the Confederacy; and, perhaps, finally to subvert the Constitution itself. Since I have been a member of this House, said Mr. G., I have witnessed the discussion of many questions of the deepest interest, affecting the integrity and existence of the Constitution—questions which produced an intensity of excitement proportioned to their high importance; but, in my opinion, none has ever been agitated, which more deserves to excite our interest and anxiety, than the present; for, if the policy now proposed should be adopted, the Constitution itself is no longer of any value, it is insufficient for the ends for which it was established; it is inadequate to secure our liberty and happiness. If a legislature, which is supposed to contain the assembled wisdom of the freest, (it does not become me to say the most enlightened,) people on earth, in this advanced age of human reason, in a time of profound tranquillity, without foreign force or internal corruption, can, after mature deliberation, under an idea of public benefit, voluntarily revive a system of policy which belongs to a darker age; which is utterly incompatible with the rights of property, and the principles of free government; which alike sets at naught the speculations of philosophy, the lessons of experience, and the obligations of justice; and which goes to surrender all our acquisitions of wealth, liberty, and knowledge, and to subvert the whole frame of polity which we have established for their security and advancement; such a spectacle must be calculated, not only to destroy all prospects of our own happiness, but to extinguish the best hopes for the future progress and improvement of human society. It will show the perversity of man to be such, that no matter what blessings a kind Providence may have bestowed on him; no matter what advantages he may have secured by his wisdom, or achieved by his valor, they are not destined to endure; that there is a morbid principle in his nature which forbids the perfection, and limits the duration of his happiness; and that, if evil does not assail him from some external source, he will find or fabricate it for himself.

When a new measure of policy is proposed, while it is important to understand its true character, it is sometimes not unimportant to examine the motives which lead to it. And, when I speak of motives, I wish it to be understood, that I allude to the great body of manufacturers in the nation, not to their Representatives in this House, who are acting in obedience to their instructions. The alleged motive of the proposed system is the promotion of the national wealth and independence; but, is it not strange that the patriotic zeal for these objects should be confined entirely to certain classes of individuals, and to geographical divisions? Is it not strange that the people of the South, whose patriotism has never been impeached, or even suspected, as far as I know, should, all at once, be entirely insensible to considerations of national prosperity, and should not only not participate in the zeal for its promotion, but should be passionately opposed to it? Is it not passing strange that their grievances should be made the pretext for the system, and yet, that the remedy should apply exclusively to others? Yes! their grievances, I say, because the apology is, the refusal of foreigners to receive our agricultural produce; (the people of the South are all agriculturists;) and yet the benefit accrues entirely to the manufacturers. Do not these considerations force every dispassionate mind to the conclusion, that general prosperity and national independence are not contemplated by this system?—that local advantages, individual wealth, and dangerous aggrandizement are its real objects.

But, Mr. G. said, he was willing to meet gentlemen on the question of national wealth and independence. That, after all, was the real question. Gentlemen might consider the subject in as many relations as they pleased—historical, political, economical, financial, metaphysical—and he believed it had been considered in all these and many others,) the true inquiry was this: Would the national wealth be increased or diminished? If it would be increased, were the means just and lawful? And if it would be diminished, were there any advantages to compensate us for the sacrifice? He thought it would not be difficult to demonstrate that the national wealth would be diminished, that there could be no compensation for this diminution, and that the means were unjust and unconstitutional.

Why the very statement of the question implied that there was an immediate loss to the nation from this system. What did it propose? Certain manufacturers came to you, and said they could not sell their manufactures, because foreigners brought commodities of the same kind to this country, and sold them cheaper than they could do, and they asked you to raise the price of them: to make your citizens pay more for them. This immediate loss nobody did, nobody could, deny; but the pretext was, that it was temporary; that subsequently, the consumer would be indemnified, directly, by getting the domestic manufacture cheaper than the foreign; and indirectly, by getting a higher price in the home market, for his own products. Now, on the reality of this promised indemnification, the whole question depended. If there were no such indemnity, the system must be abandoned, as utterly indefensible and absurd; unless it could be shown that there was some other advantage in it to compensate for its evils. He should endeavor to prove that the expectation of any such indemnity or any other benefit, was entirely fallacious. But, before he entered on this part of the subject, he would take occasion to remark, that, if there really was no compensatory circumstances in this system, the manner in which the immediate loss, which was admitted, was distributed in the community, was an inquiry of the highest importance—an inquiry involving the justice of the measure, and the right of the Government to take the property of one citizen without compensation, and give it to another, and to reduce the mass of national wealth, without a public benefit. With a view to show in what manner this loss was distributed, he would read, (if he should not be accused of egotism,) from the report of the Committee on Agriculture, made in 1821, an extract which contained a more precise and accurate illustration of the distributive operation of protecting duties, than any he could then think of; and which, he was bold to say, but for a single error or inadvertence not affecting the general conclusion, which had been pointed out to him by an honorable friend from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES,) would be found entirely unexceptionable:

"The first position that it will be attempted to prove, is, that the necessary effect of an increase of duties is, to diminish both immediately and ultimately, the amount of national wealth. The loss, however, of the nation, the loss of those who pay the duties, and the gain of those who receive them, do not always correspond, but vary, with particular circumstances. In what manner this loss and gain are distributed in society, will be best illustrated by an example. If, for instance, a community of four persons were engaged in an occupation which enabled them to realize six per cent. on equal capitals, and three of them were to give the fourth one per cent. or one-third of one per cent. each, to enable him to carry on an employment in which, unassisted, he could only make five per cent., it is evident that the loss of the contributors would be one per cent., and that it would be exactly the loss of the community, whilst the gain of the receiver would be nothing; and, unless that part of his profits which he received from the others was as productively employed as it was by them, he might be a loser, and thus still further augment the loss of the community. But this is a case that would not be apt to occur. The fourth individual must have something more than six per cent. which he already made, to induce him to abandon his old occupation, and pursue a new one, say seven per cent. In this case, the others would have to pay him two-thirds of one per cent. each. It is obvious, now, that the loss of the contributors would be two per cent.; that the gain of the receiver would be one per cent., and that it would correspond with the loss of the community, which would also be one per cent. or the difference between the productive value of his old and new employment. If this bounty were given to induce an individual to continue an occupation in which he was already engaged, then, although the contributor would lose all he paid, and the receiver would gain it; the community would lose nothing, and there would only be a transfer of wealth from one to another. This, however, would not be the case with a manufacture thus continued by a bounty. There would be an immediate loss, occasioned by the increased cost of consumption; nor would it be possible to make one employment so much more profitable than another, without its attracting capital from that other; and this would be the source of innumerable other losses, hereafter to be noticed. In the case that has been stated, it is clear, that the loss of the contributors is exactly what they pay; the gain of the receiver is their loss, less the difference between the productive value of his old and new employment, and the loss of the community is precisely this difference. In manufactures, such would be the operation of a duty that was prohibitory; a duty that was merely protective, would permit a portion of the commodities consumed to be bought of foreigners, and thus a part of it would go into the Treasury. This would not vary the proportion of the loss and gain of the contributors and receivers, but would, in some degree, increase the loss of the community, as composed of both, as this portion of the duty would be less productively employed by the Government than it would have been, had it remained in the hands of either of the parties. This does not prove that prohibitory are better than protecting duties. There are other consequences which make duties injurious in proportion to their amount. All these observations may be applied, (mutatis mutandis), to the consumers, the manufacturers, and the nation, under the protecting duty system. Two descriptions of persons would derive the benefit; a few, who continue their old employments, and a great many who engage in new ones. In both cases, the loss of the consumer is what he pays, and is unredeemed by any circumstances whatever. In the first case, the loss of the nation arises from the increased cost of consumption; in the second, it arises from this cause, and the diminished productive value of the new employments of society. In the first case, the gain of the manufacturer is the loss of the consumer, less the increased cost of his own consumption; in the second, it is this loss diminished by the same cause, and the diminished productive value of his labor. But, besides these direct losses, there are others, indirect and collateral, which are, however, not less inevitable; losses which affect the consumers, and, in some degree, ultimately reach the manufacturers themselves."

This statement left entirely out of view all those indirect and collateral losses arising from the destruction and suspension of the fixed and the circulating capital of the country; from the diminution of consumption, and consequently of production; from forcing commercial capital abroad in search of employment; and from the general stagnation of business produced by the compulsory transfer of property, and by the reluctant exertions of vicarious and unrewarded industry; these, and many other evil consequences, were inevitable; but they were undefinable and incalculable, because they were immeasurable and progressive. Each might furnish matter for a separate argument; but he meant to confine himself to the immediate, direct, and admitted loss, which, though inferior in magnitude to the collateral losses, was susceptible of more strict calculation. If he could show that there was no compensation for this, it would be enough. The development of all its unhappy consequences might aggravate the inexpediency of the policy, but could not render it more clearly unjust and absurd.

I am aware, continued Mr. G., that every argument which does not profess to be founded on statistical facts, but appeals to general principles, is stigmatized by the advocates of this system as theoretical. But this is only one of the artifices of the rhetoricians, whereby a speaker endeavors to weaken and discredit a charge, to which he knows himself to be liable, by bringing it against his adversary. In the invidious sense of the term, they are certainly more liable to the charge than their opponents. The truth is, both parties have theories, if they have general principles. The difference is, that the theory of the enemies of the system has been approved and confirmed by the reason and experience of mankind, while that of its friends has been condemned and exploded—has been proved to be (what it will now turn out to be in more than one sense) a speculation—to be a system founded, not on a cautious examination and inductive arrangement of facts, but on partial views, incoherent generalizations, and hazardous conjectures. A theory (which, properly speaking, must be derived from the observation of facts,) is nothing more than the expression of the general principle which explains the relation of cause and effect as to these facts, and being thus evolved by events that have happened, is applicable fairly to those that are to come. If a statesman affirms that a system of measures will be followed by a chain of consequences, he must certainly have some general principles, some theory by which he can explain their connexion. If he can give no better reason for his assertion than his belief that such measures had been followed by such consequences heretofore; if he is unable to explain why the cause should produce the effect; and if his expectations conflict with received maxims, why, there is every reason to suppose that he labors under some mistake; and that such consequences have either not taken place at all, or that they have existed under different circumstances, or have been owing to other causes than those to which he ascribes them. But though we have a right to expect some exposition of the general principles of the system, in all that I have heard in this House, or read out of it, said Mr. G., I have met with no attempt to analyze and demonstrate its necessary tendency to increase the national wealth, its modus operandi. Instead of this, gentlemen invariably appeal to what they choose to denominate facts or examples, which either do not exist, or which, if admitted, would depend entirely on the general principles by which they are explained, whether they support or overthrow their argument. Their favorite example, and one which the Speaker has made the theme of a considerable part of his speech, (which was characterized by his usual eloquence,) is that of England. But most of the enlightened men in England, both theoretical and practical, are united in the opinion that she has become wealthy, not by the restrictive system, but in spite of it; presenting a weight of authority against this system, that it would be more chivalrous than logical even for the Speaker to defy. England owes her prosperity to her great moral and natural advantages—to the genius and enterprise of her people—her comparatively free institutions—her insular position—fuel, navigation, colonies, &c. If she owes it to her restrictive system, let it be shown how it has operated. This cannot be done. Gentlemen must first show that the causes I have enumerated, on the authority above alluded to, either have had no effect at all, or they must assign to them the precise quantum of effect they have produced; and then, if any yet remain unaccounted for, they still have the task of proving that it is owing to the restrictive system. But political economy, though admitting of a great degree of certainty in its results, is not exactly like the science of experimental philosophy, where, by successively abstracting the circumstances which attend a phenomenon, you may, by the inductive process, determine which of them stands in the relation with it of cause to effect; and I fancy it will puzzle any political metaphysician, however great an adept he may be in the theory of causation, to trace the necessary sequence of the wealth of England to her restrictive policy.

The honorable Speaker had ascribed the general distress which pervaded the country to the absence of this system; or, in other words, to the absence of taxation; for though he had defined the tariff to be a tax on foreign industry, it was, to all intents and purposes, a tax on domestic consumption. There was something new in the Speaker's doctrine. He had often heard of the distress and ruin produced by taxation, but had never known them to be occasioned by the absence of it. But there were much more familiar phenomena than that of distress, (if, indeed, any thing could be more familiar,) on the causes of which very knowing persons differed. As he was ascending the marble staircase of the Senate the other day, he heard a member ask a messenger what was the cause of the water with which the steps were covered? The messenger replied, that "the stones were a sweating." A chemist (and he believed the member was a very able one) would probably have ascribed it to the condensation of the moisture in the atmosphere. The Speaker and himself agreed as to the existence of distress; it unfortunately did not admit of dispute; but he, Mr. G., adopted the vulgar theory, and ascribed it to taxation—to "a sweating"—of the agriculturists; while the Speaker, by a refined chemico-politico-economical theory, endeavored to prove that it was caused by the want of taxation—by the want of "sweating," and therefore recommended a new tax—new diaphoretics—a new distillation of agricultural wealth through the alembic of manufactures.

There is, said Mr. G., no political economist in England who ascribes her wealth to this system; there is no political economist any where, of any reputation; none whose writings will be read five years hence, who now supports the restrictive policy. However they may differ on some of the more abstruse questions, as respects the ruinous tendency of this policy they are unanimous. It is in vain to endeavor to discredit their opinions by charging them with being theoretical. Many of the most distinguished have been practical men, engaged in the active business of life—have proved their theories to be supported by principles, and found them to be consistent with practice.

But do gentlemen contend that the theories of those who have written on a science which is susceptible of more certainty than any other branch of political philosophy, are to be renounced, while those of other political writers are to be approved and received? No! We must renounce them all together. We must contend that human reason has accomplished nothing; that, after ages of painful labor and investigation, nothing has been proved; that every thing is yet uncertain—we must, in short, become universal sceptics. As firm, however, as his confidence was, in the conclusions of the political economists, Mr. G. said, if one single example could be adduced of the adequacy of this system to accomplish the promised ends, either at home or abroad, he might be induced at least to hesitate, and re-examine the foundations of his opinion. Gentlemen had, indeed, appealed frequently to an example—that of coarse cottons—and they had spoken of it with so triumphant an air that one would suppose it was undeniable and conclusive. But was this really an example? Did it show what was contended for—that the advance made by the consumers, in order to bring manufactures to maturity, were subsequently repaid to them by their getting the domestic article cheaper than the foreign? This brought on the question of direct indemnity. If this indemnity did not exist in the case of cottons, it certainly did in no other. In order to determine whether it exists or not, let us suppose a case. A man is accustomed to lay out one hundred dollars a year, for a certain quantity of foreign goods. In order, however, to enable one of his own countrymen to manufacture them, he agrees to make him an advance of fifty per cent. per annum, for a period of eight years, at the end of which his countryman promises to undersell the foreigner, and reimburse him. Now, what has he done? Instead of having paid $800 for his goods, as he would have done, had he continued to buy of the foreigner, it is evident that he has paid $1,200; that is, $400 more than he would have paid. The question, then, is, at what price must his own countryman let him have his goods, in order to reimburse him within the same period of eight years? If he lets him have them at the same price with the foreigner; that is, at $100, why he loses his principal of $400, and the interest. Suppose he sells them at a discount of $24, or for $75. Twenty-four dollars being the exact amount of his interest, would never reimburse the principal. Would a discount at $25 do? Why the addition of one dollar to the interest, would (leaving out of view the compound interest) gradually sink the principal; but it would be in a period of somewhere between three and four hundred years? At what price, then, must the consumer be able to purchase these goods, in order to reimburse him within eight years? He must buy them (he had not made the calculation in decimals) somewhere between 50 and 60 per cent. cheaper than he bought them of the foreigner; or, in other words, for something between forty and fifty dollars; and, if the foreign goods had fallen in proportion, he must get them between fifty and sixty per cent. cheaper than these; that is, they must be given to him for nothing, and he must receive something to boot.

These are elementary calculations; but when elementary truths are denied, it becomes necessary to state them clearly. Let us apply them to the case of cottons. For thirty years and more, we have been paying a duty on coarse cottons. A part of the time this duty was from 83 to 100 per cent. Now, if thirty years are reduced to eight, and eighty per cent. to fifty, no one will pretend that the average is too high. At what price, then, must a man who, for eight years, has given $150 for a certain quantity of cotton goods, which he might have bought for $100, be able to buy them, to reimburse him within the same period? He must be able to buy them for something less than fifty dollars; and if foreign cottons have fallen, as they notoriously have, he must be able to buy the domestic cottons between 40 and 50 per cent. lower than them. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. TON) has admitted that the domestic cottons are not more than fifty per cent. cheaper than the foreign were at the time the last duty was laid. If, then, the foreign cottons have fallen fifty per cent., he must be able to get the domestic for nothing, and must have something paid him besides. The question, therefore, in every case, is, not whether the domestic can undersell the foreign manufacturer, but whether he can undersell him at an indemnifying price—at a price sufficient to repay the consumer for the advances he has made, in order to bring the domestic manufacture to maturity? If the domestic manufacturers can sell their cottons so much cheaper than the foreign as to amount to an indemnity, it is evident that they can withstand, not only the repeal of the existing duty, but a bounty on the foreign cottons to the amount by which they pretend they can undersell them: but, so far from this, here they are, resisting the repeal of the minimum, which would still leave them a protection of 75 per cent., admitting they can undersell foreigners fifty per cent. How can gentlemen reconcile this contradiction? It appears to me, sir, that the consumer can, in no case, ever be indemnified. When we equal foreigners, in every circumstance which is required to enable us to manufacture, it is almost a self-evident proposition to say we can only undersell them by the amount of the cost of transportation; for what man can accomplish by his physical powers in one country, he can do in another. What is the cost of the transportation of a pound of raw cotton from Charleston to Manchester, and back again to the former place, in the shape of cotton muslin? The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) who had just sat down, has told us that the freight of a pound of cotton to Liverpool was one cent. Five cents, then, would cover the whole charge of transportation and retransportation between Charleston and Manchester; yet the duty paid in Charleston on this pound of cotton, when returned, would be from 18½ to 25 cents, accordingly as it was manufactured into three or four yards of cotton muslin, at the minimum valuation of 25 cents per yard

On every article in the tariff, the duty greatly exceeds the cost of transportation, and in most of them by such an amount that the diminution of price by this cost, could never reimburse the consumer for the payment of the duty; and yet gentlemen promise us not indemnity only, but bounty; not reimbursement, but reward. In every case the reimbursement depends on the relation of the price of the domestic manufacture, diminished by the amount of the cost of transportation, to the annual advances made to bring it to maturity, and the successive annual accumulation of interest on those advances. If the price can only be diminished by an amount equivalent to the interest on the advances, they can never be repaid; and it depends on the ratio by which the diminution of price exceeds the interest, whether the benefit is to accrue to the present, or only to a future generation. We can never surpass foreigners in the facilities of manufacturing. In many respects, as in the accumulation of capital, cheapness of labor, &c. it will be long before we can equal them. In the latter, it is to be hoped we never shall equal them. If we do, we must equal them in human wretchedness and degradation.

But we are promised an indirect indemnity in the additional price we are to get for our products by the creation of a home market. This promise is equally illusory with the others. I will propose this question: if the advances made to the manufacturers are the least they can do with—if they are the sine qua non of their continuance—the minimum possible of their existence, as they pretend, how is it possible that they can give back any part of it in the shape of price for produce? It is self-evident that they cannot; but, as self-evident propositions appear to be at a discount in this House, I shall not rest satisfied with this. Price is determined by the relations of supply and demand. If we cease to import, we must cease to export to the same extent the raw materials that purchased the imports. They will then fall on our hands, increase the supply in relation to the demand, and thus diminish the price. But we are told that those who are producers will become manufacturers? If so, how many of them will become manufacturers? Will there be as many as are required to supply us from abroad? There will not; because, the cost of consumption being increased, we cannot consume so many of their commodities; and there cannot be so many persons required to supply our consumption—even allowing for the want of skill, which, although it cannot last long, is itself a source of loss while it continues. In order to increase the demand in proportion to the supply, and raise prices, a greater number of those engaged in other employments must become manufacturers than are required to supply us from abroad; but this cannot be, for all who are not employed in making the surplus that goes abroad are employed in making what is consumed at home; and they will be still required for this purpose, unless men, in consequence of becoming manufacturers, can do with half rations, or at least greatly diminish their wants. The foreign demand cannot continue. The foreign capital disengaged by our refusal to receive its products will either be wasted; will seek, with the labor it employs, some other occupation; will itself produce what it obtained from us; or, continuing its former employment, will purchase what it wants from other countries. The same causes which make it the interest of the American agriculturists to dispose of their property will depress its price; and the quantity of land thrown into market will diminish the total value of our agricultural capital.

Gentlemen express astonishment at the incredulity of the agriculturists as to the advantages of their system; but perhaps a sufficient reason may be found in the excessive liberality of their own promises, which are at once extravagant and contradictory. We are promised a full indemnity for all our sacrifices in the cheapness of what we have to buy, and more than an indemnity in the dearth of what we have to sell. The system is to raise the price of agricultural produce, and depress the price of manufactures. Can any credulity swallow so gross an absurdity?

But we have not only been fed with the promises of reward, we have been threatened with the terrors of punishment. Our fears and our patriotism have been appealed to on the subject of the balance of trade and the support of foreigners.

Mr. G. said he would not attempt to expose the specious calculations by which a balance was frequently made to appear that did not exist. But suppose it did exist. If we do not pay for what we buy, it is clear gain. It is discreditable, but it is certainly gain. If we do pay, where is the harm? The harm is said to be that we have to pay in specie. Is not this specie purchased with the products of our industry? This is not the case of a spendthrift heir, to which the Speaker likened it. What we send abroad is our surplus—what foreigners send to us is their surplus. Surely it cannot be matter of regret if the latter is of more value than the former. It is not necessarily destroyed in the consumption. A portion of it consists of the implements of industry and the arts—it is capital, stimulating labor, and engaged in reproduction. A nation cannot long continue in debt, and even while it does, the evil is not so great as seems to be imagined. Foreigners, instead of coming into our courts of law, and after expensive and tedious law suits, acquiring real property which they can only manage at a great loss, will bid up for our produce; and, in fact, that is always the effect of a balance being against us. One would suppose, however, if we cannot rely on the prudence of our citizens to keep out of debt to foreigners, we have sufficient security in the interest of the latter, who will not trust them if they do not pay. If they do pay, the objection does not hold. But, after all, the great objection to this notion of the necessity of legislative interference to prevent an unfavorable balance of trade is, that it oppugns the very principle of our Government. It supposes that men have not prudence to manage their own affairs in their own way, and that Legislatures should be their "nursing fathers and mothers." If they do not understand their pecuniary concerns, the subject on which, of all others, men are almost clear-sighted and sagacious, how can they be supposed to be judges of their great moral and political interests? Yet our Government is bottomed on the principle that man is capable of self-government.

While this idea of the balance of trade oppugns the principle of our Government, the notion that we are guilty of supporting foreigners strikes at the principle of all society. It is as untrue and absurd as it is anti-social, odious, and detestable. Gentlemen seem to suppose that every thing we pay to foreigners is lost, and every thing we pay to ourselves is gained. They throw entirely out of view the equivalents we receive from foreigners; yet, when they descant on the balance of trade, they tell us that we get more than an equivalent; for we fall in debt. Is it possible that gentlemen can really believe that, as a question of loss and gain, our buying of foreigners instead of our own citizens, depends on any other circumstance than buying cheaper or dearer? Let us exemplify this by supposing a case. Four individuals who live on this side of the Tiber, devote a portion of their labor annually to the production of four barrels of corn each, equal to sixteen. They exchange four barrels for four hats. When the exchange is effected, the wealth derived from this portion of their labor consists of twelve barrels of corn and four hats. But one of them, who is a great patriot, and friend to "domestic industry," says to the others: "If, instead of buying your hats of this 'stranger,' this 'foreigner,' who lives three yards over the Tiber, you will each give me half a barrel of corn more for your hats than you gave him, I will make them." They consent. Well, what is the state of the case now? Three of them, as before, make twelve barrels of corn, and the fourth makes four hats. Their wealth, at the end of the year, is precisely the same as in the former case; with this difference, that the corn-makers are poorer by one and a half barrels of corn, and the hat-maker is richer by the same quantity. Now, what odds does it make whether the communities are separated by Goose Creek or the great Atlantic? Observe, however, that this statement is much more favorable to the manufacturers than the real case. The hat-maker could not, with that portion of his labor with which he made the four barrels of corn, make the four hats, or there would be no pretext for his demanding an additional price for them. The consequence would be, that there would be a loss to society equivalent to the difference in the productive value of his new and old employment, and the corn-makers would have to get some of their hats elsewhere, to put up with worse ones, or he would have to encroach on another portion of his labor in order to make them, which would be itself a source of loss. This anti-social doctrine teaches that a nation can never attain the highest degree of prosperity until it shuts itself out from all intercourse with the rest of the world; but, it is to mistake the nature of man, and the spirit of the times, to imagine that the great laws of nature can be controlled by the puny efforts of empyrical statesmen. Nations have experienced the advantages to be derived from a liberal intercourse. They are sensible that it is to this source that they are indebted for their prosperity and happiness; and that to this source they are to look for those improvements which will render all the treasures of the world, physical and moral—the wealth, freedom, knowledge, which are the accumulated results of the labor and experience of mankind, the common property of the human race. The assertion that we support foreigners, in the sense in which it is made, is unfounded. If we support them, in the same way, they support us. If we stimulate their industry, they stimulate ours. What appears to be meant, is this; that while we buy of them every thing they make, they only buy of us a portion of what we make. Now, would it be good policy in a nation, more than in an individual, to quarrel with a neighbor who receives three-fourths of what it produces, because he will not agree to take the other fourth; unless he could thereby be induced to change his system and take the whole? Even then, it would be a question of the extent of the sacrifice made to obtain this good. But it would be uncandid and disingenuous in the advocates of the manufacturing policy, to say, that their object is to coerce foreigners into a system of free trade. They would regret such a consequence of our policy; and if every nation in the world would proclaim perfect freedom in trade, it would only make them more clamorous for restriction.

Mr. Chairman: If I have been successful in proving that there is no pecuniary indemnity for the loss the consumers sustain, by making advances to enable certain employments to be carried on, which, without such advances, would be unproductive, it is clear (without resorting to the collateral losses which have been mentioned) that the whole amount of national wealth will be diminished. It remains to consider whether there be any other compensation for this diminution of wealth; and whether the distribution of it is just, and within the legitimate powers of Congress.

We are promised a compensation by being made independent of foreign Powers. But how can we promote our independence by becoming poor? This idea of independence does not refer to a state of peace, but a state of war. It would be absurd to say that in peace we are more dependent on foreign nations than they are on us. The fact is the reverse. A nation that produces the raw material is more independent than one that fabricates it. It will be otherwise if we push the manufacturing policy, and become exporters of manufactures. It refers to a state of war, and supposes that during war we have to pay so dear for many things we require, that we are justified in going to a considerable expense in time of peace, to learn how to make them. But this applies to war with only one nation—England. In a war with any other nation, there would be no serious impediment to our obtaining what we wanted. But suppose we have a war with England one year in ten, or even one in five; would it be good policy to pay fifty per cent. on a given quantity of goods, for four years, in order to avoid paying one hundred per cent. for one year. It may be good policy, but it is certainly very bad arithmetic. A truer statement of the question would be, to ask whether it would be good policy to give fifty per cent. for twenty years, to avoid paying one hundred per cent. for one year. For, if we pursue that pacific policy which becomes us—which is necessary to perfect our own institutions, and to give efficacy to our example abroad; and should not undertake to go “a colonelling” in favor of universal liberty—we have no reason to expect to be at war with any Power in twenty years—least of all with England. The principles of the Holy Alliance are not less hostile to her constitution than to ours; and if they really entertain the designs against us which are imputed to them, it is not only our interest to cultivate the relations of amity with each other, but to strengthen the ties of connexion. For, if their own fears should ever permit that association to attempt to perpetrate their designs, I believe, next to our own valor, our best security is the attachment of the people of England to the principles of free government. Yet the policy recommended is, to weaken the ties subsisting between the two countries, and to destroy our mutual interest in each other's prosperity.

But the point of view in which this policy is most seriously calculated to affect our independence is, by its gross injustice—by its tendency to produce discord and division among the several classes of society, and the different States. Can it be supposed that Congress can be permitted to enrich one class at the expense of the others, and to aggrandize some States by prostrating the rest, without producing these divisions? And is there not more strength in union, in brotherly love, and affection, than in all the wealth of the world without them? What, sir, has been the effect of this policy, whenever and wherever it has been tried? What has been its effect in England? Why, to raise one part of society to the highest pitch of luxury, and to depress the other to the most abject poverty. Even the Quarterly Review—a work devoted to the Ministry, and which makes every sacrifice to conceal their sins—admits that one person in eleven receives parish relief. Some writers say one in seven—some one in five. Such is the effect of the system so eulogized by the Speaker. Say, if you please, that the cause of pauperism is taxation. What was the cause of taxation? Wars. What was the cause of wars? The spirit of monopoly; the desire to engross all the goods of the earth, and to leave nothing to others; the restrictive policy, instead of a liberal and enlightened system, the adoption of which by the nations of the earth would do more to bring about that universal peace which has been considered as visionary, than all the peace societies, holy alliances, and other chimerical contrivances, that ever were invented. Since education has so equalized men, wars will not often be the result of individual ambition. They will more frequently arise from avarice than ambition; from the spirit of monopoly; from that dark, unsocial policy, which is now held up by American statesmen for the admiration and adoption of the American people.

I had wished, said Mr. G., to state some Constitutional objections to the power of Congress; but my want of strength renders it impossible to go into this view. Indeed, so little respect is paid to Constitutional objections, even when urged with an ability which I do not possess, that there is no encouragement to present them. The injustice of the system, however, every body will be awake to.

Sir, when Government undertakes to endow certain individuals or classes with exclusive privileges, all the rest of society becomes their enemies. A consciousness of this produces the necessity of combining for self-protection. The monopolists must secure their ill-gotten gains by strengthening the hands of the Government that bestowed them—by increasing its revenue, patronage, powers. The Government, on the other hand, must reward the monopolists by an increase of privileges. Thus a reciprocity is begotten between them utterly incompatible with the rights and the happiness of the rest of the community. It is by this illicit connexion between the privileged classes and the Federal Government that the State sovereignties will be destroyed—that their wise policy, intended to counteract the natural tendency of society to aristocracy will be subverted, and an aristocracy, the worst of all kinds, a moneyed aristocracy, will be established on their ruins. It is no wonder that the friends of a consolidated national government have been invariably the advocates of this partial, arbitrary policy. Some of the loudest declaimers against stars and garters, the mere badges of aristocracy, are the most clamorous partisans of this policy. They have much dread of the sign, but have no terror for the thing signified. They are alarmed at the badges, but are willing to submit to what is essential in aristocracy—the supremacy of the few. For my part, sir, I would rather see an order of nobility established in this country, provided it be without wealth or primogeniture, than to see one hundred per cent. added to the present tariff. I believe it would do more to bring on us all the evils of aristocracy than a merely titular nobility. A compulsory transfer of property from one class to another is the acme of all the mischief that a Government can perpetrate. The conflicting interests of different portions of society, whether geographical or artificial, whether the result of locality or legislation, have always been difficult for Governments to manage. Under their patronage, they become the most deadly foes of liberty. No Governments have hitherto been sufficient to restrain their ambition and avarice—not even the military Governments of Europe, with the aid of their standing armies. We thought we had discovered, by our division of powers, a system adequate to this purpose; we thought our State governments would be a sufficient check; and I believe, if they had not suffered their powers to be usurped, they would have proved so. They might have even made local interests the instruments of self-preservation. But they permitted the General Government to begin its course by assuming local powers; by fostering the separate interests that existed, and creating others, and by endowing them with privileges. It thus gave them an artificial strength, which the State governments are too weak to control. The privileged classes, with their usual sagacity, early perceived that the State governments presented the principle obstacle to the gratification of their ambition and avarice. Hence, the prevalence of that construction of the Constitution which would deprive them of nearly all their powers—a construction which has grown with the growth, and strengthened with the strength of these classes. Does any one think that this fashionable construction arises from the mere wantonness of speculation? No, sir; it has a practical end—political power, for the gratification of individual avarice. I do not pretend to say that all those who unite in this construction unite in the design. Many creeds and many systems have obtained disinterested supporters who do not participate in the views with which they were created. But I look not to individuals; I look to causes; and I do not hesitate to express my opinion, that the true cause, the final cause of this ultra liberal construction is, the ambition of the privileged classes contending for power to gratify avarice. And, with the powers they claim, what may they not accomplish towards the attainment of their objects? Under the power of taxing sales at auction they claim a right over persons. Under that of internal improvement they assert a right over property. With this right over persons and property, and the right of the Federal Judiciary to control State laws and judgments, they may soon remove every impediment placed in their way by the State governments.

The Tariff Bill.

Sir, we must look very little to consequences if we do not perceive in the spirit of this construction, combined with the political fanaticism of the period, reason to anticipate, at no distant day, the usurpation, on the part of Congress, of the right to legislate on a subject which, if you once touch, will inevitably throw this country into revolution—I mean that of slavery. And, while the policy of the Government tends directly to produce resistance, it is admirably contrived to render it ineffectual, by exhausting the means, and the strength, of those from whom it is apprehended. In this, as in other points of view, I can never cease to wonder that the prevailing system should have found supporters in some of our Western States. All that Tennessee and Kentucky can gain by internal improvement is nothing in comparison with the interest they have in preserving inviolate the Federal Constitution, under which so many of their dearest rights are secured. As to this manufacturing, anti-commercial, anti-social policy, which makes them, as well as their best customers, the Southern States, poor; which places them in the same and a worse relation to other States than they deprecate as concerns England, that of being obliged to buy, without having any thing to give in exchange; it is exactly the reverse of what they really want. What they really want is a system which will enable them to purchase foreign goods at the same price with the people of the Atlantic States. Instead of this, they come to you, (some of them at least,) tell you that foreign goods are too cheap for them, and ask you to make them dearer—to make them pay more.

The Western States cannot manufacture. The want of capital, (of which they, as well as the Southern States, have been drained by the policy of the Government,) and other causes, render it impossible. The Southern States are destined to suffer more by this policy than any other—the Western next; but it will not benefit the aggregate population of any State. It is for the benefit of capitalists only. If persisted in, it will drive the South to ruin or resistance. It is painful to be forced to say so, but it is necessary. Our burdens are already greater than we can bear—endurance can go no further. The policy of the General Government, from the commencement, has been as respects us, one of unabating exaction. We have as yet, I verily believe, derived no advantages whatever from the Constitution—not even that of exemption from foreign wars; for our wars have been for Northern, not for Southern interests. The consequence of this oppressive policy has been a degree of distress altogether inconceivable—distress of which there is no example in a new and free country. This condition is not to be regretted solely on account of the individual suffering; but it throws society back—checks its improvement for generations—perhaps ages. If you transfer the wealth of a country by law, you transfer with it the means of education. Its new possessors, before they have time to obtain education, get possession of the Government, and they are interested in so administering it as to perpetuate that state of things to which they owe their elevation. The struggle between the plunderers and the plundered, corrupts the morals of the community, and begets contentions which poison the fountains of social life, and shake the foundations of social order. Society verges to the state which the Abbé Maury said characterized the French Revolution—a state in which every man who has nothing, says to every man who has something, ote toi, que je m'y mette—“take yourself away, that I may get into your place.” These are the consequences which may be anticipated, if this system is persisted in.

Sir, can we be mistaken as to the ruinous tendency of this policy? Can whole nations be mistaken? When I speak of nations, I mean Virginia, the Carolinas, and other great Southern commonwealths. I admit that nations have, occasionally, been mistaken; but our republic is founded on the supposition that, in the long run, the people see rightly—that they are capable of self-government. If this maxim be true, and if, for a series of years—for more than a generation—in peace and in war—in prosperity and adversity—in every vicissitude we have undergone—we have entertained but one clear, determined, unalterable opinion of the destructive effect of this policy, is it possible to believe we are mistaken? If you say so, then you renounce the principles of your Government. If you say we are not mistaken, but that you will use your numerical superiority to impose this odious system on us against our will, then you are willing to incur the guilt and reproach of tyranny. You must either renounce the principles of your Government, or must abuse its powers. The alternatives are before you. But when I look on those by whom I am surrounded, and consider that the very circumstance of their being here is a proof of their attachment to the principles of their Government, I will never believe that they will renounce them. When I regard them as fellow men, with all the kindly affections and generous spirit of humanity, I cannot believe that they will ever be tyrants. When I look upon them in the more endearing character of countrymen, and the more sacred one of patriots; when I remember that our fathers purchased our common freedom with their common blood, I will not, cannot, must not believe, that the sons are going to turn against each other, and the stronger to raise their fratricidal hands to destroy their weaker brothers.

When Mr. GARNETT had concluded—

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, commenced a speech on the same side of the question; but, at three o'clock gave way for a motion that the Committee rise. The Committee rose accordingly, and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, April 3.

Ordered, That the Message from the President of the United States, of the 20th ultimo, communicating information in relation to measures adopted in concert with foreign Governments for the suppression of the African slave trade, be referred to the committee raised upon so much of the President's Message at the commencement of the session, as relates to that trade.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act altering the times of holding the courts in the District of Columbia:" Whereupon, Mr. LITTLE withdrew his motion to lay the said bill on the table, which was depending yesterday, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, which was agreed to.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1824," were read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The bill from the Senate, "confirming certain acts of James Miller, as Governor of the Territory of Arkansas, and for other purposes," was read a third time.

Mr. FORSYTH inquired into the circumstances which led to the necessity of this act, which were stated in reply by Mr. WEBSTER. Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, called for the reading of the President's Message on the subject.

Mr. COCKE moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, to have certain amendments made therein. The motion did not prevail, and the bill was then passed, and sent to the Senate.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act authorizing the executors of John B. Mebane to collect certain arrears of internal taxes," was read a third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts providing for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land in the St. Helena and Jackson Courthouse land districts," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then again resolved into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CONDUCT in the Chair, on the bill "to amend the several acts laying duties on imports."

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, resumed and concluded his speech on the general principles of the bill, and in opposition to its passage. His speech follows in extenso:

Mr. WILLIAMS said he was admonished, by every circumstance, to use brevity in the observations he was about to submit to the Committee. The late hour of the evening, the exhaustion of the House, and, above all, the length of discussion which had preceded him, could not fail to impress him with the necessity of drawing his remarks to a close as soon as possible. Indeed, said he, the discussion which has already taken place would seem to forbid the belief that any thing more should be offered. Hitherto, I have been content to remain only a listener to the remarks and observations of gentlemen, who, from time to time, have engaged in the debate; not that I have been insensible of the deep importance of this question, or of the vital interests involved in its issue; on the contrary, my concern has increased in ratio with the zeal and perseverance manifested in pressing this subject upon our attention. Year after year this measure has been defeated, and year after year it has been renewed with additional spirit, and still greater determination on the part of its advocates. From these facts, thus annually disclosed, one might be led to think that some choice boon, some great and invaluable blessing, was to be attained. But, on the other hand, we who resist the measure view it as an evil fraught with consequences the most dangerous, tending to results the most pernicious and calculated to blast the fair prospects of this happy country. It is not my purpose to attempt to reconcile this conflict of opinion, but it seems to me that so great a diversity could not exist unless it proceeded from more causes than are generally found to operate upon our regular and unbiassed conclusions. The quick and lively attractives of interests, it must be admitted, have some influence upon our deliberations, because the geographical boundary which separates our minds upon this question proves that we are guided more or less by what we conceive to be the wishes and desires of those whom we represent. In regard to myself, I admit this to be the fact, and I trust gentlemen will not say I want liberality when I impute to them no worse motive than I myself avow. Yes, sir, it is in consequence of the effect which I believe this measure will have upon the interest of those whom I represent, it is in consequence of the effect which I believe it will have upon the interest of the country in general, that I am induced, on this occasion, to contribute my mite against its adoption.

There were, said Mr. W., some prominent arguments presented in support of the bill, which it was his intention to examine, but it would, perhaps, be more proper to notice in the first place the peculiar manner employed by gentlemen to aid them in the discussion. The honorable Speaker (Mr. CLAY) had thought fit to call the friends of the bill "the advocates of an American policy," and at the same time characterized us who oppose it, as the friends "of a foreign policy." Sir, these designations must be reversed, because there is neither justice nor propriety in such an application of them as has been made by the Speaker. What policy does he advocate? Not the past or present policy of the United States. How, then, can he be the advocate of an American policy? He wishes to depart from the policy pursued ever since the establishment of our Government, and to adopt that pursued by Great Britain. But those opposed to the bill, wish to maintain the policy the United States have always pursued since their independence as a nation. Then, in truth, and in fact, we are the advocates of an American policy, while the Speaker and his friends are the advocates of a British policy. We reprobate the policy of England; we wish to avoid it, to rescue our country from the danger of falling into it. The Speaker, on the other hand, admires that policy; eulogizes it in the highest terms, and is desirous the United States should adopt it. If it be true, therefore, that Great Britain is a foreign country, the Speaker is the advocate "of a foreign policy," and we who oppose the bill must be considered the friends of an "American policy."

He would notice, he said, in the next place, the very great address with which this subject had, from other quarters, been pressed upon the attention of the American people. The campaign was regularly opened some six or seven years ago, and has been systematically pursued up to the present time. Publications have appeared, in every possible shape; addresses have been made to gain proselytes to what has been termed the great cause of "national industry." Yes, sir; this phrase, national industry, has had, and no doubt was intended to have, a most magical influence upon the opinions of our fellow-citizens. The evils of idleness have been portrayed in glowing colors; the miseries of want and wretchedness have been displayed with a kind of fervid eloquence, and we have been required, by every consideration, to aid in promoting the great cause of national industry. From what has been said one might be led to think that our people had abandoned all the pursuits and occupations of labor, and that we were converted into a nation of idle, dissolute vagrants. But, although some such instances may be found, yet, we have reason to believe that general distress does not exist to the extent which has been imagined. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) has told us that nothing of the kind has come within his observation. So far as I am enabled to judge, I believe it may be said that the Southern country is generally free from such scenes of suffering and distress as have been depicted. This outcry, therefore, or the greater part of it, has proceeded from one class only, (the manufacturers,) who, being themselves in what they were pleased to consider an unprofitable business, have affected to think that the whole nation was in the road to ruin. What, sir! are the manufacturers the only class in the community? If they should cease to operate entirely, does it follow that all labor would likewise cease? Not at all. The manufacturing labor is very small compared to the aggregate labor of the other pursuits; and, although the former should wholly cease, our condition would not be so wretched as it has been described.

Mr. W. said, he admitted what the Speaker had said, that labor was essentially necessary; that, without it, neither individuals nor nations can be prosperous. It is, indeed, a law of man's nature, for it is written "that, in the sweat of his brow shall he eat bread." If we look abroad, we see that the same law applies to all animated nature; that the fowls mount into the air; that the beasts, graze in the fields or range through the forests, all in quest of food. Labor, then, is the universal law of our nature, to which every one is bound to submit. If he violates this law, or neglects the duty it enjoins, evil must ensue, as the necessary, the inevitable consequence. But does it likewise follow, that manufactures are the great object in which the nation should engage, or that we cease to be a laborious, as soon as we cease to be a manufacturing people? No, it does not. Though manufacturing should stop altogether, agriculture, and the other pursuits which constitute the greater object, would still flourish and prosper. We were told, by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. WOOD,) that the agricultural labor was equal to eighty-three per cent., while the manufacturing was only three and a half. Now, until gentlemen show that the greater should subserve the less interest, I shall contend that we are not bound to notice the cries of a small class in the community, especially when that class are not so profitably employed as they would be if directed to other pursuits. Away, then, with the plea, that it is necessary to encourage national industry by protecting manufactures. It is a delusion to employ such terms, because the industry of the nation would flourish without the protection which is sought for manufactures. Indeed, the manufacturing labor of the country scarcely deserves to be considered in forming an estimate of the whole industry of the nation. It might as well be supposed that a single town or country was equal to all the rest of the United States, as to say that national industry consisted in the labor applied to manufactures.

He would now proceed, Mr. W. said, to examine those prominent arguments in favor of the bill to which he had before alluded. It had been contended by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. TON,) the chairman of the committee who reported the bill, that it was necessary to adopt the measure to make us independent of foreign Powers. This had likewise been much insisted on by the Speaker, and the various other gentlemen who have participated in the discussion. But, of all the arguments presented in favor of the bill, it is perhaps the most imposing, while at the same time it is the most fallacious. In my judgment, it is a complete inversion of the fact, to say that we are dependent on England when we furnish the raw material, and she supplies the manufactured commodity. I would rather think that England is dependent upon us, and we independent of her, in such a state of commercial intercourse. To illustrate this idea, I would ask who of all men is the most independent? The answer is easy and obvious: The man who has a sufficient supply of food is the only one who can be called absolutely independent, because all others who have not this supply, must be dependent upon him who can furnish it. Breadstuffs are indispensably necessary; and, in proportion as men regard the preservation of their lives as the most important of all objects, in the same proportion will they be dependent or independent, according to the supply they may have of the necessary means of subsistence. Now, it may be asserted, as a truth undeniable and irresistible, that what makes one man independent, will also make any number of men independent. In other words, if one individual, having a bountiful supply of the articles of subsistence is more independent than the one who has not such supply, it follows that the nation which has a supply of those articles, is more independent than the nation which has it not.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

APRIL, 1824.

The United States, for example, grow breadstuffs, while England manufactures clothing. Now, in an absolute sense, which is the most independent? we, with all the articles of subsistence, or Great Britain, with all the articles of clothing? Certainly no one can doubt but that the United States would be the most independent, and the same course of reasoning applies to the nation which furnishes the raw material, as contradistinguished from the one which supplies the manufacture. Suppose, again, for the sake of illustration, that one nation grows all the wool, while another manufactures all the cloth, which, in the same absolute sense, is the most independent? I answer, that the one growing the wool is most independent, because the other, which happens to possess the cloth, must cease to manufacture if the raw material should be withheld, which may be done at any time by the nation growing the wool. Then, if the United States furnish the raw material, and England manufactures it, the former, I say, are more independent than the latter, because we can withhold the article at any time when we please, while Great Britain, for the want of it, must cease to manufacture. If she ceases to manufacture, she must of course cease to sell; and if she ceases to sell, she will consequently be deprived of those articles of subsistence with which she is supplied by the sale of her commodities.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, alleges that England will not take our produce; but the allegation is no answer to this part of the argument: for, if England will not take our produce, it is evident our trade with her must cease, and then the exact state of non-intercourse which we expect to bring about by law, will be produced without law. England, sir, is not so foolish as to trade with us, if we do not make payment, and this we cannot do, if she will not receive our produce, as I shall endeavor to show more fully hereafter. So far, then, from our being dependent on England, she is, in fact, dependent on us, and the only way we can keep her in any degree dependent upon us, is, to furnish the raw material, and receive, in return, the manufactured commodity.

Let it not, said Mr. W., be understood that I am the advocate for that state of absolute independence of which I have spoken, or that I contend we can do without manufactured commodities, produced either by ourselves or some other country. I admit what the Speaker said, viz., that they are necessary; that we must have them; that the mere supply of our animal wants is not sufficient. Of the correctness of this position, I entertain no doubt; but when he and other gentlemen condemn the policy of our Government, and charge it with subjecting us to an improper degree of dependence on foreign Powers, it becomes a matter of importance to examine their arguments, to trace them into the elements on which they are founded, and see whether in truth and in fact they are applicable to the case, or are entitled to all that weight upon our minds which they are designed to have. If this be done, it will be seen that, although we are dependent upon England for her manufactures, yet she is equally dependent upon us for the raw material, if not more so; that we can do as well without her manufactures, as she can without our raw materials. The argument, then, that we are dependent upon England, should not, I think, have any very great weight on our minds; because, if the fact be admitted, it only proves that the dependence is reciprocal. But, if we wanted to make England completely independent of the United States, we could not take a more direct course to accomplish the object, than to drive her, by our restrictions, to other countries, for the supply of that raw produce with which her manufactures are kept up, and by which her labor is continued in operation.

Again: it had been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that we ought to adopt this policy because other nations are pursuing it; that, although the English writers on political economy condemn the policy of their restrictive system, yet the practice of the Government is different; that we ought to regard and imitate the practice of the Government rather than follow the precepts and doctrines of her writers. In this, the gentleman from Pennsylvania had been joined by the Speaker, who had denounced the authority of all foreign writers on the subject of political economy. Mr. W. said that he objected to the whole of the reasoning of those gentlemen, because, by it, every enormity of the British Government could not only be justified, but held up as an example for our imitation. He would as soon look, continued Mr. W., to England for lessons in regard to the form of our Government, as to her practice for lessons teaching us the proper administration of it. When did the Government of England ever pursue a benevolent, humane, and consistent course? when did her practice ever conform to the doctrines of her sage and philanthropic writers? Never, he believed, except in the instances mentioned by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) and the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER.) Were the principles of Sidney less correct, less virtuous, or less republican, because the practice of the Government was different from those principles? or because that illustrious man fell a martyr to them? Was the eloquence of a Chatham less a vehicle of truth and sound policy because the Government did not pursue the course which he pointed out? Nay, more, was the enlistment of the savage—the employment of the tomahawk and scalping knife, during our Revolution, less odious and abominable because it was directly at variance with the views of some of her best and most enlightened men? In all these instances, and many more which might be mentioned, the practice of England had been different from the doctrines of her wisest and most patriotic writers; but are these doctrines, for that reason, less to be admired, applauded, and followed by the American people? Some writers in England contend for a Parliamentary reform, but yet the practice of the Government is against it. If, then, we ought to adopt the practice of the Government, rather than the doctrines of her writers, every institution in our own country must, upon that principle, be changed. Instead of a republic recognising the people as the only sovereign power, we must have a hereditary monarch—a House of Lords, and septennial Parliaments.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Gentlemen could not have been aware of the extent to which their arguments would lead, when they said that the practice of England should be considered as authority, rather than the writings of her statesmen. No, sir, said Mr. W., I would look to the practice of England for authority in nothing; but I would look to the writings of her statesmen for authority in many things. It was from the doctrines of her writers, and not the practice of her Government, that our Revolutionary forefathers derived many useful and important lessons on the subject of freedom; it was from the holy zeal, the patriotic ardor, thus inspired, that they resolved to be independent. Yes, sir, our own Revolution, forming as it does a new era in the history of human affairs, and all the felicitous consequences flowing from it, are to be ascribed, in a considerable degree, to the doctrines of British writers; but in no degree whatever to the practice of the British Government. As, then, that authority has been respected, and attended to in the great work of forming the Government —in the establishment of our present political system—so, I say, it may be wise and useful to regard the same authority in administering the Government. Hence, when we advert to the authority of British writers, gentlemen should not think that we do so in consequence of any friendly feeling towards the Government of that country. I admit what gentlemen say, that the practice of the Government is opposed to the writings; but it is in consequence of this very opposition that I rely upon the writings. For it must be confessed that I would suspect, nay, instantly reject, the authority of any British writer who should undertake to prove that the practice of the English Government was correct and humane in any respect whatsoever, except in the instances before referred to.

Now, let me ask what is proposed to be done by this bill? The gentleman from Pennsylvania has already answered this question. He has told us that he wishes to regulate trade in a particular way; to make it more advantageous to the country than it has been for some time, or probably will be again unless a measure of the kind he offers should be adopted. But can you succeed in this object? I think not; for trade depends on a thousand contingencies, over which you can have no control. Can you regulate the vicissitudes of the seasons? Can you control the elements? Can you still the wind, or silence the roaring tempest? Can you command the sun to suspend his scorching beams, or call down moisture from the clouds, that the earth may bring forth its accustomed fruits? Unless you can do all this, your present effort will be vain; for trade may be compared to a fluid extremely subtle, impalpable to the touch, always eluding your grasp, and constantly bidding defiance to your regulations. It will go where it listeth, and every attempt to impede its progress only adds to the difficulty and embarrassment of the individuals or nations concerned in making the attempt. Hence, the wisdom of the rule, (though derived from British writers,) that trade will regulate itself; that it is most advantageous when least restricted. If there is any principle in political economy which contains the truth and force of an axiom, it is this.

But, the Speaker says the principle is incorrect, and we ought to adopt a different policy to make money more plenty, and relieve the distress of the country. But this object cannot be accomplished. For, how are we to bring money into the country without foreign commerce? We have not any gold or silver mines to produce a supply of the precious metals; and the specie first brought into the country by foreign trade would have remained with us but for the establishment of banks. Suppose, however, that foreign trade, as gentlemen allege, takes specie away from the country. I contend that it will, in due season, bring it back again, because, in this instance, foreign trade only takes out of the country what foreign trade had previously brought into it. Therefore, if gentlemen charge foreign trade with taking specie away from us, they must credit foreign trade with having brought specie into the country in the first instance; and thus the account will certainly be balanced.

Admitting the position assumed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the passage of this bill will prevent our money from going out of the country, I still contend that the objected proposed, viz., of making money more plenty, will not be answered. Every one must acknowledge that we have not, at this time, a sufficient supply of gold and silver, for the purposes of a circulating medium. If you pass this bill, in a great degree prohibiting foreign commerce, how are you to get specie back in sufficient quantity to supply us with a circulating medium? Instead of inviting it to return, you forever exclude and keep it out. If a man, said Mr. W., were to shut his doors upon his neighbor, to give him evidence of a welcome reception, the act would scarcely be more unreasonable or uncivil than the one here proposed. For, if you have not specie enough, you should endeavor to correct the evil by encouraging rather than prohibiting greater importations of it.

Should you choose, however, to pass the bill, in order to make sure of what money we have, to be certain of keeping it amongst us, can you succeed even in this? No, you cannot. Spain, we were told by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) has been more restricted in her commerce than any other nation in Europe; but have her arbitrary, tyrannical laws, prohibiting, under heavy penalties, the exportation of specie answered the objects designed by their enactment? Not in the least. The precious metals were of less value in Spain than in other nations of the world, and go they would, in spite of every regulation to the contrary. Money, like a fluid, will seek its own level; and if the gold and silver now in our country are tempted to go abroad in the channels of regular commercial intercourse, I say let them go. They will certainly come back when more needed in this than in a foreign country. The same cause which first brought them to us will induce them to revisit our shores, if required by the regular demands of trade. We need be under no apprehension to the contrary so long as we avoid the injudicious and impolitic restraints of a prohibitory system.

But the passage of the bill, said Mr. W., destroys foreign commerce, without which we never should have had so much as a guinea or a dollar. If, therefore, you destroy the means of supply, how are our future wants to be answered in regard to a circulating medium? In this condition, we shall be obliged to do, from necessity, what we have already done from a wish to speculate and a desire to possess inordinate wealth. We shall be compelled to establish banks and to depend altogether upon paper money; there is no other alternative. To this end we shall finally come, and I must be permitted to ask whether any gentleman would desire to see us in such a condition? I should hope not, because it is evident that our difficulties and embarrassments are ascribed, in a great degree, to an extravagant issue of paper money. This, and not foreign trade, has caused our afflictions. Instead of aggravating, foreign trade had alleviated the mischief. In the course of the debate, it had been proved, very clearly, that, wherever paper money existed, the same distress had prevailed, in a greater or lesser degree. In the United States, in Germany, and even in England, it had been the case.

From these views, it would seem, then, that the passage of the bill would afford no relief to the distresses of the country. The money, which is to circulate, as gentlemen tell us, in plenty and abundance, will not consist of gold and silver, but bank notes. At one time there was a sort of epidemic in favor of the paper system, and as many as forty new banks were established in a particular State, during one session of their Legislature. This measure was hailed as a panacea for their distresses; but did it turn out so in fact? No; instead of curing, it aggravated the evil in a tenfold degree. Having failed to obtain the desired relief from banks, we now seem anxious to try the manufacturing system, in the hope that, by adopting it, we shall remedy all complaints. But, if I am not greatly mistaken, it will prove no more efficacious than the banking system: on the contrary, it will tend to increase the evil; it will give us a paper money which, not being founded on a specie basis, will be liable to all the evils of depreciation, such as were experienced at the close of the Revolution, or at the termination of the late war: whereas, if you permit foreign trade to proceed as it has done; if you allow the precious metals to be imported; if you prohibit banks entirely, or require them to be founded upon a specie capital, so as to prevent an extravagant issue of paper money, then will the commerce of the country flow in regular and undisturbed channels; then will the laborer be rewarded for his toil with money of a certain, invariable value; then, and not till then, will our whole people be contented and happy.

This view of the subject, Mr. W. said, had been much strengthened by information he had received from a gentleman of this House, who in part represented one of the Western States. That gentleman had told him that the circulating medium of the State from which he comes, had been in a very unsound, disordered condition. The people, at the same time, were much embarrassed with debts to a great amount. Instead of seeking relief by creating more banks, they had depended upon industry; they had resorted to labor, which the Speaker had said was essentially necessary to insure national wealth and prosperity. When they became involved, pork, the great staple of that country, bore a price equal to ten dollars a hundred. It had afterwards fallen, and sustained a price of from three to five dollars, but yet the people had been able, at these reduced prices, to rescue themselves from their embarrassments. Here, then, was evidence, showing how much could be done by labor, and how little by banks. Had these people depended for relief upon further issues of paper money, no doubt their distresses would have been increased: whereas, by adopting a different course, they have completely extricated themselves, which will be the case in every instance where reliance is had upon the same means. Here he was met, Mr. W. said, by the declaration of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that he did not intend to destroy foreign trade. It is due to that gentleman to say, that I believe him sincere in his statements, but I nevertheless think him mistaken in the opinions he formed as to the effects of this measure. For, how can he derive any possible benefit from it, unless it tends to destroy commerce or lessen the importation of foreign goods? The body politic, like the body natural, may at times be given to a little excess. The commercial appetite of the nation, so to speak, may occasionally perhaps take too much, but generally no more will be consumed than is conducive to the health and well-being of the system. You cannot, then, afford to the domestic manufacturer a market for his goods, unless you reduce the amount of the foreign supply. The whole project, indeed, proceeds upon this supposition. The duty on foreign goods is to be increased, to prevent their importation: their importation is to be prevented, to afford the domestic manufacturer an opportunity to sell his commodities; and yet gentlemen say, they do not intend to destroy foreign commerce. I admit that you may not intend its total destruction, but, if you destroy it partially, all the purposes of my argument will be answered.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, however, had remarked, at the commencement of this debate, that the only effectual protection which manufactures had ever received, was during the late war, and every one knows that our foreign commerce was annihilated within that period. But suppose this not to be his object at present, and that no more than one fifth, or one tenth, or one twentieth, of our foreign trade, will be destroyed by the operation of this system, I contend that our situation will be made worse exactly in that proportion; that we shall be less able by one fifth, one tenth, or one twentieth, to remedy our distress. In whatever degree you injure foreign commerce, in the same degree do you augment our embarrassments, and make a resort to paper money more certain, which it has been previously shown was the remote, if not immediate, cause of all our difficulties.

In opposition to the inferences here drawn, it has been said that England has a metallic currency, although she is in the highest degree manufacturing. But the analogy will not hold. England exports her commodities, which, in the nature of things, we cannot do; we are unable to manufacture for the supply of our own wants, and it would be folly to attempt exportation under such circumstances. I know, said Mr. W., it was alleged by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that our goods had already found a market in South America, and this proved that we might calculate on making exportations in future to any extent. But, contended Mr. W., this must be deemed an exception to the general rule, and one from which no reasonings can be deduced. In some few instances, wheat, and other articles of breadstuff, had been imported from Liverpool into the United States; but would any gentleman contend that this was according to the regular course of trade? Certainly not. Exceptions of this sort, indicating the capriciousness or volatility of trade may be found in the commerce of all countries. They are not reducible to rule, or to be explained by any general principles. We require a protection equal to an average of forty per cent. to enable us to compete with the foreign manufacturer even in our own markets, and certainly we cannot expect to compete with him in the South American market, where we shall be deprived of this protection. Until gentlemen prove that we can sell our manufactures abroad, at forty per cent. less than we can afford to take for them at home, I shall be justified in asserting that we cannot export them, and we cannot therefore expect to derive specie from importation, as England has done. The argument, then, which has been drawn from the metallic currency of England, will not avail gentlemen in reference to this particular point.

There are yet other points of view in which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has thought fit to present this question, and which, therefore, are entitled to serious notice. He has gravely urged that Great Britain constantly exhausts our wealth; that the labor of our people goes to her support, to swell her coffers, and pamper her pride; that we owe it to ourselves not to permit such a state of things to exist, but should divert the profits of this trade into our own pockets, rather than suffer them to be engrossed by Englishmen. This argument, Mr. W. said, was nearly allied to those he had heretofore attempted to answer, and, in his judgment, was equally incorrect. For, if it be true that we are not dependent upon England, when we furnish the raw material and she manufactures it, then I contend, in the same way, that, if we labor for her support, she, in return, labors for our support; that we can do as well without her manufactures as she can without our raw materials. In illustration of this idea, let me, said Mr. W., put a case—Would it not be extremely unwise in the people of the Eastern States, for example, to grow cotton, when they could buy it in Georgia for much less than it would cost them to raise it? With the labor of ten days, the Eastern man could purchase one hundred weight of cotton; whereas, to produce it himself would require the labor, perhaps, of twelve or fifteen days? The same rule would apply to the Georgian, if he should attempt to raise commodities peculiarly adapted to the climate, soil, and circumstances of New England.

Again: Would not Great Britain act with imprudence, nay, with folly, if she should attempt to raise all the cotton which she buys of the Southern States to be worked up in her manufacturing establishments? Would it not subtract greatly from the profit she makes by the sale of commodities, if she should depend on growing the raw material herself, rather than on purchasing it from other countries? No one can doubt as to the answer which should be given to these questions. Now, sir, it may be asserted, with truth, that the manufacturing skill and industry of Great Britain are as peculiarly adapted to the circumstances of that country as the production of any raw material is to our own. She can manufacture cheaper than we can, and it would be about as wise in us to manufacture for ourselves, as it would in England to raise cotton. Gentlemen, I know, have denied this, and contend that we can manufacture as cheap as England. But, to refute the assertion, I need only advert to the bill now before us. Why have we been employed for weeks in a discussion of the subject, if, indeed and in truth, we can manufacture as cheaply as the people of Great Britain? We have now a tariff which gives protection equal to forty per cent., and the manufacturers are calling aloud for more. Then, it may be taken for granted that England can manufacture more cheaply than the United States. Our own experience, also, will confirm the truth of the position, for, with the labor of ten days, I can buy a piece of cloth manufactured in England; whereas, the same sort of cloth, manufactured in the United States, would cost me twelve or thirteen days' labor, or a value equivalent to that. How, then, can it be said that we labor exclusively for the benefit of England? Does she not, in return, labor for our benefit? Is it not obvious that, by her skill and industry, we are enabled to buy such manufactured articles as we want cheaper, or with less labor than if we produced them ourselves? Certainly it is, and, if this be the kind of tax we pay to England, the more of it the better. The more cloth she will give me for ten days' labor, the more highly shall I be pleased; and, most assuredly, I should never be disposed to quarrel with her, because I obtained from her, at that price, articles which would otherwise cost me the value of twelve or fifteen days' labor. These are my reasons for not subscribing to the arguments of gentlemen who say that our people labor exclusively for the benefit of England. It is to our interest as much as that of England, that this intercourse should exist.

But it is alleged by the Speaker that England will not take our produce, and, therefore, we must manufacture it ourselves. To this I say agreed; we will manufacture for ourselves, if England will not receive our produce; but this may be done without the aid of any law. For, take the argument as stated, and what does it prove? It proves this, that our trade with England will stop of itself; that it will necessarily cease to exist, and that the law you propose to pass is wholly useless. In confirmation of this point, it is necessary only to advert to the rule which the Speaker himself has laid down. He was asked what would be the extent of our imports after this tariff had gone into operation, and to this question he answered, "that our imports would be measured by our exports." Now, if the imports will be measured and regulated by the exports after the adoption of this system, why will not the same rule apply before the adoption of the system? If the rule acts in one case, as stated and agreed to by the Speaker, it will hold equally good in the other. Thus the evil of overtrading, of buying more than we can pay for, which seems to alarm gentlemen so much, and which they are so anxious to correct, turns out to be of no consequence at all. For no principle of political economy is more true than this: "that no country can long import unless it also exports; or, can long export unless it also imports." Any regulation, therefore, which we may adopt to restrain the excesses of foreign commerce, and thereby to benefit our own manufactures, is completely a work of supererogation. To suppose that England will give us her commodities would be to charge her with extreme folly, which must be the case if she will not take our produce in payment for what we receive. But, suppose she does continue the folly of thus giving to us. I hope we shall not be guilty of the still greater folly of refusing to receive what is thus given. Any uneasiness on this head, I should think, ought to be felt by the giver rather than the receiver. Of one thing we may rest perfectly assured, to wit, that she will get tired of it soon enough for all the purposes and designs we may have of promoting our own manufactures. But it seemed to him there was some misapprehension on this point. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the most of those who acted with him, urged as a reason in support of the bill, that British goods were sent to this country and sold for little or nothing, in order to break down our manufacturing establishments. No gentleman had asserted this to be a fact coming within his own knowledge, and, until that assertion was made, he should feel at liberty to doubt whether the fact had existed in the manner stated. We all know that distress has prevailed in England as well as the United States. In our own country, sacrifices of property have been made both at public and private sale. Why not, then, ascribe the sales of British goods in this country to the distress which existed in England rather than a wish to subvert our manufacturing establishments? It is, in my judgment, most probable that the former was the cause of those sacrifices of goods at auction sales, of which gentlemen so much complain, and against which they are so anxious to guard. But, if it was not, he contended it would be impossible that the foreign manufacturer should continue the practice for any great length of time, and, therefore, the remedy proposed in the bill was entirely useless.

The Speaker had again said, that England, refusing to take our produce, receives any balance against us in specie. It was for this purpose, he also said, that she had taken off her restriction upon the East India trade, and he therefore argued that the evils arising from such an intercourse ought to be corrected. But, to my mind, replied Mr. W., this is no evil at all, or, if it is, that it will infallibly correct itself. Here let me invite the attention of the House to what was before said. Whence did we procure the gold and silver which circulated among us some years ago? From foreign commerce, must be the answer. Then, if the unfavorable balance of trade with England took specie away from us, the favorable with other nations of the world brought it into the country in the first instance, and will continue to bring it so long as it shall be demanded. Suppose, for example, that Great Britain, Spain, and the United States, trade together. Suppose, further, that in our intercourse with England, there is an unfavorable balance against us. Now, if the trade continues, it is perfectly immaterial whether this balance is paid in specie or in produce; because, if England will not receive our produce, we carry it to Spain, South America, or the West Indies; we there sell it for cash, and then proceed to England, whence we lay it out as we may choose, to the best advantage. Thus we see that specie is obtained by the sale of our produce, and whether it is made in the first instance to England or to Spain, is a matter of perfect indifference. But, if England will not take our produce, and if we cannot procure gold and silver from Spain, or some other country, then the trade will stop of itself; will necessarily cease to exist, unless, forsooth, Great Britain should adopt the policy of giving to us whatever we want, or, which amounts to the same thing, of trading with us, although we should be unable to make payment for what we receive.

It is in consequence of these principles that I subscribe fully to the sentiments advanced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, respecting the trade to China and the East Indies. It has been fashionable to condemn this trade, because the people of those countries would receive nothing but gold and silver; but, instead of being injurious, it was the most profitable commerce in which we could engage. A merchant, for example, sold his cargo of produce in South America for fifty thousand dollars; with this sum he proceeded to China or the East Indies, and obtained for thirty-five or forty thousand dollars, what would have cost him forty-five or fifty thousand dollars if he had made his purchases in any other country of the world. He then obtained the same amount of commodities, and had a balance left of five or ten thousand dollars, to be put into his pocket, which balance would not have remained if he had traded with any other part of the world. In this point of view, therefore, the commerce with China and the East Indies was the most profitable of any in which we could engage. It is unnecessary here to add any thing in relation to a further advantage to be derived from those particular articles of this traffic for which a market could be found only in China and the East Indies. I have understood that our enterprising merchants and seamen would leave the ports of the United States with only a few thousand dollars worth on board of their vessels; that they would go the Pacific Ocean, would there supply themselves with cargoes, and then proceed to China, and obtain in exchange for their produce ship loads of the richest and most valuable commodities. These returns could not have been purchased with the same articles in any other market; and on this account, again, the China trade was most profitable, and should not have been put down. Another view taken of the subject, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, was, that it would benefit the planters and farmers, by giving them a higher price for their produce; and that our manufactures would be better than imported goods. But I beseech that gentleman not to forget himself and his friends in his great zeal to benefit the agriculturists. The results which he predicts cannot take place; or, if they do, the manufacturers must be involved in irretrievable ruin. For, how can they sell their goods cheaper after the price of breadstuffs and raw materials has been raised than they can now, when both breadstuffs and raw materials are absolutely worthless; are, in fact, as the Speaker told us, rotting in our barn yards? Explain the principle why you can sell cheaper, when corn is at a dollar per bushel, and wool at a dollar per pound, than you can when corn is fifty cents a bushel and wool fifty cents a pound. To me it seems unreasonable to suppose that such a result can follow; for, if cloth now sells at ten dollars, when corn and wool are at the inferior price of fifty cents as mentioned above; it is not possible in the nature of things that cloth can be sold at six or eight dollars, when the price of corn and wool shall have advanced to one dollar each. Upon this supposition, the manufacturer would constantly receive less for his labor while his necessary expenditure would be increased, and if such a process would not eventuate in his ruin, I must confess, I do not know what would have the effect. No, sir; if, as gentlemen contend, breadstuffs and raw materials are worthless—are of no value at all—now is the time to begin a manufacturing system, because, now you can afford to work at a cheap rate and to defy all foreign competition.

But, how is it proposed to raise the price of breadstuffs? Why, by lessening the quantity produced. The gentleman from New York (Mr. Woon) said that too much of the labor of the country was devoted to agriculture. Upon this principle the Speaker also proceeded—when he said that 500,000 persons employed in factories would consume 900,000 barrels of flour. This had been put as an example showing the beneficial effects which would result to agriculture by diverting a portion of labor from that pursuit and employing it in manufacturing establishments. Then, said Mr. W., the inference was clear that it was intended to raise the price of breadstuffs by lessening the quantity produced, and he would ask whether this was a blessing? No; but, in his opinion, it was a curse. Ask a famished Irishman, during the late distress in that country, whether he considers it wise to lessen the quantity of sustenance which any country can produce? Ask any poor man in our own country whether he can live better upon three pecks than a bushel of corn? The argument of the gentleman amounts to this, and I should believe that an individual to whom such questions were propounded, would suspect the wisdom or sincerity of him who proposed them. Sir, it is irreverent in us to complain that we are too highly blessed in this particular. It is better to have ten times too much than one-tenth too little of what is to be eaten; of what is absolutely and indispensably necessary to our very existence itself. Therefore, although the manufacturing project should tend to raise the price of breadstuffs, yet it will do so by lessening the quantity produced, and in this way, will operate as a serious curse upon the poorer classes of society. If any blessings attend the system, England must be in the full enjoyment of them, because she has carried it to the greatest extent. The Speaker, to be sure, had told us that, during his visit to that country, he had remarked that no people were more comfortably provided for or apparently more happy than the laboring part of the population of Great Britain. While disposed to give entire credit to what the Speaker has said, I must be permitted to doubt whether his personal observations into this matter were so full or extensive as he could have made under different circumstances. He associated with kings rather than beggars, and of course his opportunity for observing the condition of the entire laboring class in England was not so favorable as it might have been. Other persons have said that the manufacturers of Great Britain were obliged to labor from fourteen to seventeen hours out of the twenty-four; and to live on a vegetable diet in order to earn a miserable pittance of wages? Is this the way in which you propose also to bless our people? Is this the way in which you propose to raise the price of breadstuffs? If it is, you will do it with a vengeance, indeed; for when the system gets fully into operation, you will have raised the price so high as to put it out of the power of any poor man to eat bread. You will, in this manner, take from him the half loaf which he might otherwise obtain. Now, what is the duty of every wise and beneficent government? It is, to take care of the poor, rather than the rich; because, say the moral and political writers, the rich can take care of themselves. In England, while the poor manufacturer was obliged to work from fourteen to seventeen hours out of the twenty-four, and to live on a vegetable diet, the wealthy owner of the establishment, no doubt, "fared sumptuously every day, and was clothed in purple and fine linen." But, was this right? Is this the condition into which gentlemen would lead our people? Is this the end to which we must finally come? If not, let us ponder well the course we are about to take. Let us deliberate maturely before we commence a system which may possibly tend to the results which have been indicated.

There were other objections to this system, which might be denominated a political nature, but which weighed, said Mr. W., on his mind as forcibly as any that have been mentioned. To me, it seems impossible, that a Government like ours can exist in any country not essentially agricultural. An author, who writes one of the best histories of the American Revolution I have ever read, ascribes the origin and establishment of our Government to the peculiar felicity of our situation. He says, that every man in America was a landholder; that, while blessed with health and strength, with genial showers and a warm sun, he could sustain himself in comfort and independence; he could live by his own exertions; he could subsist by the sweat of his brow: that he was, therefore, equal with, and independent of, all others. This remark was correct and philosophical. In the application of it, we may assert, without hazard, that what led to the establishment of the Government, is equally necessary to its continuance. Could the poor starved manufacturer of England feel that lofty independent spirit in respect to his employer, which every man in this country can feel, in respect to all the rest of his fellow-citizens? No; he could not. Any measure, therefore, of our Government, which tends to derange those circumstances, or to impair that peculiar felicity of situation which led to its establishment, must so far jeopardize its continuance. A concentration of landed property, in the hands of a few, must endanger the existence of the Government, because, according to the principle assumed, a diffusion of that property was the circumstance which first led to its establishment. I will not say, sir, that any one circumstance, or that any particular combination of circumstances, exclusively, conducted to the establishment of the Government: but I will say, that the circumstance alluded to by the historian, of the landed property in this country being generally diffused among the people, was one which prominently tended to that result. Had not this been our condition, it would have been impossible to institute a Government like ours, founded upon the broad basis of equal rights. Inasmuch, therefore, as the manufacturing project tends to disturb that diffusion of property, and consequently to impair that principle of independence and equality natural to our people in their present condition, I, for one, should be disposed to give it a decided negative.

Not only so, but the project would have another effect highly pernicious. It will tend to destroy the health and strength of those engaged in manufacturing establishments, and impair the physical capacity of the people for the great objects of self-defence. The gentleman from Virginia had limited his remarks, when he came to speak on this point, and it is not my purpose to transgress the rule which he prescribed to himself, further than to notice a remark made by the gentleman from New York, who stated it was necessary to adopt this bill, to correct and restrain that spirit which seemed to be growing up in the country. He admitted, with the gentleman, that a military spirit was dangerous in its consequences, and ought to be restrained. But the plan of the gentleman would have an effect the reverse of that which he desires. No one can doubt that, of all pursuits, agriculture is the most congenial to the nature of man, and best adapted to preserve his health and happiness. It also predisposes him to peace: but, if war becomes necessary, it qualifies him to prosecute it with vigor and effect. If, sir, you want a people "swifter than eagles and stronger than lions," will you go to the fields of the agriculturist or the shops of the manufacturer? Certainly they must be looked for in the former, rather than in the latter, situation. He would not be understood as applying these remarks to our present condition. We are not yet sufficiently advanced in the business to have become the subject of all the pernicious consequences flowing from the system. But, if the effects are pernicious at any time, we should not now begin a work which we may hereafter wish we had never commenced. That evils of the kind he had noticed would ensue, the history of England, indeed of all other manufacturing countries, would most amply prove.

Great diversity of opinion exists as to the effects this measure will have upon the revenue. Any opinion on this subject must be in a considerable degree conjectural. Some gentlemen think the smallest increase of duties will impair the revenue, while others say an addition of thirty or forty per cent. will not prove injurious. Experience alone can determine the point, and of experience we have not as yet the benefit or advantage. But if this bill affords to the manufacturers the relief which they expect, it is evident it must do so by lessening the amount of imported goods. If the amount of imports be lessened, it is fair to presume the revenue will be diminished, and then a resort to internal taxes becomes necessary to supply the deficiency. At this time it is the peculiar privilege—the great boast of the American people—that they are not directly taxed; that the Government sustains them, like the air in which they live, without their feeling it. No one is obliged to pay any part of the revenue which Government annually receives, or, if he chooses to do it, he himself assesses the amount of his contribution. In all this, he acts spontaneously—he is under no restraint or coercion whatever. But he would not be equally free if a direct tax should be imposed upon him. Under this system, whether he was willing or not, he would be obliged to pay. If the seasons had been adverse; if his crops had failed; if all his means of contribution to Government had been entirely cut off,—still he would be obliged to pay; and (if he did not do it voluntarily) his property would be sacrificed at a sheriff or marshal's sale. The coercion or restraint in the one case, and the perfect freedom in the other, ought, Mr. W. apprehended, to leave no doubt in the minds of gentlemen as to the course which should be taken. No measure should be adopted which can possibly interfere with our present system of revenue. The debts of the nation must be paid, and our present system affords us the means of doing it with ease and convenience to the people; whereas, if we destroy it, the people will be subjected to taxes alike vexatious to them and perplexing to the Government.

The injurious effect which the passage of the bill would have upon the Navy should be noticed. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had urged that it would have no effect; and, in proof of it, had called our attention to one of the ports in Rhode Island, the tonnage of which had not been diminished by the increase of manufactures in that vicinity. But, admitting the fact to be as stated by the gentleman, he (Mr. W.) contended it would not avail him in the argument, because mere exceptions prove nothing. All must agree that manufactures are of less bulk than raw materials; and if our vessels are hereafter to be employed in the transportation of the former, it follows most conclusively that fewer ships will be wanted for that purpose, than if they were engaged in conveying the raw materials. In this view of the case, then, without adverting to any injury which is done to the revenue, it must be conceded that the navigation will be diminished; and, of course, the naval strength of the country will be proportionably weakened. Now, I ask if we should, on any consideration, agree to this? The Navy has been emphatically termed the strong arm of the nation. The late war had proved its efficacy. You, Mr. Chairman, and every other man in the nation, will long remember the feelings inspired by our triumphs upon the sea. You will not forget that the melancholy news of the surrender of Hull was more than counterbalanced by the glad tidings of the victory of another Hull. Shall all the honor we have acquired, and all the brilliant prosperity before us, be sacrificed to an unreasonable thirst for gain in a few citizens? I hope not. On the contrary, let the commerce of the country pursue its accustomed channels; let each one depend on his own exertions; let him be industrious, and content with ordinary profits in his business; let him not ask others to tax themselves exclusively for his benefit.

The project for establishing manufactures is premature. Our country is too new to commence and prosecute such business with advantage. In the Northern and Eastern States, where protection is most loudly called for, the people might be more profitably employed in other pursuits. The protection now afforded to them amounts to an average of 40 per cent., and yet they call for more. Does not this prove that labor, in any other business, would be at least 40 per cent. more valuable to them than if employed in manufacturing establishments? Every business should be free; coercion and restraint upon one, with the view to afford legal aid or encouragement to another, gives to society an unnatural and artificial state of existence which necessarily tends to the injury of all. If we esteem the freedom of our institutions; if we value the equality of our people, we should not adopt a policy calculated to impair the one, or disturb the other. In conclusion, Mr. W. remarked, that he should not go into the details of the bill. That part of the subject had been so fully discussed as to supersede the necessity of consuming any more time in relation to it. He should, therefore, conclude, by again expressing a hope that this measure, so replete, as he believed, with fatal consequences, would not be adopted.

When Mr. W. concluded—

Mr. Strong rose and said, that, at this protracted period of the debate, and after the Committee had so long and so patiently listened to the eloquence, argument, and wit, which the various and interesting topics connected with the bill under consideration had called forth, he could not claim much of their attention to the humble efforts which he felt it his duty to make. He, however, hoped to be gratified with the kind indulgence of the Committee, while he submitted to their better judgment some of the reasons which had induced him to advocate the principles and policy of the bill.

As this occasion, said Mr. S., has been taken by those who have immediately preceded me, to discuss the merits of the bill, the Committee, I trust, will pardon me, if I pursue the same course. But, in doing so, I shall purposely avoid touching upon any matters which have been discussed during the progress of this debate.

Our condition, Mr. Chairman, as a nation, is peculiar. We depend almost wholly upon the production of raw materials, and upon the sale or exchange of these raw materials, in a foreign market, for our commercial prosperity. There is well grounded fear that the foreign market for these articles will fail us. Suppose it should fail, what is the alternative? Is it not either the abandonment of foreign commerce, in American ships, or the establishment of American manufactures? If we intend that this commerce shall go on, must we not provide the means of carrying it on? And what are these means? Articles adapted to the markets in which they are to be offered for sale. The raw material must change its form, as the wants of the purchaser change. This can only be done by the interposition of manufacturing skill. Now, as the earliest efforts of art and skill are rude, and as manufactures do not spring into perfection spontaneously, they need, and must receive, the fostering care of the Government.

Many of the honorable gentlemen who are opposed to this measure, profess (and I am bound to believe them sincere,) to be friendly to the manufacturing interest, while their arguments prove, if they prove any thing, that commerce ought to be unrestrained, and left free as the air we breathe. Now, as the protection sought can be attained only by imposing terms upon the admission of the foreign fabric, how is the free admission of the foreign to protect the American fabric? Thus, their professions and arguments seem to contradict each other. While the former would relieve, the latter go to ruin the American manufacturer.

But it has been urged upon the Committee, and with no small degree of force, that, if this measure be adopted, agriculture, commerce, and navigation, will be injured, and, peradventure, ruined. Indeed! Why, sir, if we are to believe the testimony delivered within this Hall, all these great interests are now on the verge of ruin. They are, in truth, grievously depressed, but not yet on the brink of the precipice; though, in all human probability, they will be there soon, if not relieved; and, if once there, it may be too late to relieve them. This subject is peculiarly interesting to me. The great national interests of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, have taken deep root in the State of New York. Her interests, therefore, are emphatically and necessarily national interests. They are identified with her prosperity. The integrity of the States is not more closely bound up in the Federal sovereignty, than these interests are intimately interwoven with the vitality of her existence. Thus, I would not, indeed I could not, knowingly, advocate any measure which would injure or impair them.

What, sir, does the bill propose? What are its great objects? To provide revenue—encourage domestic manufactures, and furnish the means of national defence. These are the objects, and I suppose no one denies their importance. We differ only in the mode of attaining them. Industry is the source of national greatness. Yes, sir, honest, productive industry, is the fountain whence are drawn the strength, wealth, and power of a nation. Should the bill become a law, will it, in its operation, diminish the aggregate amount of the national industry? Far from it. Its policy is, and, if am not utterly deceived, its operation will be, by protecting manufacturing skill, and creating a steady home market, to give continued and productive employment to the greatest number of hands, and thereby to render us independent of foreigners for many of the commonest necessities of life, and the essential means of defence.

A great variety of objections have been urged against this bill. Were I capable of answering, I should not attempt to answer them all. The Committee, I hope, will indulge me while I briefly notice some of them. The assertion has been made, repeatedly, that it will directly prohibit the importation of many foreign articles, which are now brought into the country in considerable quantities. And not a few of the arguments against it have been built upon this assertion. It is easier to assert than to prove what is asserted. I call upon gentlemen for the proof. I ask them to point out the article, the proposed duty upon which amounts, of itself, to a prohibition. No, sir, there is no prohibition in terms—it is in tendency only; and no article of foreign manufacture will be excluded until its place shall be supplied at a better and cheaper rate by the domestic manufacture.

The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR,) whose argument was marked with temperance and ability, told the Committee that, from the force of circumstances and the nature of things, the Northern States enjoyed the advantage of a large capital, dense population, and free labor; while the Southern States experienced the disadvantage of a deficient capital, sparse population, and slave labor; and that, consequently, the operation of the bill would be unequal, unjust, and burdensome. If this objection be good, then it is conclusive against any tariff, and all legislation upon this subject must, of necessity, be wrong. But, is it so? Has it come to this? Does the free labor of the nation call for relief; and is no relief to be granted because God and nature, or the industry of man, may have made a difference in the moral and physical condition of the several parts of the Union? Is one portion of our common country oppressed, and shall not the other bear its share of the common burden? What interests are to be consulted but those of the Union? There doubtless is inequality in the condition of the States. It is found in the different kinds and quantity of their agricultural products, and in the diversified habits and pursuits of their citizens. And of all the subjects which require the interference of the National Legislature, perhaps no one than this demands a larger compromise of feelings, opinions, and interests. Cotton, sugar, rice, and tobacco, the great staples of the Southern States, are not, and the three first cannot be produced in the Northern and Eastern States. In the latter are many productions of prime necessity, the rewards of labor and skill, which are not produced in the former. Now, it is hardly to be expected that any tariff can be so nicely adjusted as to operate equally upon all the conflicting interests, in every climate, throughout this vast Confederacy. The duty of ten cents a pound on manufactured tobacco, amounts nearly to a total exclusion of the fine tobacco of the West Indies and Mexico from the Northern markets. The duty of three cents a pound on brown sugar, is a direct bounty to the Southern planter; both because the article meets with little or no competition, and because its production does not, and probably never can, supply the domestic consumption. The duty also of three cents a pound on raw cotton must be taken as a protecting, if not a prohibitory duty. What other reason can be given for laying or continuing it in the existing law? But this is not all. The proposed duty on cotton and woollen goods will affect the North more than the South, upon the supposition that the market price of these goods will be enhanced in proportion to the increase of the duty. The negro clothing, for example, required for the annual consumption of the slaves of the South and West, bears a small proportion to the amount of woollen goods, which will be annually consumed by the hardy freemen of the North and East. The people of the Northern and Eastern States, in proportion to their numbers, contribute much more largely to the public Treasury than those of the South, because they consume a much greater value of dutiable articles. The reason of this is to be found in the difference of climate and habits. But the small addition of price, which the augmented duty may be supposed to give, will be temporary. It cannot be permanent. Competition and supply will soon reduce the price of the domestic manufactured article below the present price of the foreign articles. The existing low prices of our domestic cotton fabrics will afford conclusive evidence of this result.

The honorable gentleman (Mr. BARBOUR) further insisted that the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, and imports, was granted with a sole view to revenue; and that any application of the power to protect domestic industry, at the expense of the revenue, would be a violation of the spirit of the Constitution. Sir, the power of Congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations," is absolute. Did the proposed exercise of any power which Congress may possess, go to destroy the subject-matter, that is, the particular kind of article, upon which the taxing power is to operate, the objection would be valid. This, however, can seldom or never be the case. It can happen only when the importation of the foreign article is prohibited, and the domestic production of a similar article forbidden. But if the power of laying duties, to which the gentleman referred, respects revenue alone, whence the discrimination in the existing tariff? Why is the duty on manufactured tobacco, for example, so high as almost entirely to exclude the foreign product? Wherefore are other articles, the productions of foreign countries, as dye-woods, for instance, admitted duty free? If it be not for the purpose of encouraging manufactures and protecting the national industry, what is it for? Why has the revenue, which might have been derived from a duty on these articles, been sacrificed? But, sir, should the good people of the United States resort to direct taxation, as the only means of raising a revenue for the support of the Government, what then? Are our ports to be opened, and our custom-houses shut? Are foreign productions, of every kind, whether raw or manufactured, to be admitted duty free? Sir, foreigners are wont to look to their own interest more than to ours. Suppose they should conspire to keep our markets glutted with tobacco or breadstuffs, for the purpose of breaking down the growers of these articles: is there no power in this Government to secure to the planter or farmer the only occupation upon which his subsistence depends? This power primarily regards the industry, interest, and safety of the people. As it respects foreign fabrics, the question is one of admission only; it is, whether they shall be admitted upon any, and upon what, terms? These terms are indicated in every exercise of power. It is, perhaps, the only one which, while it permits trade and intercourse, stands as a barrier between American industry, and the action, arts, and arms, of its enemies.

Another objection to the bill is, that it will diminish the revenue. This has been pressed upon the Committee with great earnestness. It may, but I think it will not, have this effect. It is difficult, indeed impossible, to ascertain what its precise effect will be upon the revenue. There are, however, some considerations which go to warrant the belief that the revenue derived from imports will not be diminished. The annual increase of our population is nearly half a million. There is an augmented consumption of articles of mere luxury. They are the tribute which the rich and proud pay to pomp and fashion. These are the delicate and costly fabrics of wool, cotton, flax, and silk. Of these, we manufacture comparatively none, and probably shall not for a long time to come. But, of the coarse woollen, cotton, and linen goods, which compose so great a part of the common necessities of life, we do manufacture a large amount. The difference between the gross value of the finer and coarser sorts of foreign fabrics, which are imported and consumed by us, is considerable; and that difference is in favor of the finer and most expensive manufactures. The consumption of the coarse foreign article gradually diminishes, and will continue to diminish, as the domestic article supplies its place. Not so of the articles which we do not manufacture. It is, therefore, not unfair to presume that the consumption of luxuries of foreign production will increase with our increasing population and wealth; and that the augmented duties upon the luxuries of life will, at least, make up the loss which the revenue may sustain from the diminished importation of the common necessities of life. These observations are made chiefly in reference to articles of dress. The same course of reasoning, however, may be applied, and with greater force, to the articles of tea, coffee, and spices, which our country does not produce, as well as to those of sugar, molasses, and spirits from the cane—the domestic production of which forms, and from the nature of our climate must always form, an inconsiderable part of the annual domestic demand.

Having mentioned the subject of molasses, permit me, sir, to make a few remarks in relation to the proposed increase of duty upon it, from five to ten cents per gallon. I am against this increase. I think the existing duty high enough. A large class of our citizens, who are frugal and industrious, but comparatively poor, are compelled to use it instead of sugar. They can buy this, because it costs less, and is more nutritious than sugar. It composes with them a portion of the common sustenance of life. Why, then, impose a much higher duty on this, than on any other article which makes up a part of our daily subsistence? Why strike this blow, though never so slight, at the navigation of the country, by suddenly diminishing, perhaps excluding, the importation of a bulky article, an article of food—and an article of which the domestic supply does not, and never can, equal the demand? But what is our obvious policy with respect to the West India trade? Is it not to facilitate, cherish, and protect it? Our products sent to the West Indies are mostly such as no other people will take of us at any price. Their products are such as we want—most of them such as we must have—and some of them such as our soil and climate will not produce. If I am right, the agricultural interest of the country will be promoted by encouraging, not by destroying, that trade.

If then, sir, the intrinsic difficulties of forming a tariff are not insurmountable—and if neither the letter nor the spirit of the Constitution will be violated, nor the public revenue destroyed in the attempt, we may inquire into the condition and wants of the country, and ascertain what can be done to better the one and relieve the other. One truth is clear—if our liberties are worth possessing, they are worth defending. But how are we to defend them? Shall it be by depending upon the industry of others, or upon our own? Shall we rest the prosperity and independence of the nation upon the will and caprice of foreigners, or upon our own competent and exhaustless resources? I speak not of men or morals. The resources to which I allude are the great staple productions of our common country. They are breadstuffs, wool, cotton, flax, hemp, iron,—and the enterprise, ability, and readiness of our citizens to fashion them for use, for comfort, for defence. England and France have the advantage of us in skill. But it should be marked and remembered, that neither England, nor France, nor any other State in Europe, produces all these raw materials. And the fact should not be forgotten, that of these, we produce all—while, of some of them, they buy all.

Is it then longer to be tolerated, that a nation, like ours, standing as a citadel, encompassed and watched by the enemies of freedom, should go to foreign workshops for her coats and blankets—for her swords and bucklers? No. The materials, of which they are made, are produced at home—and they should be wrought at home. Sir, but for the manufactures of wool, cotton, hemp, and iron, our domestic comforts would be gone, and the nation, with all her freedom, could not withstand the shock of war a day, an hour. Protect the industry of the nation, and it, in turn, will furnish the means of comfort and defence.

The distresses of the country have been well portrayed by others. It is admitted, on all hands, that the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests, are in a depressed condition—and that they all want relief. One word in relation to the character of these interests, which thus divide the labor, and occupy the time, of most civilized nations. The agricultural interest (and it is the mother interest of this country) produces the raw material—the manufacturing gives it a new form and value, and the commercial distributes the product of the labors of both. The distribution and price of the commodity depend upon accidental causes, often beyond the control or foresight of the commercial agent. And these causes are to be found in the ever varying wants of man. The operations of commerce result in the exchange of equivalents, the price of which is estimated at the place of exchange, and the value to the holders at the places where they are to be consumed, or re-exchanged. But this consumption, or re-exchange, depends entirely upon the wants of the consumer. Hence, no man will exchange one commodity for another, when he has an adequate supply of that commodity. If, for example, he has breadstuff enough, he will not buy or take yours; and so of every other article. What is true of an individual, in this respect, is true of nations. One nation cannot sell more to another than that other will buy. A prudent nation will not buy more than it wants. And no nation will buy what it does not want. For the truth of these remarks, I appeal to the intelligence of the Committee, and to the condition and commercial experience of the country.

Hitherto, sir, nearly all the enterprise and industry of the country have been devoted to agriculture and commerce. As a nation, we have relied, for wealth and prosperity, almost exclusively upon the production and sale of raw materials—that is, upon the surplus product of agricultural labor. This surplus, as well as the means of subsistence, has been drawn, with some trifling exceptions, from the forest, the land, and the sea. As the farmer, who has no other occupation, depends absolutely upon the production of grain; or the planter, upon the production of cotton, for comfort, subsistence, and the reward of labor; so has the nation depended, and so does she now depend, upon the sale or exchange, in foreign markets, of the aggregate surplus products of her citizens. When these raw products cease to be wanted, or taken abroad, foreign trade ceases. It must then cease. For, if we rely upon the products of agricultural labor with which to buy the foreign fabric, and the foreigner will not take of us these products, we cannot buy—and for the plainest of all reasons, we cannot pay. In proportion as this aliment of foreign commerce fails, our navigation engaged in that commerce fails with it.

Let us now examine into the former and present condition of that part of our trade, which consists in the exportation of the domestic products of the country. I shall not go into any inquiry in relation to the re-exportation of foreign products; because it is apparent that this trade may be carried on to a considerable extent upon credit, and because the inquiry, in any point of view, is not material to the argument.

The value of our exports of domestic produce, compared with our population in 1800, averaged eight dollars and a fraction to each inhabitant; in 1810, six dollars; in 1820, five dollars; and in 1823, about four dollars, omitting the fractions. Thus, though our population within this period has doubled, and our means and ability of production more than doubled, yet the value of our surplus products has diminished. Take the average value of these exports for the three years ending on the 30th of September, 1802, 1812, and 1822, respectively, and you will arrive at the same result. But there is another view of it which, it seems to me, must remove all doubt. The aggregate value of these exports amounted, in 1800, to $47,473,204; in 1820, to $51,683,640; in 1821, to $43,671,894; in 1822, to $49,874,079; and in 1823, to $47,155,711. Hence, it appears that the amount of exports has been gradually diminishing since 1820, and was less the last year than it was in 1800 by some hundred thousand dollars. The amount of raw cotton exported in 1800 was $5,000,000, as near as can be ascertained. In 1823, it amounted to $20,000,000. In the last year, domestic manufactures, of all kinds, were exported to the value of near $3,000,000. The total value, therefore, of every description of raw material, exclusive of cotton, wool, and articles of domestic manufacture, exported in 1823, was about $18,000,000, less than in 1800; and this diminution has fallen almost exclusively upon the Middle, Northern, and Eastern States. The cotton, rice, and tobacco of the South, find a ready market abroad, while the products of the North, small as they have come to be, often find none.

As the tonnage of the nation is intimately connected with this view of the case, so it has an important bearing upon it. The amount of registered tonnage employed in the foreign trade in 1810, was nine hundred and eighty-four thousand two hundred and sixty-nine tons; in 1822, six hundred and twenty-eight thousand one hundred and fifty tons only. During this period there was no material variation in the small amount of foreign tonnage employed. Our tonnage employed in the coasting trade amounted, in 1810, to four hundred and five thousand six hundred and forty-six tons; and, in 1822, to five hundred and seventy-three thousand and eighty tons. In 1810, the total tonnage of the United States in the merchant service was one million four hundred and twenty-four thousand seven hundred and eighty-three tons; and, in 1822, one million three hundred and twenty-four thousand six hundred and ninety-nine tons. The result, therefore, is, that, since 1810, the tonnage employed in the foreign trade has diminished about three hundred and fifty-six thousand tons, while the tonnage employed in the coasting trade and fisheries has increased about two hundred and thirty-one thousand tons, and the total tonnage has decreased something more than one hundred thousand tons. Since 1818, however, the registered tonnage has increased, about twenty thousand tons. Now, the argument to be drawn from the actual condition of our foreign trade and tonnage is this, that the quantity of raw materials exported during the last year was much less than in 1810; and that the value of these exports has been gradually and annually diminishing, notwithstanding the quantity of agricultural produce sent abroad during the past year or two has somewhat increased, owing to the increased production of raw cotton. What is the cause of this general and fearful depression of our agriculture and commerce? Is it temporary or permanent? The cause probably had its origin in our embargo and non-intercourse acts. Europe, from necessity, learned a lesson which she has not yet forgotten. Countries which used to look to us for breadstuff, provisions, and munitions of war, were compelled to produce them for themselves, or procure them from others. Most of them now do produce enough for their own subsistence. Their policy in this respect is as settled and permanent as ours. They depend no more upon us for what they have thus learned to produce for themselves, than we do upon them for our corn, or cotton, or rice, or tobacco. Now, as it is the surplus product of labor only which can sustain the commerce and navigation of any nation; and as the foreign market for the products of our labor, consisting almost exclusively of raw materials, is failing, and from causes beyond our control, how can our commerce and navigation be much longer sustained without the combined efforts of agricultural labor and manufacturing skill? Sir, it is in vain to undertake to fashion the purchaser to suit the article; the article must be fashioned to suit the wants and taste of the purchaser.

If these things be so, what then, sir, ought we, as a prudent nation, to do? Encourage and protect manufactures. To prosecute them successfully requires skill, capital, the raw material, machinery, and labor. Of these, except the first, it seems to have been generally admitted that we have enough. But, it is said, we are deficient in skill. There is truth in the assertion. We have already much skill, but we want more, and must have it. What is this skill? Is it valueless? No, sir; it has positive value. I do not mean, as some seem to suppose, that this value is the difference between the cost of the ore of which that chandelier is made, and the price of the splendid production. It is the abstract value of which I speak. It is that rare operation of the head and hand which, only, can impress upon rude matter a peculiar form and beauty. Now, be this value what it may, much or little, it is national property. And the nation that has it is just so much richer than the nation that has it not. My friend from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER,) has attempted (and he rarely fails in what he attempts) to prove that the foreign fabric is as much the product of our industry as if fabricated here. I agree with him that commerce is the exchange of equivalents; but I cannot assent to the conclusion to which the proposition would seem to lead, that while, by any means, we can pay for the foreign fabric, we are as well off as though we fabricated it for ourselves. This is not a mere question of money—a ledger account of profit and loss. It is a question of national prosperity and power. What is the distinguishing difference between civilized and savage life? Numbers and wealth can never compensate the want of skill, or arts, or arms. The nation destitute of these can receive no equivalent. We are not destitute of them. But to the extent to which we consume foreign fabrics, we pay to the foreigner the value of his skill and dexterity; which value, be it more or less, is so much gain to him, and so much loss to us. If, therefore, the time has come, and I think it has, when the products of our agricultural labor begin to be limited to the quantity necessary for mere subsistence, lest the surplus perish on hand for the want of a market at home or abroad, can it be denied, that the nation wants manufacturing skill? And can it be proved that the nation ought not to encourage and protect manufactures?

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR) has further insisted that the operation of the bill now under consideration will in no way, increase the national industry. He seems to have taken it for granted that every body has employment enough. Sir, the question is not so much whether all hands are now employed, as whether they cannot be more productively employed? But, if we believe the representations made to us in relation to this bill, from all parts of the country, both from friend and foe, there is a want of employment. How, then, can the greatest number of hands be the most productively employed? This is the problem to be solved. Production, fabrication, and distribution, are the great divisions and occupations of human industry. Can all be employed, in agriculture, in the production of raw materials; or, in commerce, in the distribution of them? No, sir; both employ a greater number of hands than either could alone. But all are not employed in both. Many of our citizens are now engaged in the work of fabrication—in the manufacture of articles of consumption. The operations of our agriculture and commerce appear to be pushed to their limit. Neither can do any more, nor give profitable employment to more hands. Commerce and navigation cannot, for this interest depends upon the carriage and exchange of agricultural products; and agriculture cannot, for its productions are gradually supplanted in foreign markets by the like increasing products of other countries. Not so with manufactures. This interest presents a vast field. It invites skill and competition. Does not the manufacturing interest, therefore, afford an increasing sphere for national industry?

Much has been said of foreign and of American policy. Sir, what is the true American policy? Is it to open our ports, and admit freely the productions of others, while the ports of others are shut against us, and our productions excluded, or, if admitted at all, admitted upon hard terms; or, is it reciprocity of trade, and the fabrication of our own wool, cotton, hemp, and iron, for domestic comfort, national defence, and foreign demand? But we are told that wages are so high in this country, that, where machinery is not brought in aid of human labor, manufactures cannot succeed. And the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) seems to suppose that we cannot produce the article of iron, though our country is so rich in the ore, because the average rate of wages, in Sweden, for example, is seven cents a day, while it is some four or five times higher with us. The small difference between the original cost of Swedish and American iron, is conclusive proof that this difference is not determined by the different rate of wages. If it was, every pound of American iron would cost four or five times as much as a pound of Swedish iron. The same may be said of every bushel of American wheat, and of most of the raw materials, which our country produces in such abundance and cheapness. Sir, the true secret of our ability to compete, almost, though not quite, upon equal terms with the serfs of Europe, is to be found in our free labor, and in our superior industry and enterprise.

But, sir, how have the opponents of the bill answered the call which has been so repeatedly made upon them, to point out the country in which manufactures have existed and flourished without encouragement and protection? Why, sir, it is true, that England has lowered her import duty, upon foreign wool, admitted the lumber of the north, and somewhat relaxed her colonial system. She has admitted lumber and wool upon easier terms, because she cannot produce enough for her own consumption; and what she cannot produce at home she must buy abroad. She has meliorated her navigation laws to enlarge and facilitate the exchange of her manufacturing industry. But Spain, it is said, with all her onerous commercial restrictions, is unsuccessful in manufactures. I know it, sir; and the fault is both in the manners and habits of her people, and in her peculiar system of monopolies. Other well regulated countries protect their home industry. Does England admit the woollens, cottons, or silks of France? or France those of England? Does either admit those of any country to come into competition with her own manufactures in the home market? The statesmen of England acknowledge that her manufactures of silk, with all the supremacy of English skill, can be sustained only by continued and efficient protection. It is the fact of protecting, and not the impolicy of establishing them, that is material to the present inquiry. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) not being able to show that manufactures had succeeded in other countries, unaided by the parental care of Government, attempted to prove that they had succeeded in the United States, without care or protection. I think my friend unfortunate in this instance. Manufactories of minor importance have long existed in this country. Others of a more imposing character were established shortly after the adoption of the Federal Constitution. But who is there who has attentively examined the progress of manufactures among us, who does not know that the great manufacturing interest of the nation took root and flourished during the embargo, the non-intercourse acts, and the war that followed. It was in this period—a period of near seven years, and one, too, for the most part, of total prohibition of foreign fabrics, that American manufactures received their highest possible protection. With little or no foreign competition, they enjoyed the home market—all flourished—some came to maturity, and were just able to survive the shock which the peace, and with it, the great and sudden influx of foreign fabrics, produced; while others, like the infant in the tempest, were overwhelmed and destroyed. But, if they received no protection, why were so many of them ruined when the war ceased? Besides, if the manufactures of woollen, and cotton, and hemp, and iron, need no protection, why is it necessary to protect the manufacture of sugar and tobacco? The duty on the former enables the sugar planter to carry on his business, and the duty on the latter amounts almost to a total exclusion of the foreign manufactured article from our markets.

Sir, this measure has been called anti-social; and some gentlemen appear to take it for granted, that its necessary operation will be to destroy commerce and navigation. I am persuaded it will have a contrary effect. Instead of injuring, it will sustain, the commercial and navigating interest. I have attempted to prove, that the quantity and value of our domestic exports annually diminish—and that foreigners will not take our raw produce, as they used to do, because they do not want it. When they will not take the raw material, is there any other mode of relief, than to adapt the thing to their wants, and carry the article to them in the shape of manufactures? Let me ask you, sir, who is to furnish the vast supplies for the South American markets? What we shall neglect or refuse to do towards it, England and France will do for us. The Spanish patriots of the South, allied to us by interest, feeling, and the common ties of freemen, do not want raw materials—because they produce them in abundance—but they do want the manufactures of wool, cotton, hemp, and iron. And, in my humble judgment, we can furnish them with most of these articles, if we choose to do it, better and cheaper than England or France can. Is it not, then, our imperious duty, by passing this bill, to foster skill, protect manufactures, insure the rewards of domestic industry, and thus enable our country to enjoy her full share of the commerce of the world?

The opponents of this bill avail themselves largely of the professions of some of the statesmen of England, which have never been put in practice—and of the writings of political economists, which have no just application to the question now under consideration. I speak not lightly of the works of Adam Smith, Jean Baptiste Say, and others of the same school. They are certainly profound thinkers; and their books contain much valuable information. But they leave off at the very point where commercial practice begins. What is the foundation upon which their system rests? Unrestricted commerce—absolute freedom of trade. Can this state of things exist, but in the absence of all color of restraint? Does not this state of things presuppose the freest competition of mind with mind, skill with skill, capital with capital—and, need I add, free labor with free labor? I do not inquire whether this has ever been the existing state of the commercial world? But I do ask whether it now exists? What nation is there, whose statesmen have adopted the policy so strenuously recommended by these writers? Has France or any other State done it? Where is the nation whose ports are open to the free admission of the products of the world? Whose manufactures, whose skill and industry, are left unaided, and unprotected, against the arts and actions of rival nations? Again, sir: Who, of these writers, after having accurately examined the commercial laws and policy of nations, has told any one of them, England, or the United States, for example, what she ought to do, or not to do, in reference to the existing regulations, and present state, of the commercial world? Not one of them. They speak of things as they wish them to be, not as they are. They talk of freedom of trade, when there is no free trade. In a word, they presume a state of things which does not exist, and which never can be brought about, but by a convention of nations.

In the progress of this debate, the manufacturers of our country have repeatedly been called monopolists. This is an odious term, and one which does not belong to them. What, sir, is a monopoly? It is the grant to one of an exclusive right, which before was common to all. The laws relating to manufactures, like those which relate to agriculture and commerce, are general. Every citizen enjoys an equal right of becoming a farmer, a manufacturer, or a merchant. Labor is left free to seek its own reward. If, therefore, the manufacturer be a monopolist, then all who enjoy the protection and benefits of the Constitution and laws of the land, are monopolists.

But, the poor—we are told it will oppress the poor. Think you, sir, the poor will be oppressed by giving them increased employment? What is it that oppresses the poor? Want of employment, and excises and taxes upon the articles of subsistence. The condition of the American citizen, in this respect, is not to be compared, as it has been, with that of the Englishman. England taxes every thing which is necessary for the subsistence and comfort of the poor man. We tax nothing. The poor man—in truth, sir, no man, with us, is obliged to consume dutiable articles. If he does consume them, it is because he chooses to do it. The act is voluntary. No man, rich or poor, can be compelled, against his will, to contribute a fraction to the National Treasury for his food, drink, or raiment.

The gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) who has just taken his seat, has insisted, that the operation of this bill will be to destroy the cotton trade, and ruin the planters of the South; because, if we will not take the merchandise of England and France, they will not take our cotton. Sir, the English and French, like all other prudent merchants, will trade where they can make the best bargain. If England, for instance, can exchange a yard of broadcloth for more pounds of Brazil cotton, than she can of Carolina cotton, of like quality, no matter what the difference in price may be, she will buy the Brazil cotton. And this is the whole secret of "buying where you can buy cheapest." I believe the cotton growers have much to fear, if this measure be not adopted. To me, it appears that their safety, that the common safety of us all, is to be found in the policy of this bill. Let us examine its operation upon the cotton planter. In the direct trade between this country and England, our imports, if I mistake not, have always exceeded our exports. In 1822, the excess was more than $11,000,000; and, including her dependencies, was more than $13,000,000 against us. This difference is paid by the transfer of American stocks, and out of the proceeds of American cargoes, sold on the continent. If we take the excess beyond the value of the cotton exported to England, the difference will be more than $16,000,000; and if that of France be added, it will be more than $20,000,000 against us. The whole amount of woollen and cotton goods imported from England, in the last year, and which were not re-exported, did not differ much from $12,000,000. Now, if the effect of this bill should be to exclude the woollen and cotton fabrics of England from our markets, it is apparent, that we shall still take of her manufactures, to many millions of dollars worth, more than she will take of our cotton. Hence it is, that our cotton trade with England, or any other country, cannot be materially affected, until we import less from such country than we export to it. But, the bill will not have this extensive operation; because we shall, for a long time, continue to import and consume a large amount of the fine woollen and cotton fabrics of England. No, sir; if our cotton trade with Europe fails, it will not fail because we refuse to buy their coarse wares, but because they can buy their cotton of others to better advantage. Of the whole amount of cotton, which England annually consumes, about two-thirds is grown in the United States, and the residue in other countries—chiefly in Egypt and Brazil.

My honorable friend, from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON,) gave us, in the early part of this debate, a glowing description of the advantages which the Brazils possess for the successful culture of cotton. It was a true picture. Perhaps there is no country on the globe better adapted to the production of this staple commodity. In soil, climate, and cheapness of labor, it stands unrivalled. It wants nothing but a stable and temperate government. What, then, let me ask, will give the greatest stimulus to the inhabitants of that vast region to produce cotton? Will it not be by suffering England to monopolize their markets—to supply them with the coarser kinds of woollen and cotton goods, of which they now consume large quantities, and the consumption of which is rapidly increasing? Why? Because England will want their cotton more than she will want any other raw material which they can produce. What, then, is our obvious policy? Is it not to divide the market with England—to come in for our share of the trade? How is this to be done? By encouraging domestic industry, and giving the farmer a home market. By protecting the infant manufacturing establishments of the country against the importation of comparatively worthless fabrics, against the arts and frauds of foreign workshops, and thus enabling them to supply a portion, at least, of the articles which are in so much demand in the South American Republics. But can we enter in competition with England in the markets abroad? We have, for some time, carried on a successful trade with South America, in articles of domestic manufacture; and one of our enterprising citizens of the East, I understand, has recently shipped thither some two hundred bales of domestic manufactured cotton goods. Give reasonable protection, and I am persuaded we can manufacture the coarse woollens and cottons, which enter so largely into the consumption of every country, be it old or new, as cheap as England or France can. But what good will come of it? It will sustain our navigation, by opening to it a new and wider field for employment. It will prevent, in no small degree, the necessity of growing cotton in South American Republics, because we shall not want their cotton; but we shall want many other articles, which they can produce in abundance. But suppose it does not have this effect; what then? Why, sir, still it will give our cotton growers the benefit of two markets. The home market will be sure and steady, subject to none of the fluctuations of the European markets. But, sir, formidable as the South American rival threatens to be, it is not the only one to be feared. The culture of cotton has been recently commenced in Egypt. Here, also, nothing is wanting to insure its success, but a parental government. Now, will not England and France buy this raw material, which they cannot produce, and which they must have, where they can buy it at the most profit? Do you believe that either of them would sacrifice a single dollar, to promote the agricultural interest, in this country? Is it not, then, our imperious duty to adopt that course of policy, which will result in a steady home market? And what is the advantage of a home market? Ask the farmer and mechanic, and the industrious of all classes who live in the vicinity of cities, villages, and factories. In proportion as these increase, nearly in that proportion, as a general rule, productive employment increases. The farmer, for example, can sell more, though he raise less. The reason is, that he loses none of the proceeds of his labor. It facilitates trade, barter, and the endless interchange of commodities. It stimulates the circulation of money—the profits of labor. And this circulation, like the blood, animates, cherishes, and sustains, every part of the system.

The friends of this measure have been warned to forbear, and not to persist any longer in attempting to establish, by force of law, a new and untried system. Sir, it is no new or untried system. It is a system which originated with the Government. The first Congress encouraged, and partially protected, American manufactures, and American industry. The system rests upon the principles of self-defence. If the Government is bound to protect the persons, dwellings, and money of the citizens, from foreign enemies, is it not equally bound to protect their skill and industry from foreign rivalry? A rivalry sometimes not less fatal to these interests than the sword is to life.

My friend from Mississippi (Mr. RANKIN) said, we were about to adopt the policy of England, which would entail upon us, as it had upon her, pauperism, exactions, taxes, and a debt of countless millions. The measure under consideration differs widely from the English system of policy, of which he has spoken. But, were it the same, the consequences would not follow. The fault is not in the system. Has the protection of British manufactures and British industry ever added one dollar to the national debt of Great Britain? Whence, then, have arisen her debts and burdens? From her foreign wars. Were these waged for the protection of her home industry? No, sir; they were commenced and prosecuted for power—for empire. These have filled up her measure of taxes and cruel exactions. The evil, therefore, is not to be found in the system of protecting domestic industry. My friend, also, contended that, should England abolish her corn laws and give free admission to the grain of other countries, it would reduce the expense of living—lower the wages of labor, and, consequently, the price of her manufactures; and thus put it in her power to command the markets of the world. But did he stop to inquire what effect it would have upon her agricultural interest? And what would be its effect? Is there any doubt; can there be any, that the abolition of her corn laws would totally ruin the greatest portion of her farmers? What could they do? Could they turn merchants and manufacturers? No, sir; most of them would become paupers. This has a direct application to our own home matters. Let me ask the Virginia tobacco planters, whether they are willing to risk the free admission into this country of the tobacco and cigars of Cuba and Mexico? Would not this unequal competition ruin them? View it how you will, no pursuit or occupation in life is safe without protection.

I must again call the attention of the Committee to the maxim, "buy where you can buy cheapest." This has been repeated as though there were some magic in it. What does it mean? Does it mean simply the price of the article bought, without any reference to the value of the labor, money, or other thing, given in exchange? If it does, then no man or nation can, for any great length of time, continue to buy cheapest, without the risk of utter ruin. Let us look at the consequence. The industrious farmer abandons his farm, because he can buy the grain from the Baltic, or the Black Sea, and all the other products of his husbandry, from foreign countries, twenty-five per cent cheaper than he can produce them. But, if he cease to produce, has he any thing to give in exchange for the article he wants, however cheap it may be? He certainly has not. The same consequence will follow in regard to any other interest or occupation. The question, then, is not, Where can you buy a bushel of wheat, or a pound of cotton, at a reduction of 25 per cent. in the price, compared with other like articles? But it is, Where can you buy them for the least quantity and value of productive labor and skill? An agricultural nation, when the foreign demand for her products comes to diminish, will find her only safety in a home market. Not that she is to be shut up at home. This is no Chinese policy. Other markets are open, though limited. They always will be open, for no nation can produce or manufacture all she wants. She must, in peace at least, rely upon others for some portion of her annual consumption.

Sir, I am persuaded that this measure is necessary, not only to give activity and energy to agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, but to enable us to provide effectually for the national defence. Upon what does the nation rely for her protection and defence? Is it not upon well fed, well clothed, well armed citizens, and a well appointed navy? It is true we raise food enough, and to spare, but do we produce the other necessary ingredients for building and furnishing a navy, or equipping an army? We do not. With a country peculiarly adapted to the production of wool, cotton, and hemp, and abounding in the ores of iron, lead, and copper, we are still obliged to import many articles, composed of these raw materials, which are useful in peace and essential in war, and without which a battle cannot be fought, or a victory won. Go, examine our army. What proportion of the soldiers' clothing is of American, and what proportion of British manufacture? Go, examine our navy, the bulwark of freedom. There is not a ship in it but has in its construction more or less of foreign iron, canvass, and cordage. Yet there is not an article worth naming in the whole composition of a ship, from truck to keelson, which this country cannot produce. Is it prudent to depend upon England for any portion of our necessary clothing, whether for soldier or citizen? Or, upon Sweden and Russia for any part of the iron and hemp required in the construction of a navy? Is it well for a nation, possessing all resources as ours does, to depend, not upon herself, but upon others, for some of the most essential means of defence? Let the history of the last war answer—a war which, all now acknowledge, cost the country millions for the want of adequate manufacturing establishments to furnish those supplies which were indispensable, and which could no longer be derived from Europe but at great hazard and expense. Is it safe to neglect our own resources, and trust the liberties of the people, in any degree, to the friendship or cupidity of foreigners? But, it is said, that, if we undertake to grow hemp, and to manufacture canvass and iron, the expense will fall heavily upon the agriculturists. This consequence will not necessarily follow, because the competition between the home producers will keep these articles, as the foreign articles are now kept, very nearly, if not quite, at their present prices. But, suppose the price of these articles should be somewhat enhanced? Do our citizens prefer money to life? Are they willing to pour out their blood like water in defence of liberty, and will they refuse a small pittance of their wealth in peace to prevent the wasteful expenditure of blood and treasure in war? I will not believe it, sir. The men of this country are not more hardy and brave than humane and generous. They ask for protection; and I think they ought to have it. I believe the policy of the bill before you is required for the encouragement of American skill, for the protection of American industry. I believe it is called for by the spirit of the times, by the common wants and sufferings of the country, and by every consideration of national safety, prosperity, and renown.

When Mr. STRONG had concluded—

Mr. ISACKS, of Tennessee, moved to amend the bill by striking out thirty-five cents, (the proposed minimum price of cotton goods,) and reducing it to twenty-five cents, the present minimum.

Mr. ISACKS, in support of his motion, said, that, before the question was taken, he must ask the attention of the Committee a few moments; and, indeed, from the late time in the week, the late hour in the day, and the late period of the debate, he feared he could not rightfully expect that attention; and to compensate for it was certainly more than he could promise; but one thing he would promise—that his remarks should be confined to the proposition before the Committee.

He said he felt it the more necessary to state the grounds of his objection to this feature of the bill, because, in many of the other items which had been acted on, he had voted with the friends of the bill, and, if he had believed that the same principles upon which he had supported other parts of the bill were applicable to this, he should not have moved the amendment which had given rise to so much debate; that his purpose was to show the manifest difference which exists between the two grand divisions of the bill, so far as it relates to the duties imposed on importations, the places of which are intended to be supplied either in whole or in part by the manufactures of this country. To one class you give encouragement, with a view to enable them to come in competition with the foreign manufacturer on something like fair and equal ground; while, for the benefit of the other class, you propose (in effect) to exclude the foreign article altogether. The former is done upon the principle of competition, to which he most heartily agreed; the latter is prohibition, to which he was unwilling to subscribe.

Mr. I. said, for the purpose of enabling the domestic manufacturer to compete with the foreign; to produce steadiness of price in the market, (and that not, in the main, at the expense of the consumer, as he believed;) to afford additional consumption for aggregate products which could not find a foreign market; he had voted a moderate increase of duty on foreign distilled spirits, cotton bagging, iron, molasses, and some other articles which had passed in review before the Committee. But what, sir, are we asked to do by that clause of the bill to which this motion applies? Not, as in the depressed condition of other manufacturers, to assist those who are struggling for existence, and who have loaded your table with memorials, but to make a class of manufacturers the special subjects of your favor, who neither ask for, nor need, that favor, and who will not thank you for it when bestowed; for he could say, without the fear of contradiction, that, with regard to the manufactures of cotton cloths, so far as they have yet progressed, the fact must be well known to many in this House, that their business is extremely profitable; that the capital invested in all well-conducted establishments of this kind, produces, at this time, to the owners, a clear profit of from fifteen to twenty-five per cent. per annum.

It is this class, already better provided for than any other, by an existing minimum price of twenty-five cents per yard, and a duty of twenty-five per cent. ad valorem, on foreign cotton goods, that we are asked further to provide for, by increasing the minimum to thirty-five cents, not that they may thereby be enabled to set up for fair competition with the importer, but that the latter may be put down almost entirely as it relates to this article.

Mr. I. said it had been stated, in general terms, that this provision would not amount to a prohibition of the article. He would endeavor to show that it would in effect be prohibition to a great extent—and what would be the consequences of that prohibition.

He said, as the article was required to pay duty according to its value, and that duty being as high as the article would bear, it was clear that the importer could not afford to pay duty at a rateable price upon the article when it was really worth considerably less; this duty upon the amount lying between the real and rated price of the thing, would be to him a dead loss; and he thought it required no argument to prove, that no articles of this description would be imported, which were of inferior value to the minimum price fixed, in the rate of duty.

He said that the minimum of 1816 has had the effect to exclude all cottons below that value, and the present increase will have the same effect to the extent of it, and, if he was not greatly mistaken, the amount thus excluded would be at least one-half of the present importations.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. I. said, if he was right in considering this clause in the bill as prohibitory, then the consequence of this prohibition made an important question. And the first thing that actually strikes the mind is, what effect will this have on the revenue? Without going further back than the last year, it would be found (if his estimate was correct) that the duty on cotton goods, printed, colored, and white, amounted to the sum of $2,782,000. Then to exclude half the amount of these importations or even less, you exclude, by that process, upwards of one million of dollars from the Treasury. This deficit must then be made up by some other mode of collection; and we had been told that the increased duties on other articles in the bill would be sufficient for that purpose. He would admit, that upon many articles the amount of revenue will be increased, but, on others, it will as certainly be diminished; and, taking all the items of this bill together, (setting apart from them this and other prohibitory parts) he thought, if the loss and gain throughout would balance, it was as much as any one had a right to expect; he hoped it would, and so far he was willing to risk it, but he could not flatter himself that there would be any thing over and above, to carry to the amount of prohibitions.

The whole amount of this deficiency, arising from the prohibitory parts of the bill, had been variously estimated by its opponents—suppose it to be three millions, which was a less sum than any of them had made it, though he admitted most of the estimates were made in relation to the bill as it stood before important reductions were carried.

The question then recurs, how is this deficiency, whatever it may be, (and it will be a sum worth thinking about,) to be raised? This question has been avoided by the quaint saying, "that, although the importer pays the duty in the first instance, yet the consumer pays it in the end even now." This is very true, but at present he only pays the single amount of that duty—pays it but once; but by what argument is the prohibition of articles supported? It is in effect by this: that, as the domestic manufacturer cannot contend with the foreign without taking the duty now paid by the foreign and giving it to the domestic manufacturer, and this to enable him to provide the substitute for the duty-paying article, and which, without this bounty, he could not manufacture; consequently he must, to save himself, sell his fabric as high as the foreign fabric now costs, duty and all. The consumer will then be in the same situation he is now: he will still have this tax to pay, with this difference, that he will then not be paying it to the Government but to the manufacturer—the Government is still that much money out of pocket. If, then, to get it in, you should resort to any species of taxation upon the consumer, then, on the back of the increase of price which they will have to pay the manufacturer in the purchase, they will have also to pay an equal amount to the Government; this he would call a double tax on the consumers, or paying, as a consequence of this prohibition, something like the same sum twice, which they now pay but once.

But, suppose Congress should think it more equitable, when they come to provide for this deficit, (as the loss was occasioned on account of the domestic manufacturers,) to tax them to make it up. You will then hear from them, though you do not now. They will tell you, "We did not ask the aid which you gave us: those of us engaged in the business asked for nothing but to be let alone. And as to the rest, you 'led us into the temptation.' We should not have employed our time and capital in this way, if you had not held out the inducement. And now, when our business is but scarcely under way, if you lay this burden on us, it will be insupportable."

But, suppose these arguments, however just, (at least in the way of reproach,) should not prevail, and they should be taxed, (for the money must be raised some how,) what then becomes of the consumer? Why, it's all the same thing in the outcome as though he were taxed himself. The manufacturer lays this tax on the goods, in addition to the former price, and the consumer has it to pay. So that, manage the matter as you may, the result will be that the consumer will then have about twice the amount to pay which the duties now cost him, if these prohibitions should occasion the reduction in the revenue which he had supposed.

Mr. I. said, with a view to increase the revenue, he would be in favor of a revision of the tariff; not only to hasten the payment of the public debt, so often mentioned in the course of this debate, but also to enable the Government effectually to move forward with the system of internal improvement, in which this House had at this session taken the first decisive step.

The practical operations of this system he conceived necessary to the promotion of convenient intercourse and interior trade. It stood first in the order of march towards our national prosperity, and should precede the legislative completion of the manufacturing system.

Mr. I. said he had another reason against producing any material reduction in the revenue, which, as a Representative of the people, he was bound to respect. He would not libel his constituents by saying that the imposition of a tax (should that be the consequence of these prohibitions) would excite them to disaffection, and drive them to disunion. He knew they would bear it to the extent of their ability, with that patience and determined fortitude which they had shown on all occasions when put to the trial; but a knowledge of their situation compelled him to say, that at this time they would be unable to bear it. He would not go into an enumeration of the causes and effects of their embarrassment and distress: one thing at least was evident, that, owing to the wretched condition of our currency, we have nothing that we could pay taxes with; and in this respect at least we are as well off, and perhaps a little better, than our good neighbors immediately to the north of us.

Mr. I. said, that, in support of some of the provisions of this bill, an argument had been used, with great effect, that we should provide for our defence in the unwished-for event of war; but this argument could only apply to the encouragement of the manufacture of iron, lead, hemp, and perhaps a few other articles, necessary for the national defence. So far he acknowledged all its force; but it did not apply to the part of the bill now under consideration. The country is not to be defended with calico and muslin; that business requires sterner stuff.

Mr. I. said, that his assent was most cheerfully yielded to an increase of duties on silks, India and China goods, and all other articles of fashion and luxury, to the extent they would bear, with a view to revenue.

But, Mr. I. said, he would not so far violate his promise to the House as to permit himself to go into an examination of the general principles of the bill; and he would only add—take away its prohibitions, save the revenue, and then encourage manufactures and reward industry.

Mr. CASSEDY, of New Jersey, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: After the protracted debate which we have heard on the subject under consideration of the Committee, and the talent and eloquence which have been exerted, as well by the friends of the bill, as by those gentlemen who have considered it their duty to oppose it, I would not presume to intrude my remarks upon the patience of the Committee, were it not for the solicitude which I acknowledgedly feel, in common with my constituents, in the fate of the question which is soon to be decided.

Admonished, however, by many considerations, I propose to ask the indulgence of the Committee but for a short time. The policy of the bill before us, though the bill itself may probably be susceptible of some amendment, is, in my view, neither of a sectional nor partial character, but national in its objects, and adapted to promote the welfare, not of one class or interest of the community exclusively, but that of the nation at large. Were I not a convert to the truth of this doctrine, or if I could believe, with some gentlemen, that the effect of the bill would be to burden the many for the benefit of the few; to depress one section of our country for the advancement of another; to aggrandize the manufacturing at the expense of the commercial and agricultural classes of the community; or to subject the domain of the cultivator of the soil to the operation of a direct tax, for the benefit of the manufacturer, I would have voted in favor of the motion made by the gentleman from New York, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Of all the employments which occupy the attention, or exercise the industry of mankind, that of the cultivator of the soil is among the most honorable, as it is the most useful; all others are, in a great degree, dependent on it. It was the primeval occupation of our species, and is engaged in executing the mandate of Heaven itself, by extracting, with a laborious and persevering hand, from the prolific bosom of the earth, the food which sustains life, the materials for our clothing, and many of the principal articles of commerce.

I, for one, sir, am unwilling that a tax should be imposed by the General Government upon the lands of the agriculturist, under any circumstances but those of imperious necessity. Had I, for instance, enjoyed the honor of a seat in this House during the late war, carried on, be it remembered, at the expense of millions, and to the bankruptcy of the Treasury, for the protection of our commerce and seamen, and the maintenance of our indispensable rights on the ocean—those rights which could not have been abandoned without a virtual surrender of the national independence, and that commerce which would have ceased to be, or at best would have dragged on a miserable existence, fed, not supported, by the crumbs which might have fallen from the table of our adversary, if commerce, in that hour of her peril, had been "left alone to regulate herself;" to nerve the arm of the Government on such an occasion, and for such objects, I would have voted for a tax on the lands of the cultivator; but on no light, or trivial, or ordinary occasion, would I do so.

I am, Mr. Chairman, in favor of the bill upon your table, and of course opposed to every motion which seeks to effect its destruction; because I believe that, while it would not injuriously affect the commerce of the country, in which every class of our citizens, whether immediately engaged in commercial pursuits or not, is deeply interested, it would, at the same time, afford protection and encouragement to some of the most important branches of domestic manufactures; those for which we possess an abundance of the raw material, or the capacity for producing them to any extent. But, more especially, I am in favor of the bill, because, to me it seems manifest that it would strongly tend to relieve the embarrassments, and promote the prosperity of that class which embraces within its scope the great body of the active male population of the country, (I mean the agriculturists,) by creating a home market for a considerable portion of the surplus productions of the soil, which the European nations, at length released from the calamities of war, can furnish for themselves, and which (with the exception principally of rice, cotton, and tobacco) they, therefore, do not receive in exchange for their fabrics, with which our markets are glutted by them, beyond the measure of our ability to pay; thus making us their debtors to a fearful amount, paralyzing the national industry, and prostrating the independence of the country.

The encouragement of the manufacture of wool alone, by some proper provisions, could not, I think, fail to be beneficial to the American farmer, by enabling him profitably to stock his otherwise unproductive waste lands with sheep, to say nothing of the employment which it, together with the encouragement of other of the more important branches of manufactures, would furnish to many of our citizens, now struggling with want, and of the manufacturing skill and capital which would probably be attracted by them from countries beyond the Atlantic. I cannot agree with those gentlemen who entertain the opinion, that the considerations which have been urged by the friends of the national industry, in favor of the policy of protecting and encouraging it by legislative enactments, and of its tendency to advance the independence of the country, are mere idle declamation.

In one sense it is true, sir, we are already independent. There is no power on earth that has the right to control us but ourselves. Thanks be to God, and to the virtue and valor of our fathers, we no longer owe allegiance to any foreign Government; but, as free and independent States, have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do. Yet, sir, I have been induced to believe there is some soundness in the position, that no nation can be really and practically independent without the ability to furnish, from her own internal resources, not every article, the consumption of which either habit or caprice may have rendered in a degree necessary or desirable, but the essential articles of food, of clothing, and the means of defence. It has been asserted that, during the late war, our Government was compelled, by the necessity of our situation, to be a little blind to the practice of smuggling, in order to obtain the means of clothing our gallant soldiers, who were engaged in fighting the battles of our country in the field.

I readily admit, Mr. Chairman, that, in attempting to anticipate the effects likely to result from the provisions of the bill before us, my conclusions may be erroneous. But, having exercised my best judgment in relation to the probable consequences of those provisions, and having heard the opinions of some gentlemen, whose discernment and experience are entitled to confidence, I do not anticipate that a diminution of the revenue will be found among their number, to induce the necessity of resorting to a system of direct taxation to supply the deficiency. When direct taxation shall come upon us, it will not, I think, be the result of the provisions of this bill. On the contrary, I entertain a confident hope and belief—an opinion, if you please—for it cannot be ascertained by precise calculation,) that the revenue will, under its operation, be at least as great in amount as it is likely to be in the event of the rejection of the bill, and that the diminution which might otherwise ensue, in consequence of a decreased amount of imports, if that shall be found among its effects, will be amply supplied by the increased rates of some of the duties proposed. Not intending to detain the Committee by an examination of all the principal items of the bill, with a view to their effect upon the revenue, I beg leave, in reference to this part of the subject, briefly to advert to one or two of them. Silks are principally consumed by the more wealthy classes of the community. The value of this article, imported into the United States during the year which ended on the 30th September, 1823, (as appears by the last report from the Treasury Department, of the commerce and navigation of the United States,) was upwards of six millions and a half of dollars. The bill proposes an increase of the duty on silks, from fifteen to twenty-five per cent. ad valorem; and as it may, I think, be fairly assumed that the additional duty of ten per cent. will not materially diminish the consumption, the revenue will be benefited, and the burden (if any) will fall, not on the poor, but on the more wealthy classes of the community. The same observations may be applied to fine linens, and other items contained in the bill.

If, Mr. Chairman, Congress shall continue to withhold from the industry of this nation a due portion of that protection which the most enlightened and prosperous nations of the European world have thrown around their own, instead of alarming ourselves at the spectre of direct taxation, supposed to lie in ambush behind the provisions of this bill, will it not, I ask, become us to "gird up our loins," and prepare to wield the burden with what grace we can? We were told by a gentleman from New York, in the course of this debate, that the estimated amount of the revenue for the current year is less, by about two millions of dollars, than was the revenue of the preceding year. To what cause is this falling off to be ascribed? It cannot well be attributed to Tariff legislation, seeing that the Tariff has not been revised since the year 1816. I know it has been ascribed to the fluctuations of trade, and we are told that the revenue of one year cannot be expected to be precisely the same, in amount, with that of another. It may, perhaps, be owing to this cause, but I fear that the diminution is chiefly to be attributed to a cause of deeper interest to us than the accidental fluctuation of trade; I mean, a decreased ability of the nation to pay for and consume articles of foreign production, on the consumption of which the revenue principally arises.

If the ability of this nation to contribute to the wants of the Government, or, in other words, to pay for and consume merchandise imported from abroad, is gradually lessening under the operation of our present course of policy, (as I believe the fact to be,) the revenue which depends upon consumption must likewise decrease; and as the wants of this, like those of every other Government, are imperious, and must be supplied, internal taxation would seem to be the necessary final consequence. On the other hand, if the wealth and prosperity of the nation shall be increased, by the encouragement of national industry, (as I doubt not they would be,) her ability to purchase and consume imported commodities, such as cannot be produced in sufficient quantities at home, will also be increased, to the advantage of the revenue; and if internal taxation, in any shape, should then become necessary, in consequence of extraordinary occurrences, the burden will be lighter, in proportion to our increased ability to endure it.

Is it not, Mr. Chairman, as deplorable as it is true, that we have for years escaped the clutches of the tax gatherer, by the expedient of loans, to which we have been compelled by our necessities to resort, for the humiliating purpose of enabling the Government of this young and enterprising nation, occupying a country on which nature has shed her bounties with a lavish hand, to defray its expenditures; and that, too, during a period of profound peace, and when our military and naval force has been reduced to the level of a peace establishment?

It is said that the condition of the country does not require the species of legislation contained in this bill; that the country is now in a prosperous situation; that of late the revenue has improved, and is now in a flourishing condition; and that there is a considerable surplus balance in the Treasury.

In relation to the balance in the Treasury, the fact is as has been asserted. But have we substantial reason to believe that this state of things will continue? Does the present condition of the Treasury afford conclusive evidence of the general prosperity of the country? Is it not true that, under a system like ours, which derives its revenue principally from duties collected on imports from abroad, the Treasury may flourish for a short and delusive period, by the very means which are gradually exhausting the resources, and undermining the prosperity of the country?

The hectic flush that mantles the cheek of the invalid, may resemble the vivid glow of health; but it serves, in reality, only to indicate the secret disease which corrodes within, and gradually exhausts the vital powers. If, Mr. Chairman, we improvidently suffer ourselves "to live beyond our means," if we annually purchase articles of foreign production, greater in amount than the amount of our current resources, as I have been induced to believe is the case with us; even this state of things may endure, perhaps, for a series of years, and for the time the Treasury may be replenished; but shall we not, by such means, be gradually exhausting our capital, accumulated in more prosperous times, and sinking into debt? I think we shall. These ills, it is admitted, may ultimately find their own remedy, and regulate themselves; but not, I fear, until we shall have been taught the error of our ways in the school of dear-bought experience, and suffered under the lash of protracted adversity.

I do not pretend, Mr. Chairman, to be very conversant with the works of European writers on the subject of national economy; it is said, however, that all those of good repute among them, who have written within the last twenty years, have uniformly condemned the policy proposed by the bill upon your table; and yet, sir, we know that, while the European nations are exporting for our use the theories of political economy recommended in the books of their writers, the wise, the sagacious, the experienced statesmen of those very nations, are practising upon different principles at home—the principles involved in this bill.

Such is the case with nations under almost every variety of circumstances. Such is the case with England, possessed of numerous colonies, and with Prussia, having none. Such is the case with Russia, having, like ourselves, a sparse population, and an almost boundless extent of uncultivated territory, and (omitting the mention of others) such was the policy adopted by Spain, at the era of her short-lived political regeneration.

It has been said, Mr. Chairman, that the principles of our Government, the genius of our institutions, and the character of our population, are so widely different from those of the European nations, that their example furnishes not a fit model for our imitation. In relation to their forms and principles of Government; their wars, generated by avarice or ambition, and followed by their train of never-failing evils; their prodigal expenditures profusely lavished upon objects unconnected with the welfare of the State; I agree that their example is contagious, and ought studiously to be shunned. But, while intent on avoiding the evil, it would be unwise if we should refuse to avail ourselves of the lights of their experience, or disdain to imitate them in the practice of those principles of political economy, which their experience has demonstrated to be sound, and by the influence of their salutary operation at least greatly instrumental in redeeming, within the compass of a comparatively short period, the desolating effects of the wars and calamities of many years. In this we should not disdain to imitate them. Rome, in the plenitude of her power, when she stood the triumphant mistress of the world, did not disdain to stoop from the eminence on which she stood, to take lessons in the arts and sciences, and learn wisdom from the nations she had subdued.

I confess, Mr. Chairman, I am unable to comprehend how it can happen, that the course which the experience of other nations has for ages approved, which has had at least a principal agency in enabling them to endure the enormous burdens of taxation to which they have been subjected—if not in conducting them to power and wealth—is to prove ruinous and destructive to us. At all events, I am unwilling to abandon the safe and beaten path which the finger of experience has pointed out, to pursue the theories of speculative foreign writers, whose doctrines and opinions are at variance, not only with the practice of their own Governments, but also with the principles inculcated by many, if not all, of the most distinguished of our earlier statesmen.

The opinion of Say, Ricardo, Lowe, and others, having been arrayed against the policy of the bill before us, it may not, perhaps, be deemed useless to direct our attention, for a few moments, to the writings of American statesmen, whose opinions we have been accustomed to regard with deference, and who were possessed of the important advantages of an intimate acquaintance with the condition and circumstances of our country, and the genius and character of its inhabitants. The opinion of Alexander Hamilton is well known to have been decidedly in favor of the policy of affording protection and encouragement to domestic manufactures, and it will not be denied, even by those who were politically opposed to him, that he possessed a most powerful and discriminating mind.

We have been told by this statesman, "that the uniform appearance of an abundant specie, as the concomitant of a flourishing state of manufactures, and of the reverse, where they do not prevail, afford a strong presumption of their favorable operation on the wealth of a country;" that, "not only the wealth, but the independence and security of a country, appear to be materially connected with the prosperity of manufactures; and that every nation, with a view to these great objects, ought to endeavor to possess, within itself, all the essentials of national supply, which comprise the means of subsistence, habitation, clothing, and defence."

I find, Mr. Chairman, in the works of the same distinguished individual, certain passages, connected with the subject of the present discussion, embracing opinions so strongly verified by the experience of this nation, and so clearly descriptive of the advantages which the friends of the bill anticipate as likely to result from it, in favor of the agricultural class of the community, that I beg leave to recall them to the recollection of the Committee.

"There appear," says he, "strong reasons for regarding the foreign demand for the surplus of American productions, as too uncertain a reliance, and to desire a substitute for it in a domestic market. The restrictive regulations which, in a foreign market, abridge the vent for the increasing surplus of our agricultural productions, serve to beget a desire that a more extensive demand for that surplus be created at home. To secure such a market, there is no other expedient than to promote manufacturing establishments. Manufacturers, who constitute the most numerous class, after the cultivators of the land, are, for that reason, the principal consumers of the surplus of their labor." "This idea of an extensive domestic market, for the surplus produce of the soil, is of the first consequence. It is, of all things, that which most effectually conduces to a flourishing state of agriculture."

Mr. Jefferson, in treating of the subject of duties on foreign productions, and particularly those of the nations who impose high duties upon, or exclude our own, has said, "that such duties, having the effect of indirect encouragement to domestic manufactures of the same kind, may induce the manufacturer to come into these States;" and that "the oppression of our agriculture in foreign parts, would thus be made the occasion of relieving it from a dependence on the counsels and conduct of others, and of promoting arts, manufactures, and population, at home." "To be independent of the comforts of life," says this illustrious statesman, (who certainly was not tainted with British prejudices,) "we must fabricate them ourselves. We must now place the manufacturer by the side of the agriculturist. Experience has taught me, that manufactures are as necessary to our independence as to our comfort."

The President of the United States, at the opening of the present session of Congress, has expressly recommended "a review of the Tariff, for the purpose of affording additional protection to the articles which we are prepared to manufacture, or which are more immediately connected with the defence and independence of the country."

In venturing, Mr. Chairman to express the opinion which I entertain, that it is the interest of the growers of cotton—that most important article of our produce—to encourage its domestic consumption, I may be told that the planters themselves, with a better understanding of their own particular interests than I perhaps can lay claim to, and having a market abroad, are averse to the policy by which that object might be accomplished.

But, what is the state of the foreign market for this staple? Is it not true, that while the demand for it has increased in the European markets, the price of American cotton has declined within the course of a few years, to less than eight pence sterling a pound; and that a still further decline (notwithstanding occasional variations of price) is seriously to be apprehended? I believe the facts are so. This effect, it is presumed, has been produced by the overstocking of the markets, occasioned, in part, by the increased amount produced in and exported from our country, and, in part, by the increased quantities with which the European markets are supplied from the East and West Indies, from Egypt, and the Brazils. By a statement said to be derived from the Liverpool merchants, it appears that the imports of cotton from the latter country into Great Britain, for the last six years, were—

1820 -	-	-	-	-	179,805 "

1822 -	-	-	-	-	144,168 "
1823 -	-	-	-	-	148,614 "

The imports from the East Indies, during the same period, are stated as follows:

In 1818 -	-	-	-	-	245,672 bales.
1819 -	-	-	-	-	184,633 "
1820 -	-	-	-	-	57,183 "
1821 -	-	-	-	-	30,095 "
1822 -	-	-	-	-	19,263 "
1823 -	-	-	-	-	38,393 "

From the West Indies, &c., during the same period—

In 1818 -	-	-	-	-	55,177 bales.
1819 -	-	-	-	-	30,339 "
1820 -	-	-	-	-	31,576 "

Egypt, under the auspices of her present enterprising Pacha, is becoming a cotton-growing country. Her soil and climate are well adapted to its cultivation. By commercial letters lately received in this country, and published in our gazettes, it appears that Egyptian cotton, in considerable quantities, has already found its way to the European markets, where it is said to be coming into successful competition with our cottons of the Sea Islands and of New Orleans. One of the letters alluded to, (written from Marseilles to the editor of the Paris Journal du Commerce, and dated in December, 1823,) holds the following language:

"It is now four years since M. Jumel, a Frenchman, conceived the idea of introducing the cotton plant into Egypt from Brazil. The experiment completely succeeded. The Pacha ordered the plants to be propagated as fast as possible, and upon the most extensive scale. In the second year the culture produced nearly 100,000 killogrammes, (320,000 lbs.) in the third year twenty times as much, and now, in the fourth year, at the moment of my writing, there are in the Lazaretto of Marseilles 4,000 bales, equal to 600,000 killogrammes, which are ready for the manufacturer. The Lazarettoes of Leghorn and Trieste contain about the same quantity we have here; and letters of the highest authority say that the entire crop will exceed 5,000,000 killogrammes, (about 40,000 bales.) We can place no limits to the future increase of this plant; the Pacha has it cultivated high up the Nile."

"The quality of this cotton, which is of the long staple kind, is excellent; when it obtains a little more whiteness in color, and is better handled, it will entirely supersede Louisiana and Pernambuco cottons. It is probable that our manufacturers will give it the preference, more especially on account of the low price to which the abundant crops will reduce it. What will be the effect of this upon our commercial relations with the United States?"

It is, I think, fairly to be presumed that Mexico, and the vast and fertile regions which composed the late Spanish colonies in South America, will, at no distant period, produce cotton in great abundance; and that Europe will, without regard to our course of legislation, receive from these, and other foreign sources, large quotas of her supply. The consequence in relation to the United States is obvious. If, then, the foreign market for our cotton is deteriorating, in consequence of causes which it is impossible for us to control, and which seem to partake of a permanent character, I ask the representatives of the cotton-growing States, (and I do so with all the diffidence which becomes me,) whether it is not their true interest to lend their influence in favor of a policy which must result in an increased consumption of the article at home?

As to the present extent of the domestic market for our cotton, I have not been fortunate enough to obtain a statement, which is entirely satisfactory to myself. The quantity used in our manufacturing establishments has been variously stated. The annual domestic consumption of this great staple of the South, may probably amount to about 30,000,000. The town of Paterson, in New Jersey, which contains twelve cotton mills, and about 18,000 spindles, has manufactured (according to information furnished me by gentlemen of intelligence residing there) 1,200,000 pounds a year, for the manufacture of which the annual sum of about $250,000 has been paid in wages.

In connexion with this part of the subject, I take occasion to remark, that, among the effects which, in my judgment, are likely to result from the policy of the bill before us, may be numbered the acquisition of a new foreign market for our cotton—not as a raw material, but in manufactured form, and that in regions well adapted, by the nature of their own soil and climate, for its abundant production. I mean those interesting countries on the continent of South America, now happily released, by the achievement of their independence, from the domination of Spain; and from the shackles, for centuries imposed upon them by her jealous policy, which crushed the spirit of their industry, and sought to confine their commerce to herself alone. These countries are just beginning to breathe, after the calamities of a protracted and sanguinary war; the bird of peace is scarcely yet seen to hover over its subsiding billows; their civil institutions are yet to be perfected and consolidated, and a series of years must necessarily elapse before they can become, to any considerable extent, manufacturing nations. The principles and forms of government which they have adopted, are congenial to our own; we were the first to acknowledge their independence, and it is reasonable to presume that we shall stand with them on the footing of the most favored nations, in relation to commercial intercourse.

An apprehension seems to be entertained that, in the event of the passage of the bill, the manufacturers will be enabled, by the monopoly which it is supposed will be secured to them, to exact from the good people of this Union exorbitant prices for their productions.

This apprehension, I feel confident, can never be realized. The true interest and the policy of the manufacturers alike forbid it; and, if this were otherwise, it will not be in their power to extort. They are charged with having done so during the late war, when foreign importations had, in a great measure, ceased; but it cannot be difficult, I think, to show that this charge had its origin in error.

The price of an article will, in general, depend upon its quantity in the market, compared with the extent of the demand for it. If, during the period alluded to, our manufacturing establishments had been annihilated, the supply of manufactured articles would have been greatly diminished, and the prices proportionably enhanced; the domestic supply, therefore, operated to keep the prices in check, and probably benefited the people of this Union to the amount of many millions. Experience, I believe, will warrant the assertion, that protection to the domestic manufacture of an article has generally, if not invariably, had the effect of producing it, abundant in quantity, improved in quality, and, as the result of competition among the manufacturers themselves, reduced in price. As examples of this result, the articles of coarse cottons and cut nails have been frequently adduced. The article called plains, or negro cloth, which is principally used, in the South, may be added. The European article, composed of wool, was formerly sold at seventy-five cents a yard. The American manufacturer produced the negro cloth, of cotton and wool, and foreign plains fell to twenty-five cents. The American article, superior to the foreign, may, at this day, be purchased (as I am informed) for twenty-eight cents the yard, though the planters of the South are probably in the habit of paying a higher price, in consequence of the profits accumulated upon it, by successive dealers, through whose hands it passes to them.

The growers of cotton and tobacco have, at this time, I believe, the monopoly of the domestic market for those articles. Not a spindle nor a shuttle in the cotton manufacturing establishments of the North can be put into operation, without the raw material, the cotton of the South. Of this I do not complain, nor have I learned that extortion has ever been practised by the South in consequence of it; on the contrary, I rejoice that our own country can furnish our own supply of these important articles; that we are not dependent on foreign nations for them, and that a very numerous and respectable portion of our population is benefited by their production.

It was my intention, Mr. Chairman, to have presented other views of the subject, and to have attempted a reply to several of the charges which have been exhibited against the principles of the bill now "upon the country" for its trial; but its more able advocates who have preceded me in the debate having rendered the attempt, in a great degree, unnecessary, I will briefly notice a few of them.

It has been objected that, by the passage of the bill, we shall commit a violation of the Constitution of the Union, which we are bound, by our duty, and our highest interest as citizens, as well as by our official oaths, to maintain inviolate. This objection bears an aspect of the most formidable character. Its effort is to lay the axe at once to the root of the bill before us, and to effect, not only its destruction, but, so long as the Constitution shall remain unaltered, to deny to the General Government the power of protecting the industry of the country, by similar legislative enactments, at any future period. If, however, this objection be well founded, it merits, beyond all dispute, the attainment of its object. The supposed violation, if I have correctly comprehended its nature, is to consist, not so much in overt act as in intention. You may (says the objection) constitutionally pass a bill imposing duties on imports, provided it be done with the sole view and intention of raising a revenue; but, if you intend by its enactment to protect and encourage the industry of the country, and impose duties adequate to the accomplishment of that end, the whole character of the act is changed, and it degenerates into a violation of the spirit of the Constitution.

This mode of interpreting the Constitution, in my judgment, has in it too much of subtlety and refinement to be just, and cannot be sustained by the provisions of the instrument itself; these provisions are too familiar to every member of this Committee to need a recital. It is not the interpretation practically given to them by the Congress of 1789, which sat shortly after the adoption of the Constitution, and was, if I mistake not, composed in part of the same distinguished statesmen who had been members of the Convention which gave it birth.

The preamble of the act of Congress, passed in the year 1790, for passing duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, refers to the act of 1789 on the same subject, and informs us that the duties imposed by the latter act were laid, not for the purpose of revenue alone, but "for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the protection and encouragement of domestic manufactures." If, therefore, the construction of the Constitution, contended for by the opponents of the bill, be correct, the passage of the act of 1789, for the purposes, and with the intention which it distinctly avows, involved in it a violation of the charter of our liberties, and we must be driven to a conclusion which I am unwilling to admit—that that venerable Congress, as it has justly been termed, did not comprehend the true meaning and construction of the instrument, which many of its members had been instrumental in framing.

It has been objected, that extensive manufacturing establishments are the fruitful nurseries of vices and crimes; that that portion of the population of a country, which "inhales their pestilential atmosphere"—I use the language which has been used in this House—feeble and decrepit in body, and deformed in mind, are reduced to the level of slaves; that they are unfit to breathe the pure air of freedom, and are both morally and physically incapable of defending their country in the hour of danger.

This picture is highly colored, and would probably have produced an impression on my mind unfavorable to the policy of the bill, had I not availed myself of the frequent opportunities, which circumstances have afforded, of seeing and judging for myself.

How far the representation may be applicable to the establishments of other countries, where the principles of freedom do not prevail; where the debasing influence of oppression pervades the whole mass of the population, with the exception of the privileged few; and where the people are bowed down beneath a weight of taxation, I pretend not to determine; but, in relation to the establishment of our own country, so far as my observation has extended, it is erroneous.

I could point the attention of gentlemen to the Ramapo manufacturing establishment in the State of New York, of which a member of the last Congress is a part proprietor—to establishments at Paterson, in New Jersey, and others, as signal refutations of this objection. Though often languishing under the want of adequate protection, to my eye they have not presented the loathsome and disgusting spectacle of disease and crime, but the pleasing scene of well regulated industry.

It may, perhaps, be true, sir, that some portion of the population, employed in the manufacturing establishments, are not so well qualified as those whose pursuits have rendered them more hardy and athletic, to wield the arms of the warrior; but they can, and will perform the not less important and essential service of clothing him in the field. It is well known that the greater number of hands employed in our cotton manufacturing establishments are women and children; many of whom, doubtless, would otherwise be idle; and thus become the certain victims of those vices which idleness never fails to generate.

H. OF R.

Proceedings.

APRIL, 1824.

The objection to manufacturing establishments, which I have just noticed, would apply, with greater force, to our commercial cities. Amid the vast variety of advantages which the nation derives from them, as the emporiums of our commerce; their numerous institutions for charitable and benevolent purposes, and for the promotion of science and the arts; is it not true, that they are also the great theatres of luxury, effeminacy, and disease, and may I not add, of vices and crimes; that a portion of their population, from the nature of their pursuits, have less of physical ability to bring to the defence of the country, in the hour of danger, than is to be found among the more hardy and intrepid cultivators of the soil? And yet, I presume, the individual is hardly to be found who would wish to check the growth or mar the prosperity of our cities.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, believing, as I do, that the encouragement of domestic manufactures is our true policy; that it is even now required at our hands, by the deliberate wishes and expectations of a decided majority of the citizens of this Union; I cannot forego the hope that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, which is aimed at one of the most important provisions of the bill, will not prevail; and that the bill, either in its present form, or properly modified, without destroying the efficacy of its character, will receive every necessary sanction, and become a law of the land.

When Mr. CASSEDY had taken his seat—

On motion of Mr. CARTER, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, April 5.

Mr. KENT presented a memorial of divers inhabitants of the City of Washington, in opposition to the change proposed to be made in the system of government of the District of Columbia, by the bill now pending before this House, to provide for the government of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee of the whole House to which the said bill is committed.

Mr. COBB presented a memorial and remonstrance of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Georgia in General Assembly met, upon the subject of the execution on the part of the United States of the articles of agreement and cession entered into between the United States and Georgia, on the 24th April, 1802, and asking that a liberal appropriation may be made for the extinguishment of the Indian title to all the remaining lands within the limits of the State of Georgia, and that Commissioners may be appointed, with instructions, in every event, to effect this indispensable object by a proper representation to the Indian tribes of the just claims of Georgia, the solemn obligations of the United States, and of the improvement in their own condition, which will result from their acquiescence; which memorial and remonstrance was referred to the committee appointed on the 30th ultimo, on a Message from the President of the United States in relation to the same subject.

Mr. MOORE, of Kentucky, presented a memorial of the trustees of the Kentucky institution for the tuition of the deaf and dumb, praying for aid to enable them to fulfil the objects of their incorporation, which was referred to a select committee; and Mr. MOORE of Kentucky, Mr. STERLING, Mr. TYSON, Mr. CAMPBELL of Ohio, Mr. BLAIR, Mr. WICKLIFFE, and Mr. LONG, were appointed said committee.

The SPEAKER presented a memorial of John Cleves Symmes and Thomas S. Hinds, of Newport, in Kentucky, praying that provision may be made for occupying the territory of the United States lying between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific Ocean, and suggesting the propriety of incorporating a company with the exclusive right to trade with the Indians, as the best means to effect that object; which petition was referred to the committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of occupying the mouth of the Columbia, or Oregon river.

Mr. FRANCIS JOHNSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to discontinue certain post roads and to establish others; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report on the petition of Warder and Brothers, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Fry and Spalding; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. McLANE, from the same committee, who were instructed, on the 27th of February last, "to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to compensate the friendly Creek Indians for property lost and destroyed during the late war," made a report adverse to the making the said appropriation; which report was laid on the table.

Mr. McLANE, from the same committee, to which were referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1824," made a report thereon, and the amendments were committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the committee appointed on the Message of the President of the United States, of the 30th ultimo, in relation to Indian lands within the State of Georgia, by leave of the House, reported a bill making further appropriations for the extinguishment of the title of the Creek Indians to lands lying within the State of Georgia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee appointed to inquire what further legislative provisions are fit and necessary to carry into effect the provisions of the act of Congress, passed March 3d, 1817, entitled "An act to amend the act authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes, passed the 9th of April, 1816," made a report, in detail, accompanied by a bill further to amend the said act; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, called up the consideration of the resolution offered by him some days since, for fixing the time of the adjournment of this House, and the question on considering being taken by yeas and nays, the votes were, yeas 94, nays 90. So the House agreed to consider the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN moved to fill the blank with "Monday, the third day of May, 1824."

Mr. TOD moved, as an amendment, to fill the blank with the 20th day of May.

Mr. EDWARDS adverted to a fact which occurred at the last session—that, before the time of fixing the day of adjournment, but few acts were passed, while afterwards a great many, and of the most important character, passed the House within a short time.

Mr. FORSYTH made some explanations in reply to Mr. EDWARDS.

The debate was superseded by the SPEAKER passing to the orders of the day.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. TOMLINSON in the Chair, on the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill making appropriation for the support of the Navy. The first question was on concurring with the Senate in striking out the specification of the items of expenditure of the fund for contingent expenses of the Navy.

After some observations by Mr. McLANE, explanatory of the history and intention of this clause of the bill, the House resolved to disagree with the Senate in the amendment to strike out; by which resolution, they retained the clause of specifications, (originally moved in the lower House by Mr. McL.)

The question being next on agreeing to the Senate's amendment striking out the sum of $180,000, (moved in the House by Mr. COCKE,) and reinstating the sum of $225,000, (as first reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.)

A debate occurred, in which Messrs. FORSYTH, RANDOLPH, COCKE, WARFIELD, and FLOYD, opposed, and Messrs. McLANE and FULLER advocated the amendment—and the question being put, on disagreeing with the Senate, it was carried, yeas 89, noes 62—so the House refused to reinstate the sum of $225,000, and left the blank filled with $180,000.

The next, the question upon the Senate's second amendment, which provides for a small purchase of land near the navy yard, at Charlestown, Massachusetts, was agreed to with the following amendment, proposed by Mr. RANDOLPH, viz: adding after the word "purchase," "by and with the consent of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts." The remaining amendment of the Senate was agreed to without debate—when the Committee rose and reported the disagreement of the Committee of the Whole to the first amendment—its agreement to the second, with an amendment, and its agreement to the third.

The House concurred with the Committee, and the bill was returned to the Senate.

THE TARIFF BILL.

On motion of Mr. TOD, the House then went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill "to amend the several acts laying duties on imports," Mr. CONDUCT in the Chair.

Mr. ISACKS modified his motion of Saturday, for striking out the minimum on cottons, so as to leave the present minimum untouched, viz: by inserting 25 cents instead of 35 cents, as the minimum valuation.

Mr. CARTER, of South Carolina, rose and said, it was with much reluctance he had prevailed on himself, at this advanced stage of the discussion, to ask the attention of the Committee. The length of time that the proposed measure had been the subject of inquiry and speculation, not only within these walls, but throughout the nation; the great talent and research that have been exhibited upon its diversified bearings, have been such as to leave scarcely anything new to be brought to the discussion.

After making this statement, it might be thought necessary by some that he should make an apology to the Committee for obtruding upon them the few remarks which he proposed to make. If there were any who entertained such an opinion, the only and the best excuse which he could offer them, would be found in the peculiar importance of the subject to the whole American people, and the special and vital interests of the Southern section of this Union, which it was apprehended would be injuriously affected by its operations.

The space which the present bill covers, the variety of items which it embraces, expose it to a multitude of objections of different degrees of force, according to the particular provisions which may be opposed. And I confess that the provision now proposed to be stricken out, is freer from objection than some other provisions of the bill. But, as gentlemen who have supported, as well as those who have opposed the motion now before the Committee, have thought it a fit occasion to give their general views of the policy of the whole measure, Mr. C. said he hoped the Committee would pardon him for imitating their example.

It is admitted on all hands to be a wise maxim of legislation, that no change ought to be made in any existing law, unless the reasons for that change be strong, general, and evident. Whether such reasons are to be found in support of the proposed measure, I appeal to those who are acquainted with the best interests of this Republic, and its present actual condition, to say. Will any one pretend to assert that there has been so universal and unequivocal an expression of public opinion on this subject as to leave no room to doubt of its being the nation's will? True it is, sir, that loud and importunate complaints have reached us from various quarters of the country. From one quarter we hear a pressing outcry for protection to the manufacturers of wool, and for the encouragement of the growth of the raw material at home; from another quarter we are importuned to assist the petitioners in their unequal competition with the manufacturers of glass ware from abroad; from a third quarter we are told that the growers and manufacturers of hemp are laboring under the most unpardonable neglect of Government, and that, in consequence of it, industry is languishing, and capital unemployed. Thus it is, that all these various and distinct interests, scattered over an immense face of country, are simultaneously putting forth their complaints and collectively produce a deep tone of remonstrance. Each one is stimulated by a belief that theirs is a case of peculiar hardship, requiring the special interposition of Congress. But to any one who will attentively examine the sources from which these complaints come, the task cannot be a difficult one of ascertaining the true weight to which they are entitled. Can any one, who will thus examine them, mistake them for the individual voice of the whole American people fairly and deliberately expressed? Are they not rather to be regarded as the interested importunities of certain classes of individuals or of sections of the country, who are determined to make up for their deficiency in numbers by the loudness of their complaints? They are echoed by gentlemen who seem determined to give the appearance of general distress to the country, by the very generality of the terms they use, and the urgency with which they press them upon the public consideration.

The maxim in legislation to which I have before alluded, derives additional force from the consideration, that, of all classes of laws, those which interfere with the industry of the different laboring classes of a community ought, above all others, to be enacted with great caution and circumspection. The tendency of the law now in question is directly of that description. And why ought laws of this description to be ventured upon with so much caution? Because, past experience, as well as daily observation, teach us that there is such a multitude of opposite and conflicting interests to be consulted and accommodated, such a mass of jealous feeling to be neutralized by all such regulations, that it is next to impossible to adopt such a course as will secure the object intended by the Legislature. In all such cases, after a clear and imperative necessity has demonstrated the expediency of doing something, the extreme difficulty of doing that something in the way that will attain the end you have in view, without bringing with it many collateral evils, is such as ought to induce every wise politician to hesitate long before he acts. The manufacturing, the commercial, and agricultural interests of every community are so intimately connected and vitally intertwined, that whatever affects one extends its effects to all of them. What is intended for the benefit of one of them, sometimes operates in an inverse ratio to produce mischief to the others; and examples are to be found where regulations designed to promote either of these great sources of national as well as of individual wealth, have produced consequences which were at first wholly unforeseen, and brought disorder and mischief on the whole system of the industry of a country. And shall we then, sir, with a full knowledge of all the possible evils that may result from such legislation, with so many circumstances admonishing us to beware, advance rashly on the experiment? And shall we, with the partial evidence of its necessity, which has been shown, boldly hazard the result? For one, said Mr. C., however visionary my fears may be on this subject, I must confess I am not prepared for such a trial.

The more, said Mr. C., I contemplate the proposed measure, the more sensibly am I impressed with its intrinsic difficulty. That there are cases of real hardship existing in some parts of the country, cannot in candor be denied. But you will look in vain through the country for that wide-spread and intense distress of which some gentlemen have spoken.

That the contemplated increase of duties which some politicians regard as the certain means of relief, as a kind of political catholicon, will not, in its operation, produce in some parts of the country a greater portion of alternative misery than it will cure in others, is what the friends of this measure cannot safely affirm. The great difficulty is to pursue that wise and middle course, which, while it affords adequate protection to the manufacturing, does not cripple or prostrate the agricultural or commercial interests of the country. For, Mr. C. said, notwithstanding his opposition to the present measure, he must be permitted to declare, in the sincerity of his heart, and without the slightest reservation, that there is no friend to it who felt a higher and juster pride in the prosperity of the domestic manufacturers of this country, or a more anxious solicitude for their ultimate complete success than he did.

I have said that the country, in some parts of it, exhibits cases of great hardship. It is due to truth and candor that this admission should be made.

The farmer of the grain-growing States will tell you that he has large annual surpluses of grain, which he is doomed year after year to see rot and perish on his hands. That it is to no purpose that he applies himself to the diligent cultivation of a fruitful soil; that each return of autumn finds his barns filled to overflowing with abundance, but that it is all useless, nay, worse than useless to him; for his well-stored barns stand continually before his eyes, as tormenting memorials of his own labors frustrated, and the bounty of his fields most cruelly wasted. He may represent his labors as equalling, in their fertility and vexatious disappointment, the fabled toils of Sisyphus himself. The deplorable accuracy of such a picture will not be disputed. Nor can any one turn away from the contemplation of such a picture, without first bestowing upon it that tribute of his consideration, as well as of his sympathy, which it so well deserves.

It is quite natural that in any portion of the community where distress is sorely felt, where the ordinary stimulants to industry are very much diminished, or wholly withdrawn, that the individuals who experienced this inconvenience should seize with avidity upon any expedient which, by possibility, among its various contingent results, might contribute to their relief. While they contemplate the reality and extent of their suffering, they are easily cheated into a belief that any measure, no matter how illy contrived, may benefit them. And how do the friends of this measure propose to remedy the evil? The only plan that has been suggested has been so to encourage the manufactures of the country, so to augment the mechanic labor of our citizens that the number of artisans should so considerably multiply and gain upon the number of agriculturists, that we should raise up, in the bosom of our own country, a sufficient number of them to consume all the surplus provisions that the cultivators of the earth could produce. In a word, that we must become our own customers, and furnish a home market for all the superfluous grain which this wide-spread fertile country can grow. Whoever will consider the vast capacities of this country for producing every species of grain, in the most exuberant abundance, and the vast amount of mutual labor that has been superseded by modern discoveries, in labor-saving machinery, must be satisfied that, if this result could ever take place, it must be the effect of time alone. Any attempt to legislate against nature, and to hasten, by law, that which the slow progress of years can alone effect, would at least be vain, if it did not actually retard the very object you professed to accelerate.

Some of the advocates of this bill seem to think that it is only necessary for Congress to grant the protection they ask, in order to insure them immediate and complete success. They seem to think that something magical is to spring out of an act of Congress, and that as soon as the seal of authority is affixed to their chartered privileges, all these manufacturing institutions, which in other countries have required the lapse of ages to bring them to perfection, are, on this side the Atlantic, to spring instantaneously, like Minerva from the brain of Jupiter, into a full, sudden, and perfect maturity. Any one who will attentively examine this opinion for a single moment, will not hesitate to pronounce it a perfect illusion; for, by tracing the early history of manufactures in every country, it will be found that the want of skill in the application of the capital and labor employed, has retarded their first advancement; and that complete success has been attained only after years of disappointment and disastrous experience.

The same causes, Mr. Chairman, in equal circumstances, produce the same effects every where, and at all times. But the circumstances on which these causes operate, produce as infinite a variety of modification to their results, as it is possible for the mind of man to imagine. If, then, such has been the progress of manufactures in other countries; if such has been their growth in old countries, where their population has been redundant, and the usual concomitants of that state of things, an increased cheapness of labor, and an increased demand for the ordinary necessities of human subsistence, have had their full operation, what can we, in the nature of things in this country, expect, but a much more gradual introduction of them? It ought not, therefore, to surprise or discourage the friends of domestic manufactures, that, in the short history of them, which this country furnishes, some failures have taken place, and that in comparatively few instances has their success been complete. In the first essays of every country to introduce new systems of employment for its citizens, disappointment has always been, and must forever continue to be, the invariable concomitant of enterprise; and, in the United States, it may be unhesitatingly affirmed, that the want of entire success in our manufactures of every sort, is to be attributed to a vast variety of other causes, rather than to the sparing protection of Government.

There is one argument against this measure, which its friends are disposed to treat as visionary, which, I am persuaded, if it be rightly examined, will be found to deserve serious consideration. It is, that the effect of the bill on your table will be, to lessen the revenue. It is true that considerations of this sort have but little weight with some of the supporters of this tariff. It has been avowed, in the course of the discussion, that, if its main object, the improvement of manufactures, could be accomplished, it ought to be attempted, even at the expense of the revenue. This is the great desideratum to which every thing else must give way.

To that portion of the Committee who entertain this opinion, Mr. C. said he could not hope to urge any argument drawn from this source, with success. But he hoped that such an opinion was confined to a small portion of the friends of the bill. It must be admitted that, at this time, a large portion of the coarse imported woollens demanded by the necessities of this country, were consumed in the Southern and Western States; and it is a remark made by a very ingenious and profound writer on the nature and origin of the public wealth, (Lord Lauderdale,) that Great Britain, being, from her situation, a nation peculiarly commercial, and having extensive trading connexions with almost every country upon the face of the globe, is governed, in the cargoes which her merchants make up for distant markets, by no single circumstance more than a regard to the distribution of property to which the cargo is sent. The application of this remark to the Southern and Western States, will show, in the plainest manner, the extent of the demand which these States furnish for coarse woollen fabrics. The distribution of property in these States is, for the most part, very unequal. Much the greater portion of their inhabitants consists of the poor laboring part of the community, whose Winter clothing consists principally of coarse woollens. When you add to this number the whole of the colored population spread over nearly one-half of this whole Union, embracing a number not much, if any thing, short of two millions of souls, you have an amount of domestic consumption in this single article, by no means to be contemned in the estimate you make of the income to the Treasury from foreign imports.

But; it will be said that very object and design of the bill is to furnish these planters with these commodities, at home, in the same abundance, and on as cheap terms as they are at present enabled to purchase them from abroad. Those who make this answer, surely "reckon without their host." For, it must be evident, that, to supply the large demand which the Southern and Western States furnish, for coarse woollen fabrics, the manufactories at present in operation in this country are wholly inadequate. And, sir, if they be not so, this circumstance of itself furnishes a most unanswerable proof that they are already in a sufficiently flourishing condition, and need not any further assistance from Government. It must be assumed, then, as undeniably true, that our own manufactories are insufficient to supply the present home demand.

In still further answer to this part of the argument, it may be said, that the proposed increase of duty is so small, that it is idle to expect that so trifling an advance upon the burden already imposed, can produce such important consequences; and that the supply will still be adequate to the wants of the country, without any oppressive increase of price; that the deficiency at home will still be supplied from abroad.

Let us examine this supposition for a moment, in detail, to see whether it be true, or whether any the slightest augmentation of the present duty would not have the effect of excluding such fabrics altogether from our markets. The present taxes with which they are burdened to the purchasers, are such as barely to enable the Southern planters to purchase them, for the purpose of clothing their slaves. The extreme depression of their foreign markets has produced so much embarrassment at home, that many of them seriously deliberate within themselves whether they had not better, by some exertion of household economy, manufacture these fabrics of primary necessity within themselves, rather than purchase them at their present prices. And any one who will reflect on the facilities with which a slaveholding State may occasionally devote their labor to this object, without deducting from the average annual product of their crop, cannot be surprised to find this species of manufacture come into general use. How is it conducted? It is produced with hardly any loss of field labor. It is carried on chiefly by women, at seasons when the inclemency of the weather would prevent them from being employed in the field. And, on all large plantations, there are a number of women who, from their skill in this species of employment, their bad health, or infirm constitution, it would be found advisable to devote altogether to this species of labor. Thus, with a very trifling loss on any plantation, and on many without any loss at all, might be produced a substitute for the immense amount of coarse woollens from abroad, at present consumed in the Southern country. The same kind of revolution would take place in the domestic economy of all the poor people. How can any one, then, undertake to say, that the operation of the present measure will not produce a diminution of the revenue?

But, said Mr. C., I hear it repeated, that the proposed increase of duty is so small an advance upon that already paid, that it is futile to expect such eventful consequences from a cause so inadequate; that a slight improvement in the price of cotton, of rice, or of tobacco, will enable the growers of those articles still to consume these foreign fabrics, without feeling any additional burden.

If what has already been said on this subject be not a sufficient answer to this coazing douceur, let me, said Mr. C., inform gentlemen, that the history of the world furnishes no example of the commercial or manufacturing part of a community who had any important object to subserve or promote, at the expense of some rival interest, who did not apply themselves to just such devices as the present, and employ the self-same expedients to allay the fears of those on whose interests they meditated an attack. Let me not be misunderstood. I do not mean to accuse the advocates of this bill with any fixed, deliberate purpose of subverting the interests of the Southern States. Nor do I believe that they have any wish to destroy that equilibrium which ought to pervade the industry of every well regulated Government, so that, in the confusion which might ensue, manufactures might, peradventure, be exalted on the ruins of agriculture. I should be unwilling to believe that such a spirit existed in any portion of men, in any portion of this country. But, sir, the extreme subtlety with which such a spirit operates, the insensible influence which it exerts upon those who will not acknowledge its presence, and the thousand insidious forms that it assumes, for the purpose of accomplishing its object, might induce some gentlemen to look well to what they were doing, before they gave this measure their sanction. It would, at any rate, be but a poor consolation to those who are to feel the mischief of its unequal operation, to reflect, that its authors were actuated by the most benevolent intentions; that their design was purely to benefit themselves, without any the remotest intention to injure others. If the evil happens, it matters not what motives gave birth to it, and the mere absence of malignity from the intention of those who inflict it, can never mitigate the sufferings of the victim.

Intimately connected with its diminution of the revenue, may be considered the effects of this measure upon the maritime strength of the country. Its pernicious operation, in this respect, has already been so ably delineated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that, Mr. C. said, he felt that, to enlarge on this topic, would be an unwarrantable trespass on the Committee. But, it did appear to him, that, exactly in proportion as the effects of this measure would be injuriously felt upon our finances, they would prove discouraging to our seamen; and, shutting our eyes upon the immense proportion of our revenue derived from this source, excluding from our estimate two-thirds of the whole national income, flowing into the Treasury from our duties upon imports and tonnage, shall this Government, to favor a class of individuals who will not make the return of a single farthing to the Treasury, to compensate for the sacrifice proposed, do an act, the ultimate tendency of which will be to cripple our maritime strength? Every seaman that you deprive of his daily bread, and every merchantman that you send from your employment, inflicts an injury upon the commercial spirit and naval enterprise of this country. And is this the opportune juncture that gentlemen have selected to inflict such a blow on the naval service of their country? Have they already forgotten the numerous "deeds of noble daring," and the gallant achievements that have covered our Navy with a glory which the friends of that bulwark of our defence, trust, may be as lasting as it is unquestionably brilliant? Have they, before the sound has quite died upon their ears, forgotten that it is the dying echo of that thunder which reverberated across the Atlantic, and has dispelled the invincibility of the mistress of the ocean? Will they consent to be instrumental in bringing their country into that situation in which the verdant laurels with which their countrymen have so recently entwined the temples of our naval heroes, will wither and fade away? No! Such questions do equal injustice to the gratitude and magnanimous policy of this country. The legislative provisions of our Government speak a language on this subject, in perfect and delightful harmony with the undivided voice which is uttered from Maine to Florida.

Another danger, to which the present measure would expose this country, and one in which the Southern States have a deep and vital interest, would be the risk we incur by this system of exclusion, of driving Great Britain to countervailing measures, and inducing all other countries, with whom the United States have any considerable trading connexions, to resort to measures of retaliation. There are countries possessing vast capacities for the production of rice, of cotton, and of tobacco, to which England might resort, to supply herself. She might apply herself to Brazil, Bengal, and Egypt, for her cotton: to South America, as well as her colonies, for her tobacco; and to China and Turkey for her rice. And is there any one, who knows the vigilance and jealousy with which that nation watches over her commerce and her manufactures, who can for a moment doubt, that any measures adopted by this country, extending to either of them, would arouse her spirit, and induce her to retaliate in a manner that we should the most sensibly feel?

The merchants and ship-owners, who at present contribute so largely to the amount of our Treasury receipts, ought not, without great deliberation, to be placed under heavy burdens. The nature of the occupation of this portion of our fellow-citizens and the theatre of their enterprise are such as to exclude them from their full share of the sympathies of their countrymen. While the spirit of adventure carries them to distant latitudes, and exposes them to all the perils of the deep, they are rarely, if ever, brought to mind by their friends and acquaintances at home.

"Their march is on the mountain wave,
Their home is on the deep."

While far removed from the scenes of our daily intercourse, from their families and firesides, they, under an angry sky, buffet the rude storms of Winter, and hazard their lives for the treasures of other climes, which they bring to their native shores, the mass of their fellow-citizens are safe in the pursuit of less hazardous occupations at home, and never dream of the frightful dangers that surround them.

If, at any time, equinoctial storms bring fear and anxiety to the breasts of any, it is to but two classes of our people. The one of them is composed of individuals whose losses, by such visitations of Providence, may be estimated in dollars and cents. The other is composed of humbler sufferers, who, when the spirit of the storm is wailing around their dwelling, are disquieted, not for their own sakes, but for the safety of him whose enterprise feeds them with their daily bread, and whose sole dependence on him may, with him, be whelmed in one common ruin "in the deep bosom of the ocean." These anxieties are intense, but they scarcely ever transcend the small but sacred circle of the family fireside. They are unknown and unfelt by the great mass of the community.

We ought, under existing circumstances, to look with an equal, if not with a jealous and parental eye, upon the claim which this class of our people has upon the regard and protection of their Government. That prayer which its divine Author intended for the guidance of all mankind, and which says, "Lead us not into temptation," ought not to be overlooked in what we propose to do in reference to this class of our citizens. They ought not to be placed in that situation in which they should be tempted to lead themselves to the practice of smuggling. We ought to touch with exceeding great caution the interests of that portion of the community who, from the immense contributions they have already made, and from the enormous exactions which are now yearly and monthly made of them, have no reason to suppose that they enjoy a monopoly of the public favor of this country. Let us beware how we adopt a measure which, in reference to the whole of this enterprising class of our citizens, and to nearly one half of all this Union, may emphatically be said to be against public opinion. We all know the lamentable consequences which flow from a measure which thus violates public sentiment; which arrays, on the one side, our long settled habits, affections, judgments, and prejudices, if you please, against what, on the other? Nothing more nor less than your isolated, unsupported, parchment law! Experience as well as reason point to the introduction of the profligate practice of smuggling, and the general demoralizing effects of it on the mercantile community, as the twofold mischief which may be expected to be realized in this country, as the first fruits of this project. And let no one pretend to say, that the extent to which the practice of smuggling may be introduced, will not be such as will be seriously felt on our finances. Remember the strong feelings and cherished interests which the passage of this law will violate. Recollect that those feelings are deep rooted, because they spring up in the minds of those who entertain them from a consciousness that they have already contributed more than their proportionate share towards bearing the public burdens. And, sir, when all these things are considered, let it not excite the wonder of any one if many of our merchants, believing their rights to be disregarded, and acting under the impulse of exasperated feeling, and a sense of justice denied them, should not weigh, with the most scrupulous nicety, the morality or immorality of the means they employed to pursue their accustomed trade and enrich themselves.

The history of this country shows that the mercantile part of it are not deficient in that sagacity and foresight which have immemorially distinguished men of the same pursuit, in every part of the world. We know that they calculate the mischief of a measure which affects them by the rules of a very different arithmetic from that which gives to them the list of balances on their ledger, and ascertains for them the amount of their profits. They look to the principle of every thing, and scan with a jealous eye the unborn mischief which its operations may bring forth. While yet every thing presents the exterior of calm and of quietness, they, with a keenness of vision little short of the spirit of prophecy, penetrate into the future, and survey, with a solicitude which their magnitude could alone inspire, all the accumulated and monstrous evils of actual undisguised oppression.

The fate which present appearances authorize us to believe may await this measure, ought to induce its friends to urge it with great caution. The geographical line which separates its friends from its enemies, shows that, in a large portion of this country, there is but one opinion on this subject. That opinion has been very distinctly expressed. Ought not this circumstance to make the Committee pause before they lend the sanction of law to a measure which would, as to this portion of the Union, be registered on our statute book as a dead letter? The demoralizing effects of a law which would thus remain perpetually a memorial of its own impotence, ought, above all others, in this country, to be carefully avoided. In this Republic, where the representative system seems destined to give a practical refutation to all the calumnies which disappointed politicians in other parts of the world have lavished upon it, and where every measure which receives the sanction of law ought to be just, equal, and efficient in its operation, there ought not to be found a single statute whose operation was paralyzed by the public opinion which it outraged.

Mr. C. said, that all that he had thus far said, was against the spirit and in opposition to the abstract policy of the bill, without looking to what was proposed to be done in detail. Indeed, so much had been already said on the various items of the bill, that he would not take up the time of the Committee with any analysis of it. Mr. C. wished that, by this nearer view of the subject—that by tracing the probable operation of the different provisions of the bill—he could discover any thing which would quiet the apprehensions of that portion of the country from which he came. A closer and more steadfast inspection of its contents was not at all calculated to dispel the alarm it had excited. It looks with an angry aspect to the South. All that this portion of the country can expect from its operation, will be punishment and unrequited suffering.

If, Mr. Chairman, a stranger, wholly unacquainted with the operations of our Government, alike ignorant of the history and of the policy of this country, could by accident be a listener to the present debate, he would conclude that the manufacturing industry of this country (if indeed any could be supposed to remain in it) was, if not most cruelly persecuted, at least most shamefully neglected by the Government; and that starvation and bankruptcy were threatening thousands of our people, without the possibility of their escape, except through the slow and grudging aid of legislative interference; and that, while this unhappy portion of our citizens were thus struggling with poverty and neglect, the Government was most unwisely and unjustly lavishing every species of munificence on the residue of its citizens. How would this conclusion coincide with the fact? How would such a person be astonished to learn that the very men who are now venting their complaints against the illiberality of Government, are the very men who, from time to time, in the short period of our history, have received protection to the full amount of their demands? And many manufacturing capitalists are now receiving from their capital, where that capital has been managed with ordinary care and skill, profits far exceeding the most profitable agricultural capital of the country.

Yes, the plain truth is, that this Government is unjustly charged with a want of liberality towards the manufacturing part of the community. For the protection of such manufactures as it is essentially the interest of it to promote and encourage, the duties are already sufficiently high.

Upwards of thirty years ago, a distinguished statesman of this country, (Mr. Hamilton,) whose views, in relation to its finances, were never thought to be chargeable with a want of energy, recommended a tariff of duties averaging from seven to eight per cent. ad valorem, as being in his opinion, abundantly sufficient to protect our domestic manufactures, and to draw forth and energize all the internal resources of the country; and whoever will consider, for a moment, the immense natural advantages which this country presents for such manufactures, abounding as it does in every variety of soil, in every variety of mineral, and of ores, in every variety of water power, to be applied either to the purposes of transportation, or to be used for propelling machinery, cannot feel the least wonder that such a protection should, at that time, have been thought abundantly adequate. And has the American Government listened to the wise counsels of this distinguished member of her cabinet? It has. And has fulfilled, to the fullest extent, his recommendation. The duties that have been imposed, from time to time, since the period of his advice, have more than trebled what he recommended. And I repeat it, said Mr. C., that whoever will consider for himself the exuberant redundancy with which this country produces all the raw materials that can compose our domestic manufactures of every kind—whoever will cast his eye at the same time upon the map and upon the tariff of the United States, and contemplate the immense distance which separates us from all foreign competition, must inevitably come to the conclusion, that, if our manufactories have not already arrived to that degree of perfection which their most sanguine friends could desire, their backwardness is to be imputed to very different causes, from the want of protection.

A nearer view of our manufacturing establishments themselves, will conduct us to the same conclusion. What is their present condition? Mr. C. said he would not pretend, (as he lacked the necessary information,) to go into a minute and detailed history of the manufactures of this country. But a brief outline of some of the most prominent of them would convince any unprejudiced mind that the repeated complaints that had been heard on this subject, were destitute of any foundation.

The manufacture of iron, in many departments of it, has been already attended with complete success. Many utensils of great and general use, made of this material, have long since acquired their utmost degree of perfection. The history of many of these manufactures shows that their success has not depended on extravagant legislative protection. For, sir, long before the protecting duty, designed for their encouragement, had reached its utmost limit, the ingenuity of the American artist had outstripped the bounty of his Government, and reached perfection.

The manufacture of cotton goods in the Eastern States has been attended with a success which has surpassed the expectations of the most sanguine friends of domestic manufactures. Wherever common prudence and skill have been exercised, capitalists who have embarked in this business have derived an annual profit from their investments, averaging from fifteen to twenty per cent. In some establishments their occasional profits have considerably exceeded that rate. Already have their fabrics become an article of export to foreign markets. If these facts be not regarded as a sufficient evidence of the prosperity of this branch of American manufactures, Mr. C. said he was at a loss to know what proof gentlemen would ask. If such profits be not sufficient to satisfy their desires, Congress might exhaust in vain the treasury of the nation to glut their cupidity.

Our manufactures of glass ware have succeeded. Large establishments for this manufacture are now in prosperous operation at Boston, New York, and Pittsburg. Besides these, there are many minor factories scattered through the Northern and Eastern States, of whose profits and situation I cannot speak.

Our woollen factories, although they have not been crowned with the same success that has attended the cotton factories, have yet come far short of encountering an entire failure. Their progress will bear flattering comparison with the incipient stage of similar manufactures in other countries. And some explanation may be given to the uneasiness and discontent which this portion of our manufacturers have manifested, by calling to mind the fact that they have been reared up, and have had their day in the immediate vicinity of their more fortunate and flourishing sister factories of cotton. Incorporated, as they are, with each other, in point of location, it is quite natural that the daily contemplation of the superior success of the one, should fill the other with murmuring and despondency. But the actual intrinsic condition of the manufacture itself, ought not to be taken as the entire cause of the complaints we hear. Permit me, said Mr. C. to read, for the information of the Committee, a statement of the manufacture of flannel in this country, which has met my eye during this discussion.

[Here Mr. C. read from a newspaper, showing the progress of the flannel manufactories in Boston and its vicinity.]

Nothing in this short review of the condition of our manufactures can more conclusively show that they are not in a languishing condition, than that many of them are receiving the high profits which have been mentioned. And while it shows the fact that their condition is not a languishing one, it does not the less unanswerably show that their progress must, in this country, as it has been in all others, be gradual. For, notwithstanding the acknowledged profit which some of our manufactories yield, we see that capital is slowly vested in them. Since it is the nature of capital, as well as of industry, to seek their most profitable occupation, how can this apparent phenomenon be accounted for? Unquestionably, it is to be traced to no other cause than to the situation of the country. The habits of our people have received a different direction. Their industry has found employments in channels that are more accordant to their genius. And as long as these causes continue to operate, it is in vain to expect to legislate our manufactures into a premature unnatural prosperity. You cannot by legislative enactments, outstrip the course of events. You cannot even attempt it, without running the risk of doing more injury than benefit, to the interest you would promote.

It is worthy of remark, in the present outcry which is made for protection against the ruinous effects of foreign competition, that the interests of large moneyed capitalists is distinctly to be traced. Amidst the general swell of complaint with which we are assailed their voice is plainly to be heard. While they are besieging Congress with their importunities, the laboring crowds which fill their manufacturing houses are working on in silence and contentment. They are not to be benefited by the bounty which is asked. The wages of this numerous class of our citizens are not to receive a proportionate increase. They are still to remain the humble but productive instruments of pampering the pride and augmenting the wealth of their lordly and avaricious masters. Thus, the evident and direct tendency of this measure is to confer upon moneyed capital unequal advantages, and to raise up, in the bosom of our country, where we have so long boasted of our equal rights and privileges, and of the unsophisticated simplicity of our manners, a haughty, dominant spirit of aristocracy. Of the effects of such a spirit, Mr. C. said, it was needless that he should speak to such an assembly. Suffice it to say, that, in no country has it ever appeared without changing and disfiguring the face of society. And there is no country under the sun where its first appearance should be more earnestly deprecated and carefully avoided than in our own.

Some gentlemen still believe, that, notwithstanding the complaints that are heard from the South, that the present pressure of the times is most sorely experienced in the Northern States. This is a matter of evidence, and can be determined only by observation. Let any one who entertains such an opinion traverse for himself the extensive fertile regions of New York. Let him behold the diversified and thriving industry of her population; her commerce externally and internally flourishing; her agriculture abundant; her villages, which have recently sprung up, as if by magic, in thick profusion, through all her borders, filled with "the busy hum of active men;" her laborious and contented yeomanry, scattered over a thousand hills, and cultivating innumerable farms, which they have reclaimed but yesterday from the wilderness—all bound together, cheered and animated by a canal, whose extensive and increasing benefits can be equalled only by the splendor of the public spirit which has achieved it. And, when he has surveyed this happy portion of his country, progressing eastward, let him behold the patient and systematic industry of New England, content with the certain annual rewards of her toils, growing rich under the combined operation of a lucrative foreign commerce and improved domestic manufactures. And when he has finished this survey, let him turn his eyes to the South, and see if he can avoid being struck with the contrast which all this region presents to that which I have just now sketched. In the South, the prostration of their foreign markets has spread over the face of the country a general, pervading gloom. In all that region which stretches itself from the shores of the Potomac to the Gulf of Mexico, where all the arts of civilized life once triumphed, the arm of industry is now paralyzed. Large and ample estates, once the seats of opulence, which supported their proprietors in affluence and comfort, are now thrown out to waste and decay. And this is the country (will gentlemen believe it while it is uttered?) which it is sought to make tributary to that which, if not already abundantly prosperous, is at least exempt from that general distress which presses upon the South!

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, after all that has been said on this subject, there are no rules which can be derived from the history of other nations in regard to the policy of encouraging any specific sort of industry which can have any correct application in ours. In the first place, the organization of our Government, and the materials of our society, are essentially different from theirs. In the second place, the abundance and cheapness of our lands must, for a long series of years to come, render the habits and pursuits of our citizens essentially agricultural. While such fields for speculation and enterprise are open in the West, the tide of emigration must continue to set in that direction. And there is no circumstance which can be adduced more clearly to show the natural bias of the human mind to agricultural pursuits than that, ever since the settlement of the Western country, it has operated as a constant annual drain upon the population of the Atlantic States.

Why is it, sir, since the cotton factories of New England have got into successful operation, and offer such strong temptations to avarice, that we find no emigrant from the South going thither to embark his fortunes in any of them? The answer is to be found in the condition of our country, and the character of our people. The present generation must pass away before such a spectacle will be witnessed in this country. Just as soon, said Mr. C., would he expect to see an aboriginal inhabitant coming from beyond the mountains, deserting his native wilderness, and seeking his happiness amidst all the splendid accommodations and luxurious habits of civilized life.

Mr. C. said, he would say nothing about the demoralizing effects of a general introduction of the manufacturing system. For, notwithstanding he believed it fairly exposed to this objection, he had great consolation in believing that, whenever this mischief was seriously to be apprehended, it presupposed so extensive an introduction of the system already made, that he could not think there was much cause for alarm from this quarter. The objection would gather strength as the manufactures of the country became multiplied and enlarged. He was not afraid that the passage of the bill would suddenly convert the people of this country so much to manufactures that their morals would be ruined. We are yet hardly removed from our starting point in the great orbit we are destined to describe; and nothing could be more idle than to suppose that any vote which we may give on the question before us would have such a transforming effect upon the character of the American people. Ages must yet pass away before we can expect to see a Manchester or a Birmingham on this side the Atlantic, except they be scattered at great distances from each other.

Another objection, which is entitled to great weight in determining this question, is the tendency of the policy which dictates it to perpetuate itself. When you have once yielded to it, you are under a moral necessity for continuing it. Such has been the result of the experiment wherever it has been made. This year, one class of your citizens present themselves before you, and appeal to you for protection. You hear them, and grant their request. The second year, another class, observing the listening ear which Government lends to such applications, are encouraged to prefer their claims. They succeed, and obtain the passage of a law for their special benefit. The third year opens the way for still a third class, who fortify themselves on equally strong ground, and make their appeal to your justice or your liberality with equal success. Thus, all these laws, from their peculiar nature, being designed to operate upon improper subjects, produce consequences which were at first wholly unforeseen. These unexpected consequences, in their turn, beget the necessity of new legislative enactments. In this way you progress to an indefinite length, filling up your statute book with explanatory, supplemental, and amendatory acts, until you literally lose yourself in a maze of legislation.

Conduct like this has no just parallel, except in that of a man whose disordered health has been produced by the indiscreet use of remedies whose frequent repetition has established their dominion over him, and while they impose upon him the necessity of a ceaseless routine of medicine, render it perfectly certain that his health can never be entirely restored.

This is a policy unbecoming the destinies of our rising and spreading Republic. I do not, said Mr. C., wish to see this country, by this kind of political quackery, enervating and destroying all the wholesome and natural energies of her physical constitution. I am unwilling to see her taking such uncommon pains to superinduce upon herself, before their time, all the infirmities of old age. Such artificial stimulants as the present only suit the decline of life.

Our situation is a peculiar one. It involves us in high responsibilities. In every step we take, in the development of our future destinies, we should ponder with the utmost caution and most solemn deliberation. We are under obligations of the most sacred character, not only to the present generation, who are looking from every quarter of this Union, with the utmost solicitude, to the issue of our present deliberations, but to unborn millions who will yet live to experience the fruits of this measure.

Let the course of policy we adopt be what it may, we ought not to look with too steadfast an eye upon the history of any other nation. We ought not, especially, to gaze with too partial a fondness on the example of Great Britain. That nation, it is true, has extended the most munificent encouragement to the mechanic arts, and has fostered, with peculiar favor, her manufactures; and she has, also, enjoyed more than her proportionate share of wealth and fame in the great family of nations. But it does not, by any means, follow, as some gentlemen seem to imagine, that the last has been the result of the former. If we are to derive any instruction from the example of Great Britain, on this subject, it is, that we should interfere as little as possible with the industry and pursuits of our citizens. At a period when her most sagacious statesmen, as well as her most approved writers upon political economy, unite in expressing their regret at the extent to which that nation has embarrassed herself with such regulations, shall we shut our eyes upon the lesson which her example teaches? Such regulations were never adopted by Great Britain through choice. The rivalry and jealousy of neighboring States forced her to their adoption. And, because she has been wise and adroit enough to make a virtue of necessity, and to turn to the best account the very disadvantages with which she had to contend, shall we, with the vain hope that, peradventure, equal good fortune may await us, blindly imitate her example? I cannot believe that any gentlemen are disposed to indulge themselves in such hazardous speculations on the future welfare of their country.

There is another peculiarity in our situation. We have, in the same hemisphere with ourselves, embryo republics springing into political being. There are, in South America, materials, in soil and population, for great and extensive States. They are rising into political being at a period of the world peculiarly auspicious for the formation of wise governmental institutions. Their importance has already attracted the eyes of the civilized world. The immense advantages which may grow out of their future trading connexion, have already excited the jealousy of certain European Powers. And, while our near neighbors are esteemed of so much value in the commercial alliance they may form with nations almost on the opposite side of the globe from them, shall we, in their immediate vicinity, remain indifferent to the influence they may exert upon our future destiny? These circumstances ought rather to incline us to a favorable consideration of the friendly and commercial connexions which may, hereafter, subsist between us.

In taking an enlarged view of the situation of our country, and of the policy to which it ought to direct us, it ought not to be forgotten that we are surrounded on all sides by the ocean. Look to what quarter of the horizon you will, and your eye meets an immeasurable waste of waters. What ought this circumstance to intimate to the statesman, who, like the immortal Edmund Burke, believed that the situation of every nation, like that of every individual, ought to be the preceptor of their duty? Would he not infer from it that the same munificent Providence that had blessed our happy country with such unexampled abundance at home, had thrown around us this circumambient world of waters to invite us to transport the fruits of our soil to every region of the earth? Yes sir, it is our duty to beware how we fetter and restrain the spirit of commerce. That, if possible, ought to be left free as the wind of heaven that wafts it on the bosom of the deep. Let us take heed how we legislate our wharves, which are now populous and cheerful, into silent but impressive monuments of the commerce that has deserted them. Mr. C. said, he did not wish to see the flag of American commerce floating to the idle wind in our harbors. He wanted to see it visiting ocean's furthest shore, and returning home with the fruits, the treasures, and the riches of every clime. He wanted to see it extending its peaceful conquest over every sea, and as much respected in every quarter of the globe, for the skill of our sailors and the enterprise of our merchants, as it confessedly is for the heroism which so lately defended it in war. Trophies, won in this way, will contribute largely to the happiness, the wealth, and the power of this country. And, although they may not hold up, in such a bright relief, a few ambitious spirits who thirst for military conquest, will, when they are collected together by the future historian, constitute the most emphatic eulogium which can be pronounced upon the wisdom that has guided the councils of this nation.

When Mr. CARTER had concluded—

The question being put on Mr. ISACKS' amendment, was decided in the negative—ayes 72, noes 96.

Mr. GAZLAY moved to report the bill as amended, but, before the question was taken, Mr. McKIM offered an amendment laying a duty on certain articles of morocco leather. The amendment was rejected, only 40 rising in its favor.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, then moved to amend the duty on iron, by reducing it from one dollar and twelve cents to ninety cents. A motion was made to rise—ayes 87, noes 96.

Mr. CLARK then supported his motion by a speech, but gave way, at half-past 4 o'clock, for a motion to rise.

The Committee rose accordingly, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 6.

Mr. COCKE from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was recommitted a bill "for the appointment of two assistant Indian agents," reported the same with amendments.

Mr. C. explained the amendments, with the circumstances which had led to their insertion; when the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Firman Le Sieur," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANKIN, from the same committee, to which was referred, on the 29th ultimo, a memorial of inhabitants of St. Augustine, reported a bill to authorize the Territory of Florida to open a canal through the public lands, to unite the river St. John's with the Bay of St. Augustine; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill to authorize the State of Indiana to open a canal through the public lands, to connect the navigation of the rivers Wabash and the Miami of Lake Erie.

Mr. WARFIELD laid the following resolution on the table for consideration to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be submitted to this House a statement of the several purchases of real estate in behalf of the United States, within the territorial limits of any State, since the 4th day of July, 1776, in pursuance of any act of Congress, or by any department or officer of the General Government, denoting in each case the particular authority under which each purchase was made, its date, and the end or use for which it was effected; the nature of the estate thereby acquired, and the person or persons by whom, and to whom, such estate was conveyed, together with the fact whether such purchase was or was not accompanied with the express consent of the State of whose territory such real estate constituted a part; and, in the former case, whether any, and if any, what, special jurisdiction accompanied the cession or conveyance.

The resolution offered heretofore by Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, fixing a time for the adjournment of the House being taken up; after some observations from Messrs. TON and EDWARDS, of North Carolina, it was laid on the table—ayes 93, noes 68.

Mr. RANDOLPH gave notice, that, having been prevented, by indisposition, from calling up his resolution respecting an alteration in the compensation of members of this House, he should call up the same on Saturday next.

On motion of Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of granting relief to such persons, purchasers of the public lands, lying between Ludlow's and Roberts' lines, in the State of Ohio, as are liable to be evicted from the same, on the principles of a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, made at their last term, in the case of Doddridge against Wright and others, and the committee had leave to report by bill or otherwise. Mr. VANCE, Mr. RANKIN, Mr. LATHROP, Mr. BEECHER, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. ARCHER, and Mr. SAUNDERS, were appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

On motion of Mr. SAUNDERS, the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire into the propriety of allowing William Clefstan compensation for certain losses sustained by him in consequence of the impressment of his wagon and team, for the transportation of a part of the North Carolina militia to Norfolk during the late war.

On motion of Mr. BURLEIGH, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the laws now in force giving a bounty to vessels of certain descriptions employed in the cod fishery, to vessels of the same description employed in the mackerel fishery.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, viz:

1st. An act to provide for the extinguishment of the debt due to the United States by the purchasers of the public lands;

2d. An act to change the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States, in the State of Ohio, and one of the terms of the circuit court in the district of Kentucky;

3d. An act supplementary to the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt,'" in which bills the Senate ask the concurrence of the House.

The said bills were, respectively, read twice, and referred, the first to the Committee on Public Lands; the second to the Committee on the Judiciary; the third to the same committee.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole on the bill to amend the several acts laying duties upon imports.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, had moved to reduce the duty on iron from one dollar and twelve cents to ninety cents per hundred weight.

In support of this amendment, he said, that, after the very protracted debate on this bill, it could not be expected he would trespass on the patience of the Committee by going very fully into the discussion of the subject. Indeed, said he, the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) by the very able manner in which he has dwelt upon this particular part of it, has left little more to be said. I believe, sir, most firmly, that no additional duty ought to be laid on iron; but, since the Committee have decided against striking it out altogether, I have thought proper to try their opinion on a moderate increase, one which will be less burdensome and oppressive on the industry of the country. I do not doubt that manufacturers of this article, who have good ore near navigable waters, and other conveniences for carrying on their business, can, with proper economy, make it profitable and productive under the present rates of duties. And if others cannot, it is because they have not those advantages, or do not observe the same economy. I have, sir, a statement in my possession, which I received from a respectable source, giving, in detail, all the items of expense in making a ton of iron. This statement I believe to be sufficiently correct, and to contain at least as high rates of labor, &c., as the present prices.

From this statement, sir, it appears that no branch of business in our country is carried on with more profit to those engaged in it, (I mean of the description I have mentioned,) nor with more certainty of success; and any further protection would only be giving them enormous profits. [Mr. C. here read the detailed statement, by which it appeared that the expense of making a ton of iron was only $63 60.] From the price current, it appears the price of this article, now in our market, is from $81 to $83 a ton. So that the profits, at this rate, are from $17 40 to $19 40 a ton. Here, sir, is an ample profit, and one that offers better encouragement than almost any other branch of business in the country. I am aware, sir, that this will not apply to more than one-third of our iron factories—that the others labor under disadvantages of various kinds, and probably even with the proposed duty would find no protection. Increase your duties, sir, so as to shut out all imported iron from the country, and those who now really require the protection, would find themselves undersold in the market by their more fortunate competitors, and would as much need protection against them as the importers.

But, sir, if all these considerations were obviated, and none of the objections I have enumerated existed, I should still be opposed to this duty from other considerations. I would oppose burdening this article with heavy duties, because such a measure would be at war with the general objects of the bill.

What is that object, sir? It is the encouragement of the agricultural and manufacturing interests of the country. This bill proposes to load with additional duties one of the staple necessities of both these employments. You also profess, by this bill, to give encouragement and employment to industry. By stopping the importation of it, you drive a large portion of the navigating interest from their usual and accustomed habits of industry; you subject them to poverty and ultimate ruin; you increase the price of a necessary material of nearly every manufacturer and every artisan; and, what is more than all, you are loading the farmers of the country with exactions—exactions which will bear upon and oppress them heavily.

Sir, I have said I would not advance, with this bill, a single step beyond what I believed to be for the interest of him who cultivates the soil; I still adhere rigidly to my determination; and nothing shall drive me from it. I vote for an increase of duty on woollen goods, because I believe it will make a market for wool; on molasses, because, as the importation of it is diminished, its place will be supplied with grain for distillation. But, when you propose a tax on this article, which will bear so heavily upon the farmer, and do so much to empty his pockets, I shall use my feeble efforts against it.

But, we have been told, in the course of this debate, that we must compel ourselves to make this article at home, in time of peace, because, in time of war, our commerce will be driven from the ocean, and our harbors locked up by the enemy. This case, so extreme, so improbable, and unlikely to happen, may, in the course of the strange vicissitudes that visit nations, ultimately be realized. But, sir, when such an event occurs, I trust the want of this article will be among the most tolerable of our sufferings.

Should we go to war with Russia, we could procure it from Sweden and all the rest of Europe. If with England, or Sweden, we could obtain it from Russia. Should our vessels be swept from the ocean, still, however, it would be brought to our ports with but a trifling increase of price.

Sir, I have made all the inquiry in my power, and I have not been able to ascertain that there are more than from five to six hundred of these factories in the United States. These are probably owned by from five to eight hundred individuals. It is for these individuals we are called upon to lay a burden on more than ten millions of people; to drive twenty times their numbers from their favorite pursuit, and involve thousands in ruin. I exhort gentlemen to pause and reflect before they take this broad step in the maze of inconsistency.

Let me not be told, that we are furnishing employment for a great mass of our citizens in carrying on each of these factories; for every one who has had any knowledge of this business must know, that their condition is not bettered by their employment. The workmen around them are generally the least enlightened, the most poor and degraded of any in our country. The employment of most of them is to cut down and make waste of timber, which, in many cases, is seriously to the detriment of the country around them.

Sir, in every point of view I have been able to look at this subject, I have arrived at the same conclusion. It will operate as an unjust and oppressive burden, from which you will ultimately be compelled to recede.

Mr. TOD, of Pennsylvania, in reply to Mr. CLARK, said he had flattered himself that one tedious debate, and one decision upon this item of iron, would have been sufficient, at any rate, in Committee of the Whole. I do not complain, but I must say that the disappointment is extremely mortifying, by a friend of the bill renewing a question in substance once settled—renewing it at this time, when it is evident that delay is destruction; and renewing it in such a manner—for I think the gentleman from New York made his motion, and, as soon as he rose to support it, moved for the Committee to rise. The Committee refused. In a very few minutes after, the gentleman from New York gives way, yields the floor to another member, to renew the motion for the Committee to rise, which motion succeeded, and brings us to the second day of the second debate, on a single item of a bill which has been before us now almost three months, and a decision upon which seems to be protracted to a length, perhaps unexampled in this or any other country.

Mr. TOD said, I blame no one, nor pretend to any right to dictate to any member what course he shall pursue; yet the gentleman from New York will excuse me for saying, that, dismayed as I am at the time and manner of his renewing this discussion, I am still more dismayed at his arguments. From our opponents, I can hear any thing without emotion; but the reasons given by the gentleman from New York strike me with a chill which I will not attempt to dissemble. The gentleman from New York supposes that only six or seven hundred iron masters are to be benefited by this duty. If he is right in that, then it would be true, that only the merchants are benefited by trade and navigation. But it must be a total mistake—the whole agricultural interest of our country is directly interested. The 40,000 tons of iron which we import, the two millions of dollars which we pay for it, only deprive our people of a market to that amount for their grain, beef, and pork, which articles, those governments which send us their iron will not suffer their people to touch, coming from us. Our opponents admit, that domestic industry ought to be protected when we are ripe for it, as the phrase is. Now, iron we are not only ripe for, but, some years ago, actually were in the way of fabricating, to the full amount of our own consumption. One object of the gentleman from New York appears to be, to mend the morals of our people by importing from Europe. To the workers in iron he has applied the epithets of poor and degraded. As to their poverty, it may be true enough. How can it be otherwise when their business is so reduced, and they cut out of three-fourths of it by foreign importations? "Degraded" is a term not applicable to such men. To be sure, there are many professions and occupations which appear more neat and genteel; they have leather aprons and blacked faces; but a great majority of them are not only laborious, but frugal and careful; and those who are thoughtless and imprudent, are yet almost invariably honest and manly. They love their country. Theirs is a robust and hard business; there is nothing in it degrading to body or mind. Sir, it has been said in this debate, some months ago, or in some other, I forget when—for there is one thing peculiarly lucky in this tariff discussion, that every thing said will bear repeating at least thrice, and still, with all the advantage and grace of novelty, having been forgotten from length of time—it has been said, or might have been said, that the iron workmen of Sweden, when nobles, and gentry, and farmers, and merchants and seamen, had submitted to foreign domination, collected together, and saved their country. It is notorious that, during the gloomiest times of the late war, and afterwards until Government thought fit to abolish the internal duties, there was no resource in our nation for men and money, superior to that of the iron works in the interior. If supported and protected, they will add more real strength and wealth to our country, than the cultivation here of all the cotton raised on this continent, and Egypt and Bengal put together, could possibly do; for this work is carried on by free labor, that by slaves. Before he sat down, Mr. T. said, he wished to relieve the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CLARK,) from his anxiety lest the iron works should consume all the wood; true, they do cut the wood from the hills; but equally true it is, that the wood invariably springs up again, and is ready for another cutting every twelve or fifteen years.

Mr. CLARK replied to Mr. TOD. He said, as to the fears and dismay expressed by the honorable chairman, he could only say, it was unnecessary for him to have disclosed them to the Committee at this time, since he was sure no gentleman would be turned from his course by such disclosure. Indeed, sir, I am not legislating, at this time, for the purpose of pleasing that gentleman. No, sir; I shall vote and act without reference to his opinions. If the gentleman supposes his appointment as chairman entitles him to direct all the friends of the bill in the course they are to pursue in its details, he is mistaken so far as relates to me. True, sir, I am in favor of a revision of the tariff; but it does not, therefore, follow that I am bound to support the whole of every provision the gentleman has chosen to insert in the bill. If that gentleman considers himself a sort of drill sergeant, to manoeuvre the friends of the tariff, I, for one, must beg to be excused from his discipline. Why, sir, all this complaint about the time I have taken to introduce this amendment? Are the Committee to be told at what time they shall stop amending the bill? I, for one, cannot recognise his right to such dictation.

The Tariff Bill.

But, says the gentleman, we have arrived at the second day of the second debate on this amendment. What then, sir? Is this such an appalling fact as to shake the gentleman's nerves? Surely, the case is no anomaly in legislation. The Committee decided, on a former motion, that they would not strike out the whole of the proposed increase; but does it follow that they will not reduce it? Sir, it was not until I learned that a number of its friends were anxious for this reduction that I proposed it. Indeed, sir, the decision of the question on striking out the whole was not very satisfactory to me. More than seventy members were out of the House, and the majority small. The result, however, will show whether I am correct.

The only answer I have to give to the gentleman's statement, that "two millions of specie are annually exported to pay for iron," is, to point him to the Treasury report of imports, exports, and tonnage, of the United States, where he may learn that, in the preceding year, less than thirty-three thousand tons of iron have been imported from all the world. That nearly all of it was brought from Russia and Sweden, and not a dollar of specie has been exported to either of those countries. On examination, he may also learn that no money is carried from this country to pay for iron, but that it is always purchased with such articles as we can easily spare, and such as we ought to dispose of. Sir, I said yesterday, and I say again to-day, that, as far as my observations have extended, the persons in the employ of iron masters, and their families, are less enlightened, more poor, and unhappy, than any other class of citizens among us; that this is the most undesirable of any employment in the country. I shall not, however, deny that a recruiting officer might fill up his ranks among them as quick as among any other people.

Sir, having made no allusions to "black faces and leather aprons" myself, I presume the gentleman did not mean what he said on that subject as an answer to my argument, but designed it for other purposes. Hoping, therefore, that it may have the desired effect, I shall leave him to enjoy the benefit that is to be derived from such reasoning.

Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, after making a few introductory remarks, on the course which had been pursued in the discussion of the details, as well as the general principles of the bill, which he reprehended as furnishing the most unequivocal tokens that its friends were about, if possible, to limit the freedom of debate, and force the bill into the House at a moment when several important amendments were about to be tried in committee—observed that, in rising to address the Committee, he could but be sensible of the serious embarrassments which awaited him in following, on the same side of the question, the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) who had greatly abridged, if he had not entirely exhausted, the topic before them; and whilst, Mr. H. said, he participated in the pleasure, which all had enjoyed, in hearing the unanswerable argument of that gentleman, (an argument that had scarcely left the honorable Speaker [Mr. CLAY] an inch of ground to stand upon, notwithstanding the vigor and elasticity of his genius,) he should endeavor to avoid a repetition of any of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, however difficult the task, when speaking on the subject. If, however, he could glean a single topic which had not been gathered in the abundant harvest which had crowned the efforts of that gentleman, he should regard his own exertions as not absolutely useless and unimportant.

Mr. H. said he hoped that, in his reply to the honorable Speaker, he would offer some atonement for the trespass he was now about to make on the patience of the Committee, when he informed them that, at least in reference to those parts of the gentleman's argument in which he sustained himself by the force of British authority, that he would meet him by English doctrine, also; and he undertook to affirm that, notwithstanding the ingenuity with which these authorities had been used, there was more to be found in British precept and example to admonish us to avoid the policy which the honorable Speaker was desirous of forcing upon his country, than the reverse.

And here, at the very outset, Mr. H. said, he would take occasion to remark that, if Adam Smith (an authority, by the way, much contemned by a certain school of political economists in this enlightened age and country) could have risen from his grave, and heard some of the extraordinary opinions of the honorable Speaker, this worthy old philosopher would indeed have believed that the world, ever since his exit from it, had been in a slumber as profound as that which had visited his own tomb. He would have thought, with good reason, that all those anticipations of the progress of truth, and the consequent extirpation of error, which he had cherished in a generous love of his species, had indeed been the idle dreams of a foolish and vain philosophy—for he would have met here the very dogmas of that school of restriction and monopoly which it had been the chief business of his valuable life to refute and overthrow. But there would have been in reservation for him, one astounding circumstance for which he would have been altogether unprepared—and that is, to have heard the pathetically and poetically drawn pictures of the present distress and debility of our country attributed to the freedom of our trade, and the overflowing abundance of our agriculture! However much the narrative of these diseases, and their causes, might have surprised him, the catholicon which is proposed for their cure, would have been more a subject for his especial wonder and speculation—a remedy which embraces in their most potent combination, the old and exploded ingredients of monopoly and restriction. But, Mr. H. said, his business was rather with the living than with the dead. Before, however, he dismissed this branch of the subject, he would say, if we were disposed to throw aside, as refuse lumber, all that had been written by this great man, on a subject to which he had brought a philosophic spirit, enlightened by the most extraordinary endowment of intellect, formed by the most propitious opportunities for observation, and warmed by as enlarged a philanthropy as ever animated the human breast, it would be well to advert, for one moment, to the past, and even present, situation of our country, in reference to the great resources of its productive wealth. If the tree was to be judged by its fruits; it might be inquired how it was that, in spite of our deplorable fatuity and blindness, in running counter to the favorite maxims of this school of restriction, this country should have prospered, and still prospers, beyond all example. Yes, sir, it might well be asked, if high or prohibitory duties on imports are essential to the proper development of the industry of a nation, how it comes to pass that, within the ordinary duration of the life of man, we may be said to have built up an empire of such vast power, and possessing, within itself, such varied resources of wealth and happiness.

Serious distrust must be entertained of any scheme, having for its objects a diversion of the capital and labor of the country, when we look about us, from one end of this continent to the other, and see so many monuments of what the enterprise of our people had effected in the ordinary channels in which it had been employed; and, if one or two of these memorials of the industry of our people were selected, they would be amply sufficient for the argument, without a more comprehensive collection. If it were desirable to see what the commerce of the country was capable of effecting, a reference to New York and Boston would satisfy this inquiry. There might be seen the rise of cities, the rapidity of whose progress is without a parallel, in ancient or modern times. If it was necessary to ascertain what sort of wonders the results of agriculture could achieve, it is only requisite to turn to the West, and, within the period measured by the contemporary recollection of the youngest of us, to see a wilderness subdued, a vast and intelligent population created and sustained by the prolific treasures of the earth. It might indeed be seen, that, since the peace of '82, by the conjoint operation of commerce and agriculture, seven millions had been added to our population, eleven States to the Confederacy, innumerable tracts of fertile territory brought into successful culture, and, in spite of all that had been said, a vast and almost incalculable sum added to the active capital of the country.

Before, therefore, we acquiesce in the necessity of changing the existing employment of capital, in our country, which has confessedly done so much for us, there are a few salutary truths, which, however old-fashioned they may be, it may not be unimportant to notice.

One of the first of these is, that the production of a country must depend on its capital and labor, and that the latter bears a just proportion to the degree of skill and industry with which the former may be employed; now it follows as a fair corollary from these principles, that labor and capital, if left to their own direction, will always seek, and find, their most prosperous exercise and investment, and that this may be safely confided to the sagacity of individuals who, by a law of nature, invariable in its operation, will pursue that department of industry which promises to yield either immediately or ultimately the greatest profit. Thus it is, in the words of a popular author, that, "whenever any thing is to be made by a particular employment of industry, it wants no encouragement; where there is nothing to be made, it deserves none."

We may, at least, be certain of one fact, that no divine alchemy has been revealed to us, that we can, at pleasure, produce wealth, by legislating an alteration in the pursuits of our people. We may, it is true, disturb the ordinary operations of labor, and increase the profits of a given branch of industry; but, as the whole of our society must make up its aggregate account of profit and loss, what is added to one class as profit, in the way of encouragement, must be taken from the other, in the way of a tax and consequent loss. To conclude this part of the inquiry, if there is any truth which appears to be sustained by experience, it is, that the only consequence resulting from the interference of Government in the employment of labor and capital, is to give to them an artificial distribution, and to coerce them into less profitable pursuits, than if left to be disposed of and controlled by their natural owners, who are most sensible of their value, most responsible for their use, and have the greatest immediate interest in their successful employment.

These remarks, Mr. H. said, he made without indulging in any spirit of hostility to the domestic manufactures of the country, and that he was prepared to admit that they were to be encouraged precisely to the extent, and no further, than this encouragement was not calculated to discourage the other great sources of the productive industry of the country. And here he would take occasion to say that the imposition of the duties on imports for the purpose of revenue, furnished in all a reasonable, and in many a high rate of encouragement, to which, if were added the incidental charges on importations, and with which the foreign article was almost exclusively burdened, the manufactures received all the protection to which they were in justice entitled, and all that the country could afford to pay. When, therefore, the gentlemen who were in favor of the scheme of immense taxation, involved in the bill on the table, were so regardless of the past, and so perfectly gratuitous in their assumption of facts, as to found their arguments on the basis that there was no sort of protection, except to a few favored articles, they must be prepared to say that an average duty of nearly twenty-five per cent. on the consumption of the country was nothing, or to admit that there was something so incurably defective in the manufactures of the country, that nothing short of prohibition, or the exclusion of all foreign competition, could furnish a fair return for their productions, or force them into an unnatural existence.

The opinions of the former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Alexander Hamilton, have been much relied on, and his celebrated report on manufactures (unquestionably a very able and ingenious State paper) has been quoted, but often with a gross perversion of the scope of the argument of that great statesman. Great as was his admiration, said Mr. H., of the talents of this statesman, he was not prepared to take his opinions on this subject, or that of Government, without some qualification and limit. General Hamilton was a contemporary of the younger Pitt, and they may have been said to have been, at the same time, prime ministers of their respective countries. It is perfectly obvious that General Hamilton rather looked to the practice of Pitt, (whom he resembled in the grandeur of genius,) than to the writings of Adam Smith, and the French economists. His opinions came, therefore, from the mintage of the restrictive, exclusive, and jealous systems of trade and finance, which, in spite of the occasional theories of Pitt, oppressed his whole scheme of Government. But, as clear and emphatic as Mr. Hamilton was in his report, he could have formed no conception of the extent to which his doctrines would be pushed, by his present avowed disciples, who have attempted, with singular injustice, to give currency to their schemes of violent taxation and oppressive monopoly, by the authority of his name. As the present question is one of figures, perhaps the best answer to the inquiry of what sort of encouragement Mr. Hamilton deemed necessary for the development of the manufacturing capacities of the country, would be given, by comparing the rates of duties which he proposed, with those in the bill now under the consideration of the Committee. Mr. H. said he would now advert to a few of these items.

We will begin first with an article of universal use and importance—nails—on which Mr. Hamilton proposed placing an import duty of two cents per pound; by the bill on your table this duty is raised to five cents per pound. Fire-arms and military weapons he rated at 15 per cent. ad valorem; you have raised it to 25 or 30 per cent. Manufactures of steel generally, on which he proposed a duty of 7½ per cent., the bill on your table has raised variously, from 25 to 100 per cent. Articles of copper and brass, which he arranged at an ad valorem duty of ten per cent., are now placed in the tariff under consideration, at a rate of duty as exorbitantly advanced as that on articles manufactured of steel and iron. He recommended a duty of two cents per gallon on imported spirits, of the first class of proof; the duty now proposed is fixed at 38 cents. Articles of which hemp is the component part, he puts down at 10 per cent. ad valorem; your bill provides that they should be variously burdened with a duty from 30 to 140 per cent. Mr. H. said he would not fatigue the Committee by any further enumeration, which, if extended throughout all the classes of articles embraced in General Hamilton's report, would be found to sustain the great difference of opinion which existed between that gentleman and his self-created disciples, as to what might be deemed a fair protection to the domestic industry of the country, and what was in fact a system of undisguised prohibition. But there is one point on which this statesman is at least fairly at issue with the advocates of the proposed tariff. General Hamilton certainly looked rather to an ultimate reduction of the duties on imports, after domestic competition had been brought fairly into operation, than that these duties should be progressively increased; and it was an emphatic maxim of his, that, if an article required repeated and continued bounties and duties to nourish its production, it was a proof that the country was not prepared for its manufacture, and that it was unwise to attempt to force it into a precarious and labored existence. When these two opinions of this great man are taken in connexion with the cardinal principles with which he sets out, that the raw materials of manufactures should be generally admitted free of duty, it will be obvious that his opinions have been grossly perverted, by being pushed to an extremity which he never did or never could have contemplated.

The true question, however, submitted, is not whether the results of manufacturing labor be profitable or advantageous to the country or not, (for there is no man so silly as to dispute so obvious a truth;) but whether this or any other species of labor was, in a Government like ours, to be fostered by a scheme of partial legislation, operating as a bounty on the one hand, and a tax on the other? To this system there was a variety of objections, some of which Mr. H. said he had endeavored to prove were applicable to principle itself, and some to the specific details of the bill. Mr. H. said he did not know that he could treat the subject more appropriately as to what remained to be said by himself, than to attempt an answer to some of the topics which the honorable Speaker had so ingeniously discussed; for, it might be well said, that, if his argument had not produced conviction, it at least had copiously supplied materials for inquiry and speculation.

The honorable Speaker began his effort by a strong and highly wrought contrast between our own country and Great Britain. A contrast which had been so delineated, as to the boldness of the outline, and the disposition of light and shade, as to put our unfortunate land in rather an ill-favored and discouraging aspect. That the force of a picture depends as much on the hand of the painter, as on the subject, he believed, would be readily admitted; whilst he was not prepared to enter into competition with the Speaker in the graphic energy of these sketches, he would endeavor, nevertheless, to vindicate our poor country from a portion of the reproach of blindness and fatuity which has been cast upon her.

The first reply which he should offer to the exposé which had been made of the inflated wealth of Great Britain, was, that he conceived it neither a calamity or reproach, that our country was not as rich. That, after all, the wealth of a nation, like that of an individual, ought to be estimated in reference to its expenditures; the mode in which this wealth was used for the production of the greatest amount of human happiness and virtue.

He believed it would be found to be an axiom as true in politics as in ethics, that wealth was not, per se, the summum bonum; but he would waive the discussion of a trite subject, and say, that, if this country was tried by even the standard which the Speaker had indicated, she would suffer nothing in the comparison. But, in estimating the amount of the active capital of the two countries, the great disparity in their relative age and existence ought to be considered. The one was a nation of ten centuries, and the other emphatically of one. It is no answer to this argument to say, that we were the vigorous offspring of the older country, and started into life with all that vitality which gives an impulse to the maturity and growth of the mother country. This is not true. A knowledge of the sources of wealth, which we might have learnt by her precepts, or even example, are widely remote from that gradual accumulation of capital, which is the result of labor and skill. Our forefathers came here without money—they did not find it in the bowels of the earth, but they wrung it from our soil and our seas by the grasp of an untiring and persevering industry. If, therefore, all the circumstances be taken into account, there would be no difficulty, he believed, in proving that the progress of this country in the accumulation of capital, had been much greater than that of Great Britain, in the same period. It was true that the indicia of this accumulation would be dissimilar, but that would not prove our acquisitions were less valuable. From the peculiarities of our situation, both in reference to the extent of our territory and seas, this accumulation had a natural irrepressible tendency to agriculture and commerce, to the opening and cultivation of extensive fields, and to the building up a tonnage that was now second to none but that of Great Britain, and which, in spite of all that had been said, was increasing more rapidly than her own. In that country, with a small territory and dense population, the accumulations of capital, on the contrary, take their direction to manufactures, and this entirely independent of the force of legislation; for human laws are but feeble instruments in comparison with the force with which the whole economy of human things obey the dictates of nature. It was, indeed, an absurd hypothesis, that the country had not grown rich, because its fixed capital had not been invested in spindles and looms, as if they, according to the creed of a certain set of economists, constitute the only true wealth.

Now, Mr. H. said, he would take occasion, as the most appropriate place, to remark, that the difference in the extent of territory and density of population between the two countries, in determining the price of labor, had produced the real difference in the exhibition of their separate industry. And whilst these causes would give to us, forever, a decided advantage over Great Britain in agriculture, and, ultimately in commerce, they would, nevertheless, secure to her, for a long series of years, a superiority in manufactures. These facts would be obvious, by referring to statistical tables, that were accessible to all. In reference to population, it was to be observed that, whilst we have not any thing like five persons to the square mile, in East Flanders there are 554 persons. In West Flanders, 420. In Holland, 362, and in England, distinct from Wales, 232. If, therefore, the old thirteen United States possessed the population of England, our numbers would exceed one hundred and thirty millions. It was not, therefore, surprising, that the price of labor should be eight times as high in this country as in Flanders, and four times as high as in England. The accumulation of capital in manufactures is the joint result of a comparatively small territory, dense population, and surplus capital. The whole secret was, in one word, to be found in the price of labor. There is, in fact, a species of mechanism, which is still in great demand in our country, a demand that exceeds the supply, and this the noblest of all machines, man. Thus it is, when we come into competition with those nations that have a greater quantum of population than ourselves, we must be undersold, and consequently accumulate less capital. Where labor-saving machines can be used, by the intervention of inanimate agents, the reverse may be true, from the extraordinary ingenuity which characterizes the enterprise of our people.

The honorable Speaker, apparently fascinated by a contemplation of the successful industry of England, has rather attributed the results of this industry to her legislative regulations, and seems to insist, that her prohibitions and monopolies have principally contributed to that prosperity which he has made the theme of his eloquence and praise.

To determine, a priori, as to the causes of national prosperity, is, perhaps, after all, one of the most difficult problems in political philosophy. But the discovery that Great Britain owes a large portion of her wealth and power to her restrictive system, may be well calculated to excite surprise. If wealth is, indeed, the result of this species of legislation, we need no longer sigh for the faculty of transmuting every thing into gold. Nothing is more easy, if the majority will it, than to pass an act, cutting off all our intercourse with the rest of the world, by prohibiting their products, and we shall then, indeed, have reached "that millenium which is celebrated in the hosannas of the monopolists." We shall then command "our own consumption;" "for imports;" those curses of national prosperity, "will then cease"—a cabalistic phrase of the most ominous import, which is no where so well understood as in China.

One who may be disposed to speculate on the causes of the wealth and power of Great Britain, will no doubt save himself a vast deal of trouble, by opening her statute book, and, in the compass of a few pages, find in her bounties, drawbacks, and prohibitions, the true secret of her prosperity. This embraces a more easy chain of reasoning, than to consider the thousand peculiarities resulting from the climate, insular situation, population, and internal resources of England—resources which, by the means of an immense marine, have been nourished by the other three quarters of the globe, not only by the profits of commercial intercourse, but by military appropriation. And here is offered a fair occasion to advert to the fallacy of the estimate of the Speaker, (Mr. CLAY,) who, in giving, from statistical data, a view of the great resources of Great Britain, founded his calculations upon the population of the United Kingdom, at twenty-four millions; taking ours at ten, he was able to work a sum which left his own country somewhat in the vocative, but it was important to the success of this argument, that the whole external and colonial population of Great Britain should be omitted. No account was taken of the millions that are subject to her sway, in Asia, Africa, and America, who are her consumers on her own terms, and who are paying countless subsidies to her resources. Not a wave of the Ganges rolls to the ocean that does not bear some tribute to her wealth or her power. But the foundations of this power were laid long before Great Britain was a manufacturing nation, when, indeed, she imported almost all her manufactures from the Continent. The statesman who finds in her prohibition of the export of wool, and her corn laws, the true sources of her greatness, has discovered, indeed, the royal road to mathematics. But it is, to say the least of it, not a little singular, whilst the honorable Speaker is insisting, in this House, that the prohibitory system of England has mainly contributed to her wealth and greatness, that Lord Liverpool should, in St. Stephen's, be holding precisely opposite language. This is not all. Every intelligent statesman in the Parliament of Great Britain, no matter whether in the Opposition, or on the Ministerial benches, deplores, as a serious misfortune, the very restrictions which we are about to rivet on our country. This portion of the argument has been so entirely occupied by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) that, Mr. H. said, he was not willing to weaken the force of what that gentleman had said, whose statements were confirmed by every arrival from England.

Notwithstanding all that has been said in this country, and in this House, in reference to the magic wonders which the exorbitant or prohibitory duties of Great Britain have worked, in the productive industry of that country, the honorable Speaker might have found, in the very author of which he has made such frequent and copious use, a paragraph which is pregnant with instruction, and shows at least that the honorable gentleman is, in some points, even at issue with his own authority. In Lowe's "Present State of England," (a work, by the way, which, taken as a whole, furnishes an argument rather against, than in favor, of the restrictive system,) p. 168, he commences a section with this significant interrogatory:

"Are our manufactures actually benefited by protecting duties? That such is the case, and in a very considerable degree, too, is the opinion of the majority of our agriculturists. It is true, however, only in a slight degree, as soon will be apparent from the following facts. The total value of British manufacture, annually prepared, whether for home consumption or export, was computed, in 1812, by Mr. Colquhoun, at £123,000,000. Since then, their quantity has greatly increased; but, as their price has received a material reduction, we shall probably deviate little from the truth, in assuming that sum as a fair representation of their aggregate value. But, of this very large amount, more than £80,000,000 consist of the three great articles of cottons, woollens, and hardware; none of which receive protection from custom duties, our manufactures being enabled, by inherent advantages, to repel foreign competition, and even to meet our rivals in their own markets. Thus, our cottons are cheaper than those of France, Germany, or the Netherlands, from various causes—the import of the raw material is somewhat less expensive, our machinery is superior, our supply of fuel more abundant, and the capital employed subject to a less heavy charge of interest. In hardware, we possess a similar advantage in point of fuel and capital, with farther aids in the carriage of the ore by water, and in a subdivision of labor, to which the Continent in no degree approaches. If, in woollens, our superiority be less decisive, and if the quality of cloth be more substantial, the fact is, that, from our power of giving long credit to Americans, and others, we as yet retain possession of most of the foreign markets."

From this passage, it would appear that Lowe is by no means as well acquainted with the true source of the manufacturing success of his own country, as our politicians. He has the folly to attribute this success to the capital, population, fuel, subdivision of labor, and internal navigation of England; we have the wisdom to trace these effects to a few exploded regulations, which would now render any man in the House of Commons a laughing-stock, if he were to attempt to uphold them. The conclusion to which I wish the Committee to arrive on the force of this unexceptionable authority, is that, in reference to the three great articles of woollens, cottons, and hardware, the custom-house duties of Great Britain furnish no protection to the manufacturer, from the causes which Lowe has unfolded. And here it will be important to observe, that, in those manufactures which England has endeavored to protect by a series of duties amounting to prohibition, her failure has been the most signal. The fact was so fully illustrated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, from statements as copious as they were authentic, that he should not trouble the Committee with a recital of authorities that have already been so judiciously urged. Mr. H. said, he would close, therefore, this part of the argument, with this remark, that the cause of the failure of the results of any kind of labor, be it manufacturing or otherwise, is very frequently to be found in the effect of a system of bounties, of which high protecting duties are a species. They operate, in fact, as a premium to indolence and a want of skill, and, if combined with the absence of competition, (which foreign importations can only steadily sustain,) they convert all the monopolists that they create, into so many tax-gatherers, who levy their contributions on their own terms. The cause of all this is to be found in a principle strongly radicin the human mind, the true law of its mobility and power, that success in any given branch of industry will always bear an exact proportion to the intensity of the competition of those who are engaged in it. This is true in arms, philosophy, mechanic arts, and letters. The principle is in nature; we cannot extirpate or control it. Exceptions to the rule do not affect its general truth, which is sustained by the almost invariable experience of life.

The honorable Speaker, after descanting with his usual eloquence on the resources of Great Britain, (which he attributes, as has been before said, to what he is pleased to call her protecting policy,) has felt the necessity, in recommending this scheme of government for our adoption, to make some provision in his argument, for the objections which might be urged against it, in reference to the internal taxes, to which high or prohibitory duties, such, indeed, as those contained in the bill on your table, would necessarily lead. And, although, Mr. H. said, he did not dream for a moment that the agriculturists of this country would submit, for any length of time, to the burdens of an excise, to pamper the avarice of a corps of monopolists, yet, as the Speaker had not contented himself with palliating the system of British taxation, but even, in combination with the poor-rates, had made it the theme of his praise, it might be worth a momentary inquiry to ascertain what burdens the people of England bear, in all the multiplied forms of imposts, assessments, and excise. Mr. H. said, he would not fatigue the Committee by any details; the aggregate involved in the proposition was enough for his purpose. He should not deem it worth his while to lay any stress on the difference in the public debt of the two countries, although the most enthusiastic eulogists of England might, perhaps, be able to discover some difference between a debt of eight hundred millions sterling, and one of twenty-four millions sterling; between a debt which it is fully within our power to extinguish, without impairing any of the valuable institutions of the country, in the short period of nine years, (at least, if the bill on your table does not become a law,) and a debt whose final reduction baffles all human calculation, and must be regarded, even by the statesmen of England, as a problem as hopeless in its probable result, as it is inscrutable in its character. In reference, however, to the difference in the actual taxation of the two countries, it is of a nature so widely at variance, that it is impracticable to compare them with any logical or financial accuracy. It has hitherto been the distinguishing felicity of this country that we have been almost entirely exempt from the pressure of taxation, as this word of fearful import is practically understood in Europe. This, perhaps, has been as much the result of the mode by which the national revenue is collected as of the specific lightness of the burden. This scheme, by which our contributions are obtained through the medium of imposts at the custom-house, may well be described as one of the most beautiful contrivances of modern times, and as a mode of assessment peculiarily adapted to a Government like ours. If we were called upon to say what two principles in our institutions were most homogeneous to their character, we should certainly answer, our exemption from a Church establishment, as connected with State, and this mode of levying the public burdens, by which coercion, its harshest feature, is taken from taxation, and the contribution is not only exactly proportioned to the ability, but the inclination of the individual. In other words, an individual is compelled to pay in the way of consumption no more than he is pleased to pay, and in effect he may be said to levy his own tax.

The patriot who desires the immortality of this confederacy, cannot offer up a more appropriate prayer, than that this scheme of financial polity may be perpetual. But, in England, by what a widely dissimilar process are the public contributions levied! Whilst the amount raised by customs is eleven millions sterling, the whole amount of her taxation is equal to sixty-four millions under the various heads of assessed taxes, stamp, excise, &c. The excise, the most onerous of all—extorting from the people, by its inexorable gripe, twenty-nine millions sterling; a sum considerably more than one-third of the whole amount of her taxes, which aggregate is equal to the enormous sum of 25 per cent. on the total national income.

But the process of reasoning, by which the honorable Speaker makes out that we, in fact, pay, per capita, a greater amount of taxation than is paid by the people of England, is, to say the least of it, an amusing fallacy. Could the honorable Speaker make out his statement, to the satisfaction of the English Chancellor of the Exchequer, there is little doubt that it would be applauded as a novelty, not less than the discovery of the longitude. But, notwithstanding our proneness to believe to be true, whatever is agreeable, we must think the gravity of Mr. Robinson or Mr. Huskisson would be very seriously invaded, if the notable secret was unfolded to them, that, in effect, the tax paid by each subject of Great Britain was equal to three shillings and seven pence sterling, while the tax paid by each soul in the United States was four shillings and six pence sterling.

The process by which this result is established is as ingenious as the conclusion itself. The honorable Speaker puts down, as tax payers, the labor-saving machines of England, which he estimates as equal to a population of at least two hundred millions, to which he adds the real population of twenty-one millions five hundred thousand; the public burdens he then divides, not among the payers, the 21,500,000, (a number much beyond those who do actually sustain the public burdens, as will be presently demonstrated,) and thus, by a calculation altogether gratuitous and conjectural, puts down our labor-saving population of ten millions, passing an aggregate to our credit of twenty millions, in this most extraordinary sum. Without stopping to inquire how any man, who had not the arithmetical combination of Sir Isaac Newton, the patience of Job, and the age of Methusalem, could be able to calculate the relative power of population, to every horse, ox, stream, mill, water wheel, and every other mechanical agent, in that country, as well as in our own, it is a sufficient answer to this argument, to observe, that as these inanimate contrivances neither eat nor drink, they are at least beyond the friendly touch of the malt, salt, or beer excise. And, therefore, the very subject forbids the calculation, or renders it perfectly unavailing.

From Lowe's tabular statement, from which the honorable Speaker has taken his estimate, it would be seen that the burden paid by each person in England is equal to three pounds two shillings sterling. In this calculation the tax receivers, as well as the tax payers, the paupers, pensioners, and placemen, are included. If these were deducted, how different would be the result of the sum; it would make the burdens upon each actual payer equal to ten pounds.

Our taxation is also put down at nine shillings per capita, a sum which may be demonstrated, perhaps accurately enough for the books of the custom-house; but who feels this tax? For we may be assured that after all, the weight of a pecuniary burden is better ascertained by the pockets of the people, than by the reveries of a financier, however ingeniously he may work his dead reckoning. A tax is more surely measured by sensation than figures.

To the ingenious tribute of praise which the honorable Speaker had paid, not to the resources of Great Britain, but in some degree to the means by which they were extracted, he could only say, that, whilst he wished his country in possession of these resources, he would not consent to take them, with the scheme of taxation by which they are brought forth and ascertained. The honorable Speaker, aware, however, that by adopting a system of commercial restriction, which would diminish our revenue from imports, a resort to internal taxes would be inevitable—he very wisely smoothed the way for the entry of what might be to a certain degree, the concomitant of his parental "American policy." The excise! Which he tells us he contemplates with any thing but feelings of alarm and consternation. One might almost say that he looks at this monster, whom we are about to domesticate, with the same complacency that a philosopher would survey a mammoth, in speculating on his bones and magnitude. He differed altogether from the Speaker, in believing for a moment that this terrible and vexatious inquisition would be borne by our people—an inquisition that in England is unmatched by any thing that even religious bigotry, in its infernal conceptions, has imagined to vex and annoy its victims, in the shape of a pragmatic interference in all the ordinary concerns of life. It contains within itself a multiform and pitiful despotism, that may be well said to knock at every man's door, to wait at his elbow, to weigh in scales of the greatest capacity, and minutest subdivision, every morsel of human subsistence that he puts in his mouth.

It is by the great powers of extraction this happy contrivance possesses, which at once unites the suction and flexibility of an elephant's proboscis, that these great resources are brought forth, on which the honorable Speaker has so largely descanted—a contrivance which extorts from a single article, be it the "poor man's salt, and rich man's spice," a sum nearly equal to the entire expenditure of our Government. Yes, this ingenious piece of mechanism lifts out of the pockets of the people of England from twenty-nine to thirty millions sterling annually—an amount considerably beyond our funded debt; which sum, to use the language of Lowe, "bears on the comforts of life, and interferes, more or less," "directly with the extension of productive industry."

Mr. H. said, in concluding this notice of the Speaker's theory of taxation, positive and comparative, he could not resist the temptation of quoting from a writer whose views on the subject of British taxation were somewhat at variance with those of that gentleman. Mr. H. said he was aware he was now touching on tender ground, for he was about to name a reviewer, a personage who had fallen under the sneers both of the Speaker and the Chairman of the Committee on Manufactures. Nevertheless, he would venture to quote from Mr. Jeffrey, and present, for the amusement of the Committee, one of the most graphic, and he believed faithful pictures, that truth and wit had ever concurred in producing. Mr. Jeffrey says, that the unfortunate Englishman pays "taxes upon every article which enters into the mouth, or covers the back, or is placed under the foot; taxes upon every thing which it is pleasant to see, hear, feel, smell, or taste; taxes upon warmth, light, and locomotion; taxes upon every thing that comes from abroad or is grown at home; taxes on the raw material; taxes on every fresh value that is added to it by the industry of man; taxes on the sauce which pampers man's appetite, and the drug that restores him to health; on the ermine which decorates the judge, and the rope which hangs the criminal; on the poor man's salt, and the rich man's spice; on the brass nails of the coffin, and the ribands of the bride; at bed or board, couchant or levant, we must pay: The school-boy whips his taxed top; the beardless youth manages his taxed horse, with a taxed bridle, on a taxed road; and the dying Englishman, pouring his medicine, which has paid 7 per cent., into a spoon which has paid 15 per cent., makes his will on an £8 stamp, and expires in the arms of an apothecary, who has paid the license of an £100 for the privilege of putting him to death. His whole property is then immediately taxed from 2 to 10 per cent. Besides the probate, large fees are demanded for burying him in the chancel; his virtues are handed down to posterity on taxed marble, and he is then gathered to his fathers to be taxed no more."

Mr. H. said he would not detain the Committee by dwelling on the pauperism and poor rates of England, although he might well be tempted to do so from the example of the honorable Speaker, who had found even something to commend in these stupendous evils. He would more especially refrain from this discussion, because he could not entirely attribute these calamities to the restrictive system of Great Britain, although they were ascribable, in no inconsiderable degree, to the sudden and tremendous fluctuations in the price and demand for labor, to which manufactures were peculiarly liable. He would take occasion to say that, in spite of the honorable Speaker's fervid encomium on the British system, which he wishes to naturalize as an American policy, that there must be something radically wrong in the polity of any country where one-sixth of its population is in a state of vagrant mendicancy, depending for their bread on the other five-sixths.

When our landholders support, at a cost exceeding the revenue of our country, between two and three millions of outcasts, sunk into the lowest condition of human degradation, whose vicious habits and unparalleled debasement require the compass of a volume of 168 pages to detail, and whose infernal orgies surpass, in their moody horrors, all that the genius of Dante or Milton has conceived when most fertile in a loathsome sublimity, we might be, indeed, prepared for the lament which has been so piteously sung, of our "industry paralyzed, our unavailing labor, decreasing capital, bankruptcy, and ruin!"

The honorable Speaker, after disposing of these topics, comes at length to the consideration of the diseases under which the country is laboring. The disease which he has discovered is remarkable enough, but his remedy is no less curious. It is at least, according to his own showing, "a plethoric ill;" for in his own words, the fatal infirmity which is bringing us to the brink of the grave, "is, that our production exceeds our consumption." By which we are to understand, that, in reference to subsistence, we raise more than we can consume or can sell at exorbitant prices. For no man will pretend to assert that the price of wheat and every species of bread-corn does not bear a strict relation to the price of every thing else which we can have to sell, and must be so, from the immutable principles of exchangeable value. What, however, in reference at least to subsistence, is regarded as a great blessing in other countries, is considered as a curse in this—that the poor man's bread should be cheap, and attainable by the smallest sum of human labor. It is from this part of the Speaker's argument that it can be demonstrated that the scope of his "American policy" is to make bread dear and labor cheap—that is to say, that the farmer and the master manufacturer, between them, may grind the laborer down to their own terms. He complains that there is too much labor directed to agriculture, and too little to manufactures. The consequence must be, that there is an excess of subsistence and deficit of hands for manufactures; by which, as a matter of course, in reference to the latter, wages are too high. He then puts the case—"Suppose five hundred thousand hands were drawn from agriculture and directed to manufactures; what a market would it open to the farmer!" This may be admitted, but mark the result. The competition for employment among the five thousand would necessarily tend to lower the rate of wages, whilst their subtraction from agriculture, if it operated as the honorable gentleman calculated, is to increase the price of subsistence. If this last expectation is not realized, there is no lure held out to the farmer to embark in an experiment, the burden of which, he may be assured, he will, in the end, have to bear. But the probable consequence resulting from this project is, that whilst the price of labor would be diminished, the price of agricultural products would remain the same—at least uninfluenced by the home supply and home demand. It has been justly said, that the surplus of grain exported, however little that surplus may be, is the measure of its price. It has been moreover with equal accuracy remarked, that as long as land is so cheap, the price of grain will bear an exact proportion to the price of labor, adding merely the interest on the capital vested in the land, necessary for its production. In a grain-growing country, like this, it is a gross fallacy to suppose that the farmer can ever receive the exorbitant prices which he has obtained for his grain, except from the wants of other countries, or from a comparative famine in his own—the result of unfavorable seasons. The truth is, that wheat is as high now as any thing else in the market; and if it has fallen fifty per cent., so have lands and houses, ships, cotton, and all the other articles of human use and employment. But, for the sake of argument, admit that there is this large surplus of grain rotting on our hands, as the honorable Speaker is pleased to remark. Is not a country comparatively happy, that its surplus should consist of the primary subsistence of life, by which bad seasons and the sudden exigencies of war may be corrected? How different is the situation of a country whose surplus consists of manufactures, (an evil that has often befallen Great Britain, and is amply illustrated by her experience,) which a starving population cannot eat!

The next remark of the honorable Speaker is, "that England takes from us about five millions sterling value of cotton, out of which she makes twenty-two millions." By which we are to understand that the precise amount of her profit is the precise amount of our loss.

There might be some force in this argument, if it could be proved that the very instant the five millions value of cotton reached England, that moment, by the wand of enchantment, it was converted into twenty-two millions sterling, and which conversion might have taken place, had we kept it at home. But, when it is considered that England has to vest in fixed capital and labor, in fact, a larger amount in proportion, to produce the twenty-two millions, than we have to raise the five millions, what becomes of the triumph of this discovery? It only proves that we find it more advantageous to raise the raw material, than to manufacture it. To remove all sort of doubt or difficulty from this argument, it may be illustrated by a plain example. A planter at the South has vested in lands and negroes a hundred thousand dollars, by which he makes two hundred bales of sea-island cotton, which sells for $15,000, giving him a profit on his capital, after deducting expenses, of 12 per cent. A manufacturer who works up this cotton, may produce a value infinitely increased, but he has had to vest a larger amount of capital, and so employ a greater quantum of labor, when all of which are deducted, his profits cannot, in the long run, exceed those of the planter. That they probably will be less, it proved from two facts: that the rate of interest and the price of labor are higher in this country than in England.

It might be admitted that the honorable Speaker could make out his proposition, if we had actually existing in our country, languishing for the want of employment, an amount of fixed capital, and labor necessary to work up these five millions sterling value of raw cotton; but, when the reverse is precisely the case; when, in fact, all the capital we have is beneficially employed in the existing channels of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures; when we have, in spite of all that has been said, no idlers, except those whom disease or immorality has doomed to mendicancy; when the departments of human industry are full; when no man is a drone, except through his own perversity; when, in fact, labor and subsistence are in a wholesome and exact proportion to each other; what possible solidity is there in this argument of the Speaker's, of which it might be said, that it is destitute even of plausibility, but for the characteristic ingenuity with which it has been urged?

The discussion of this subject, Mr. H. said, brought him to canvass, in the natural order of the Speaker's argument, a point in which he was willing to confess he felt the most lively as well as the most profound interest. Although not a cotton planter himself, yet it was his peculiar fortune to represent that portion of the State of South Carolina engaged in the production of sea-island cotton, a section that had more staked in the desperate and unholy game about to be played, than any other part of this Union. He would, indeed, prove recreant to his trust if the topic did not challenge his keenest sympathies and best exertions. That the Committee might form some estimate of the value of this branch of the industry of South Carolina, he would bring a few facts to their notice; for, it was by the cultivation of this beautiful staple which unites in itself the valuable properties of silk and wool, that riches and comfort had been lavished on that section—a region that was not, however, exempt from that depression in the value of property and the price of its products, which was common to the whole country. Yet, this cultivation had done so much for its inhabitants, that it was not surprising that they felt such an intense interest in the continuance of its profits. It had reclaimed from a fast-coming poverty worn-out fields, which had been for many years appropriated to the ill requited cultivation of indigo; and, as if by the work of enchantment, transferred wealth and abundance to those spots which seemed to have been cursed by the fiat of nature with an irredeemable sterility.

Mr. H. said that he could, if he were not afraid of exhausting the patience of the Committee, refer to the statistics of an island, which formed a portion of the district he represented, to illustrate the incalculable value of this staple, and the miracles he might almost say its production had effected. This spot was the Island of Edisto, which, as would be seen by the map of South Carolina, was about forty miles south of Charleston. Thirty-five years since, it was inhabited by a few planters, who were engaged in the culture of indigo, and who wrung, by hard industry, from a reluctant soil, a scanty subsistence. Then the largest income which any one planter was able to realize scarcely exceeded a thousand pounds sterling; now, by the introduction of the long staple cotton, he knew one individual whose crop had sold for fifty thousand dollars per annum. This island, scarcely twelve miles long and four wide, was then inhabited by six or seven planters; it is now almost as thickly settled as the State of Connecticut, and exhibits, in the sobriety, moderation, religious and moral worth of its inhabitants, a singular example of triumphant industry. It would be here that Franklin might see, if he were alive, a beautiful illustration of his thousand wise and frugal maxims. Mr. H. said that he had selected an individual picture, to bring home to the Committee, more emphatically, a knowledge of what the cotton culture had done for his country, although his remarks were applicable to a large portion of the Sea-Island district of South Carolina. It was, nevertheless, true, as he had remarked, that the planters in this section shared in that depression which is common to every department of the industry of the Union, excepting those from which we heard the most clamor for relief. This would be understood when it was known that Sea Island cotton had fallen from fifty or sixty to twenty-five cents—a fall even greater than that which has attended wheat, of which we have heard so much; as if the grain-growing section was the only agricultural interest which had suffered. But, nevertheless, the market of England for this staple, was of vital importance; it was not, therefore, strange that the apprehension of the passage of the bill before you had carried into the hearts of this portion of our common country, the emotions of dismay and bitterness. They perceive the whole value of their labor menaced by a probable destruction of the existing market for this staple, which is better adapted to the soil and climate of the seacoast of South Carolina, than any other that can possibly be cultivated. Whilst the planters of this region do not dread competition in the foreign markets on equal terms, from the superiority of their cotton, they entertain a well founded apprehension, that the restrictions contemplated will lead to retaliatory duties on the part of Great Britain, which must end in their ruin.

Mr. H. said, that he could not better express their fears on this subject than to read to the House an extract from an able and feeling memorial which he had some weeks since the honor of presenting from the citizens of Beaufort, South Carolina. A single paragraph would be abundantly sufficient:

"Your memorialists would respectfully observe, that, engaged in common with their fellow-citizens of the South in agricultural pursuits, they are the cultivators of that species of cotton for which, it is notorious, the manufacturing establishments of our country furnish no demand whatever; that the quantity of fine cotton, annually produced, is already beyond the consumption of Europe; that, with all the markets of Europe open to them, the staple (for which alone their lands are calculated) is depressed to the grievous injury of the planters; that to them, (whatever it may be to others of their fellow-citizens engaged in cultivating the inferior cottons,) the loss of a foreign market would be the annihilation of their income."

I know, said Mr. H., that these fears are treated here as idle and visionary, and that the honorable Speaker has triumphantly asked, "whether Great Britain would have the folly materially to interdict the import of our cottons, from which she makes, annually, upwards of twenty millions, because we imposed an increase of duty on about a million and a half's worth of the manufactured article returned to this country?" In the first place the Speaker has fallen into an error in his estimate. The bill before you provides for the imposition of an increase of duty almost prohibitory in its character on seven millions of our imports of cotton goods from Great Britain, and has a direct operation on thirteen millions of other articles which we take from her. But the Speaker assumes as a fact what his experience as a statesman should have taught him some caution in adopting; that nations invariably pursue a policy dictated by the most enlightened views of profit and advantage, and that they never sacrifice any thing to caprice or resentment. Mr. H. said he feared that the very measure now under discussion was about to illustrate the truth, that there was no folly, however stupid and perverse, into which nations, as well as individuals, were not prone to fall, either from vanity or passion, or that misguided avarice, which invariably "doth o'erleap itself."

In relation to our Upland cottons, Great Britain may, without difficulty, in the course of a very short period, supply her wants from Brazil—to facilitate which, all the ancient relations of a favored intercourse with her steadfast ally, Portugal, would be at once subservient. When it is recollected that Brazil produces a cotton which occupies an intermediate place between the Sea Islands of Georgia and South Carolina, and the Uplands of New Orleans, which the daily improvement in machinery is bringing nearer to the former, as to most of its uses, and that there is in this fine region, stretching through thirty-five degrees of latitude, from the Equator, a section of country admirably adapted to the cultivation of this staple, greater in extent than the whole Atlantic States of this Union, the reasonableness of our apprehensions may be estimated, as well as the gross impolicy, by injurious duties on our imports from England, of driving her, either from caprice or interest, to seek other adequate sources of supply. How long the exclusive production, even of the Sea Island cotton, will remain to our country, is yet a doubtful and interesting problem. The experiments that are making on the Delta of the Nile, if pushed to the ocean, may result in the production of this beautiful staple, in an abundance which, in reference to other productions, has long blest and consecrated Egyptian fertility. But, the circumstance that many of the costly articles of luxury which are now made of Sea Island cotton, can be manufactured of silk and flax, coupled with the fact of the great efforts which are making in Great Britain to encourage the former establishments, not by bounties and monopolies, but by their destruction, (for these remedies are regarded there as vile quackeries,) will tend emphatically to prove that the present is an awful crisis in the cotton trade of the country.

We are told by the honorable Speaker, that our manufacturing establishments will, in a very short period, supply the place of the foreign demand. The futility, I will not say mockery, of this hope, may be measured by one or two facts. First, the present consumption of cotton by our manufactories, is about equal to one-sixth of our whole production, not very much exceeding 80,000 bales; whereas, the crop of 1824 may be fairly estimated at 600,000 bags. How long it will take to increase these manufactories to a scale equal to the consumption of this production, he could not venture to determine; but, that it will be some years after the epitaph will have been written on the fortunes of the South, there can be little doubt. But suppose, for the sake of argument, that the whole of the cottons of the South could be worked up in this country, where will you find a market for the articles manufactured—not at home; for, of the 448,211 bales of cotton which Great Britain purchased of this country, between the first of January, 1823, and the thirty-first of December, 1823, she has sent back to us, according to the best calculations, in the shape of manufactured articles, about 40,000 bags. Suppose, however, that our home consumption be equivalent to 140,000 bales, (which is an enormous estimate,) where are you to find a vent for the articles manufactured of the 460 bags that will remain? In South America, the honorable Speaker tells us—but what a fallacy have we here! What! whilst we dread British competition on our shores, more than Hamilcar hated the Romans, we can, nevertheless, undersell England in foreign markets! Yes; whilst we are told that, for the very existence of manufactures that have been in operation ten or fifteen years, it is yet necessary to lay protecting duties of from fifty to one hundred per cent., we can, nevertheless, traverse the ocean, encounter freight and charges and duties in other countries, and compete with our old enemy, who is so much dreaded at home. How this is to be effected without a miracle, Mr. H. said he was at a loss to perceive, without our manufactures, like the Prophets of old, were more honored and successful abroad, than at their own firesides.

If there be any soundness in these views, it would lead us to entertain a very serious distrust of the belief that an imposition of high duties would not lead to retaliation. There was a general principle, which was so true in reference to the intercourse of nations, that it might well be denominated an axiom, which was, that no trade could be supported long between them, in which there was not a mutually beneficial exchange of their separate products. It is true there was one exception to this rule, which rather went to prove its truth, and that was, the trade with China. This trade was continued, because tea was the exclusive product of the latter, and, consequently, that China might always dictate the medium by which the exchanges for this article were to be effected; but, if tea could be obtained in any other quarter of the globe, this intercourse would have to yield to the universal laws of trade.

Mr. H. said that he protested against any inference being deduced from these remarks, that he considered the trade with China as injurious. He knew the reverse to be eminently true. In connexion with this topic, he would take occasion to observe, that he would as studiously abstain from discussing the balance of trade, as he would the history of witchcraft, as the former was just as absurd and exploded a folly as the latter. The time was fast approaching, when it would be quite as great a reproach to the understanding of a statesman, to indulge in the absurd dogmas of the one as the other. It was, however, a fact not to be concealed, that a direct trade, carried on by specie, was very often the most profitable, for reasons which appeared to him altogether satisfactory. In the first place, specie must be obtained by a product which a nation must gain by the engagement of its own industry. By the conversion of this product into money, a fresh and additional value has been effected, if the exchange has been conducted with skill and sagacity. When, therefore, a purchase is to be made with the specie thus obtained, the purchaser enters the foreign market with the power of promptly effecting his contracts and exchanges. The material which he uses in trade has been burdened with a light imposition of freight, is admitted without the payment of duties, and, being of universal use and currency, it can at once command its own value, without the delay and expense attending a trade which is carried on by the reciprocal sale and purchase of other raw or manufactured products. These truths were so obvious, that he felt ashamed, almost, to state them—but for the plaintive notes of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Top,) that our country was fast sinking into a lethargy from this most "ruinous drain of specie."

Mr. HAMILTON said that he had intended, but for the time he had already consumed, to have gone into a discussion for the purpose of demonstrating that the bill, so far from promoting what with propriety might be called the domestic manufactures of the country, was calculated to have precisely a contrary effect. When he made this remark he had reference to those innumerable mechanic arts which are carried on with such unrivalled success by our countrymen. The justice of this observation might be appreciated by taking for example two or three articles of prime necessity—iron and hemp. The bill provides for the grievous imposition of high duties on both these articles. For what purpose, as it respects the first of them? To help the countless artisans and mechanics that are engaged in working up this material, in all the various and minute modifications to which it is applicable? No. On them (where there is the largest sum of industry engaged) it operates as an onerous tax. The effect of the duty will be merely to pamper the overgrown wealth of those ironmasters, as they were indeed most significantly called, whose mines were in successful operation, or to give a sort of convulsive, temporary, and galvanic motion, to those that were sunk into a condition of hopeless insolvency. The true causes of the occasional success, as well as the general failure of the iron works of this country, had been so ably unfolded by the gentleman from Virginia, his estimable friend, (Mr. MERCER,) that, Mr. H. said, he would not detain the House by discussing a subject on which it was impossible for human ingenuity to cast an additional ray. When this article was taken in connexion with the burdens levied on hemp, their injurious operation against one description of our domestic manufactures might be easily estimated—and that was ship building. The memorials which had been sent from the several commercial cities, had very sufficiently proved the ruinous extent to which the shipping interest would be taxed. That the contemplated tariff would be equivalent to a tax of from seven to eight per cent. on the value of each vessel that might be built, these memorials established. A ship of 350 tons, according to the proposed rate of duty, would pay $1,341 75—not including the tax on a chain cable, which is $250 or $300—an amount of duty equal to the cost of an hempen cable, and therefore might be regarded as prohibitory of the former article. All this was of most pernicious pressure on a large class of laborers engaged in the building and equipment of ships.

Mr. H. said there was a radical error prevalent that manufacturing establishments, in other words, looms and spindles, were productive of a greater sum of human industry than any other investment of capital. He believed that ship building and navigation employed more of the labor of human hands than any other pursuit. When the various means by which a single ship is set in motion are taken into account, some estimate may be formed of the truth of this opinion. To illustrate it he would ask the attention of the Committee, whilst he read a statement which he had received from a merchant of the city of New York, of great intelligence and respectability, who informed him that "it requires fifty days work to build and equip and manufacture the articles in our own country for every ton of vessel."

"Take, for example, a ship of 300 tons, and allow 120 days to build her, which is about the average time; multiply 300 by 50, makes 15,000 days labor, to manufacture her from the raw material, beginning with the timber in the forest; divide 15,000 by 120 days, the time required, gives you the number of people steadily employed to build ships of 300 tons, in 120 days time, which is 125 men."

"The capital required by a ship builder to carry on the whole manufactory, in its various branches, and to build 1,200 tons a year, would be about $25,000, and in that ratio, if he built more or less.

"Our yard built, this last year, 2,200 tons of vessels; consequently, if I am correct, has employed 110,000 days labor; and the average of the yards, I should think, would be about 60,000. There are eight yards in this city which manufacture vessels. Five or six, probably, would average as above—say five; 60,000, multiplied by 5, would be 300,000 days labor, in one year, in these yards, and would be equal to the employment of 2,500 men steadily in the various parts of the manufactory.

"The above is distinct from the labor necessary to sail, load, raise, and procure, and transport the loading, and the necessary repair for ten years. A ship of 350 tons, in ten years, will have cost as much for repairs as she did originally, when new; it requires an average of 60 men, steadily employed, to sail her, and keep her fit for use. It also costs 18,900 days labor to raise, bring to market, and fit provisions sufficient to maintain the men necessary to manufacture 1,000 tons of ship, and keep one of 350 tons steadily employed.

"The number of houses used by the men employed, and, consequently, the men employed to build those houses, as well as the provision required for them, I have not calculated, deeming it probable the above would give a general view of the immense manufacture of ships; and, when we look at it in a national point of view, it is of incalculable importance. The men are the most robust and hearty to be found, and a class always that will be most required should we have war.

"Recapitulation.—As I have stated, it requires 50 days labor to manufacture the ship and outfits, for each ton; 60 days labor, each ton, to sail, keep her in repair, load and unload, raise, and transport sufficient produce to keep her employed; and will require 28 days labor, for each ton, to raise and fit provisions for those men that are required to build, fit, sail, and repair, and raise the produce, to keep one ton of vessel steadily employed."

It is against this domestic manufacture, which has contributed so much to our wealth and glory, that this pernicious tariff strikes a reckless blow. The honorable Speaker (Mr. CLAY) ventures almost to intimate that he thinks it a perversion of terms to call a ship an article of manufacture, which it has been so justly designated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) whose defence of the navigating interests of the prosperous city he represents on this floor, must entitle him to its lasting gratitude and confidence.

A ship, said Mr. H., is the chef d'œuvre of manufactures. Whilst, in its construction and motion, it sustains a greater amount of human industry than any other mechanical contrivance, it was at once the noblest triumph which man had achieved over the elements, and one of the proudest trophies of his genius. No one, but him whose soul is dead to every generous impulse, can witness this beautiful machine, riding with apparent supremacy over the boisterous main, (which but for the invention would have fixed impassable barriers to the intercourse and civilization of the human species,) without feeling new pride and exultation in the apparently indefinite capabilities of man. To an American, this spectacle is calculated to convey peculiar emotions. In a ship, he may see the emblem of his country's prosperity and power—an engine which has lavished wealth on our shores and glory on our name.

Mr. H. said that he had made such an unreasonable trespass on the time of the Committee that he was constrained to offer a very brief summary, in the way of reply to the remaining positions taken by the honorable Speaker. One of the most important of these was, that the passage of the tariff would, by the multiplication of manufactures, produce a steady demand for labor. If the experience of Great Britain furnished any instruction on this topic, it warranted quite a different deduction; for her manufacturing establishments supplied, of all her various branches of industry, the least certain demand for labor. This resulted from the very nature of things. The imposition of an import duty in a foreign country, on the article manufactured, or an abolition of its use by the very caprice of fashion, was calculated to disturb, very seriously, the uniformity of this demand. It had been very justly said, that a whim or freak in a Parisian belle, in laying aside a fashionable article of dress, had very often thrown thousands out of employment, and carried starvation and beggary in its train. The melancholy circumstances of distress so often exhibited in the manufacturing districts of England, afforded the best proof of this tremendous fluctuation. Nor is it absolutely certain, if the Speaker could see the capital of the country vested more generally in manufactures, that he would find a cure for those bankruptcies which he says have been of such frequent and fatal occurrence, and which he seems to consider as peculiarly incident to trade. In England, the failures among her manufacturers bear a high and undue proportion to the other business classes. A popular journal of our own country furnishes the following statement in reference to this topic: "We have taken up the first English magazine that came to hand, and out of one hundred and forty bankruptcies in the month from November 14th, to December 15th, 1821, twenty only were of mercantile establishments, and the other six-sevenths of every species of manufactures."

Mr. H. said, that in all that had been urged as objections to building up large manufacturing establishments in this country, on account of the morals and health of the people, (which were no insignificant items in the estimate of a patriot and statesman,) he fully concurred. That a few capitalists should control the votes of three or four hundred electors, he thought an evil exhibiting the most frightful portents. The answer which the Speaker had given to this objection was neither sound nor satisfactory—"that all large employments in which capital is used for the purchase of wages are liable to this complaint." In no branch of human industry has the employer, however, such a perfect dominion over the laborer, and in none is the latter so entirely dependent for his bread on the former. The very occupation, by a prostration of physical energy, begets a moral subserviency that fits the man for a slave. That taste must be vitiated, indeed, that would prefer seeing a fellow creature fixed down to a loom for sixteen long hours out of the twenty-four, emaciated and spiritless, a mechanical rather than an intelligent agent, whose mind does not travel one inch beyond the monotonous flight of his shuttle—to the contemplation of a healthy, vigorous, and independent husbandman, whose homestead, poor as it may be, gives him, in feeling at least, the independence of a monarch, and the spirit of a man. Mr. H. said that he would not detain the Committee by pushing the inquiry into this part of the subject, through all the affecting relations connected with it, in relation to the health and morals of a people engaged in manufactures. He would say nothing of the hecatombs of human beings that were offered up at the shrine of the Mammon that presides over these establishments, in the persons and fortunes of the unhappy children, scarcely released from the helplessness of infancy, that were brought to be devoured by this Saturn. The pictures which Southey has given of Manchester and Birmingham, in which the poet was supposed to have blended no inconsiderable portion of misanthropy and spleen, will not long remain a questionable fiction on this side of the water. The recent discussion in the Legislature of a manufacturing State, (fruitless in its result, except in demonstrating the existence of the evils intended to be remedied,) whether provision should be made by law for educating the two thousand five hundred children imprisoned in these infernal charnel houses, is full of instruction, and shows that we are gradually and shall rapidly arrive (if this tariff is foisted on the country) at that condition when Espriella himself may travel through our manufacturing districts, and gather abundant materials for a fresh narrative.

Mr. H. said, that he had intended to have discussed the probable effect which the Speaker's "American and paternal policy" (all concreted and concocted in the bill before you) would have on the settlement, and consequent price of our public lands. He would spare the Committee this discussion, and make but a single remark—that it is perfectly obvious, if in large cities and small towns and villages, more especially on the Atlantic frontier, the population of our country becomes more concentrated, by the temptation which will be held forth of immediate employment at these points, by the establishment of manufactures, the stream of foreign emigration that has flowed with a full and prosperous tide to the West, will be seriously arrested. The pecuniary loss in the diminished value of the public lands, which would arise to the country, important as it might be, was perhaps insignificant in comparison with other considerations; and these considerations rendered the zealous and unbroken support which the gentlemen from the Western States had given the tariff an inscrutable problem. That portion of the Union could participate in no part of the bill, except in its burdens, in spite of the fallacious hopes that were cherished, in reference to cotton bagging for Kentucky, and the woollen duty for Steubenville. He feared, that, to the entire region of the West no "cordial drops of comfort" would come, even in the duty on foreign spirits. To a large portion of our people, who are in the habit of solacing themselves with Hollands, Antigua, and Cognac, Whiskey would still have "a most villanous twang." The cup, he feared, would be refused, though tendered by the hand of patriotism as well as coquiviality. No—the West has but one interest, that is, that its best customer, the South, should be prosperous—that our revenue should be so ample as to preclude the necessity of any resort to internal taxation—that she should not be coerced in reference to her payments for purchases of the public land. He would go further and say, that, after making an adequate provision for the public debt, that this Government could not adopt a more wise and beneficent policy than to expend a part at least of the amount of the sales of the public lands in those great works of internal improvement which are so necessary to the proper development of the resources of that interesting region, and for connecting it by social and commercial intercourse, with every part of the Atlantic section. To enable us to be both just and generous, our finances from revenue must be unimpaired, and he undertook to say that the existing policy of the country would be sufficient for all its wants, both in relation to the public debt, fortifications, our Army and Naval Establishments, if not paralyzed by the odious measure under consideration, which would alone, he believed, prevent the funds arising from the sales of the Western lands being appropriated to the great and enlightened purposes he had indicated.

Mr. H. said, that the honorable Speaker had endeavored, among the other objections to the bill, to remove those to which it is most particularly obnoxious, on the ground of the fostering patronage it would afford to smuggling. High duties were invariably productive of this pernicious fraud. The spread of this vice, would be infinitely extended by the influence of the opinion, that your legislation is partial and your imposts unjustifiably oppressive. If laws do not concur with the moral sentiment of the community, they are feeble instruments, and exist in your statute book as memorials of their own impotency. Prior to the American Revolution the injustice of Great Britain, resulting from the jealousy of her colonial system, led to the most skilful violations of the revenue, which it baffled all the power of her army on shore, and her marine on the coast, to prevent. The same causes will produce similar results. A sense of unmerited wrong inflicted on one portion of your Union, will lead even the virtuous to regard an indulgence in this offence at least with apathy, whilst its immense profits will prove an irresistible lure to the vicious. For the commission of this vice our coast furnishes the most extraordinary facilities, in its extensiveness, sparseness of population, and innumerable indentures by bays and rivers. The whole Navy of the United States, with an army of twenty thousand men, would be inadequate to the protection of the revenue, when you make it the interest of the worst portion of your people to embark in the hazards of these desperate yet profitable enterprises. Mr. Pitt, after trying every expedient which force and vigilance could supply, considered as hopeless any other remedy than a reduction of the duty on an article, in relation to which he desired to suppress smuggling. It is a remarkable fact in the administration of this statesman, that, having ascertained that the country consumed ten millions of pounds of tea, annually, and that only five millions were entered at the custom-house, he was induced to lower the duty 50 per cent.; the consequence was, that it ceased soon to be the interest of the smuggler to introduce this article, as the rate of duty did not cover the risk of its clandestine introduction. And the Minister was therefore rewarded, as the fruit of his intelligence, with a revenue from this article double in amount, and the custom-house returns forthwith concurred with the estimated consumption of the country.

It is not alone by the loss of revenue that smuggling is injurious; it raises up a class of men who are at all times dangerous to the peace and safety of the community. Men who are habituated to scenes of peril and daring, and tainted with "the accursed thirst of gold," which gives to their wickedness all the energy of courage, and to their efforts that perseverance which belongs to avarice. One of the best accounts he had met with of the peculiar character of these people, was to be found in a description given by Napoleon to O'Meara, of the smugglers at Dunkirk, which was to be found in the interesting sketches given by the latter of that extraordinary man, who, with all his other talents, seems to have shared with Tacitus the faculty of striking off at a moment the most powerful, faithful, and condensed delineations. With the Speaker's eulogium, eloquent as it was, of this remarkable individual, Mr. H. said he had neither time nor inclination to cavil. He would merely remark, that Bonaparte's continental system, on which that gentleman had lavished so much encomium, was now regarded, he believed, by the first statesmen of Europe, as quite of a piece with his expedition to Moscow. That both measures would go down to posterity as a reproach to the sagacity of that great man, he had no doubt. But he confessed that he considered the Speaker's complacent esteem of Napoleon's restrictive system, as rather an evil omen. It looked as if some more tremendous tariffs were yet in reserve, as the ne plus ultra of the "parental policy." The three principal authorities on which the Speaker has relied, have been Mathew Carey, the Emperor of Russia, and Napoleon. To give a finished analysis of a smuggler, and to show what sort of animal he is, whilst he would leave the Speaker in undisputed possession of the two first of these personages, he would borrow for a moment his last authority. It was in one of those delightful talks with O'Meara that this interesting exile observed—

"During the war with England, (said he,) all the intelligence I received from thence, came through the smugglers. They are terrible people, and have courage and ability to do any thing for money. They had, at first, a part of Dunkirk allotted to them, to which they were restricted; but, as they, latterly, went out of their limits, committed riots, and insulted every body, I ordered Gravelines to be prepared for their reception, where they had a little camp for their accommodation, beyond which they were not permitted to go. At one time there were upwards of five hundred of them in Dunkirk. I had every information I wanted through them. They brought over newspapers and despatches, from the spies that we had in London. They took over spies from France, landed and kept them in their houses for some days, then dispersed them over the country, and brought them back when wanted. The police had to pay a number of French emigrants, who gave constant information of the Vendean party, Georges, and others, at the time they were preparing to assassinate me. All their movements were made known. Besides, the police had in pay many English spies, some of high quality, among whom there were many ladies. There was one lady in particular, of very high rank, who furnished considerable information, and was sometimes paid as high as three thousand pounds in one month. They came over, continued he, in boats not broader than this bark. It was really astonishing to see them passing your seventy-four gun ships in defiance." I observed that they were double spies, and that they brought intelligence from France to the British Government. That is very likely, replied Napoleon. They brought you newspapers; but, I believe, that, as spies, they did not convey much intelligence to you. They are terrible people, and did great mischief to your Government. They took from France, annually, forty millions of silks and brandy. They assisted the French prisoners to escape from England. The relations of Frenchmen, prisoners in your country, were accustomed to go to Dunkirk, and to make a bargain with them to bring over a certain prisoner. All that they wanted was the name, age, and private token, by means of which the prisoner might repose confidence in them. Generally, in a short time afterwards, they effected it; as, for men like them, they had a great deal of honor in their dealings. They offered several times times to bring over Louis, and the rest of the Bourbons, for a sum of money; but they wanted to stipulate that, if they met with any accidents or interruption to their design, they might be allowed to massacre them. This I would not consent to. Besides, I despised the Bourbons too much, and had no fear of them. Indeed, at that time, they were no more thought of in France, than the Stuarts were in England. They, also, offered to bring over Dumourier, Sarrazin, and others, whom they thought I hated; but I held them in too much contempt to take any trouble about them."

No man can add any thing to this picture. It was full of instruction, and it would always be a serious question with a nation whether they ought to adopt a policy calculated to legislate into existence such miscreants as Napoleon had described. The Speaker, however, complains, that all our employments are overstocked; that the proposed tariff will create new professions and departments of industry. But, after all, would not the renowned and ancient trade and mystery of smuggling be the only profitable avocation created? Its thrift will be unquestionable, and its votaries may, at last, pass for very worthy and patriotic men.

Mr. H. said there was one consideration to be borne in mind, which was inseparably connected with the measure under discussion, and that was, the utter impossibility of satisfying the monopolists engaged in manufactures, who were so clamorous for the passage of this bill, with any thing short of absolute prohibition. They had been, by steadily marching up to this point, gathering numbers, by cunning addresses to popular prejudice and feeling, from 1790, through the several revisions of the tariff, up to the present time. It was as easy to cater for a cormorant as to satisfy their greedy appetite for gain. Their industry, combination, perseverance, and identity of interest, rendered the whole corps more dangerous to the peace and prosperity of a community than even a full and well-organized detachment of smugglers. Their avarice invariably approaches under the guise of public spirit, whilst the unity of purpose with which they act, gives an overwhelming energy to their exertions. Committees of correspondence, public meetings, and the press, more prolific than the herrings of Norway, are all united, in a "holy alliance," to fasten on the country a system which, in taxing nine-tenths of the people, is to reward their pious and patriotic efforts.

Mr. H. said, that he had been indebted to Napoleon for a just delineation of a smuggler; he would now appeal to the writings of a great man for a full length portrait of a monopolist. He believed it would be admitted that Adam Smith knew something of this personage, for it was his good fortune to have been hated by all the patriots of the "protecting and parental policy" of his day, with a cordiality that was almost equal to the success with which he exposed their selfish hypocrisy. In the course of a vigorous and philosophical dissertation on this subject, he remarks:

"To expect, indeed, that the freedom of trade should ever be entirely restored in Great Britain, is as absurd as to expect that Oceana or Utopia should ever be established in it. Not only the prejudices of the public, but what is much more incorrigible, the private interests of many individuals, irresistibly oppose it. Were the officers of the Army to oppose, with the same zeal and unanimity, any reduction in the number of forces, with which master manufacturers set themselves against every law that is likely to increase the number of their rivals in the home market; were the former to animate their soldiers in the same manner as the latter inflame their workmen, to attack, with violence and outrage, the proposers of any such regulation; to attempt to reduce the Army would be as dangerous as it has now become to attempt to diminish, in any respect, the monopoly which our manufacturers have obtained against us.

"This monopoly has so much increased the number of some particular tribes of them, that, like an overgrown standing army, they have become formidable to the Government, and, upon many occasions, intimidate the Legislature.

"The member of Parliament who supports every proposal for strengthening this monopoly, is sure to acquire not only the reputation of understanding trade, but great popularity and influence with an order of men whose numbers and wealth render them of great importance. If he opposes them, on the contrary, and still more if he has authority enough to be able to thwart them, neither the most acknowledged probity, nor the highest rank, nor the greatest public services, can protect him from the most infamous abuse and detraction, from personal insults, nor, sometimes, from real danger, arising from the insolent outrage of furious and disappointed monopolists."

Has not a portion of this picture been already realized in our own country, at the very commencement of this manufacturing millenium? Is not a man's reputation in Congress "for understanding trade" and finance, just in proportion as he may favor the tariff? Have we not heard "of master manufacturers inflaming their workmen to attack with outrage and violence the proposers of regulations calculated to defeat their profits?" Let the recent events at a public meeting at New York respond to this inquiry. In relation to this extraordinary and disgraceful event, it has been asserted that ruffians belonging to the manufactories of the neighboring towns were brought over for the purpose of overawing the deliberations of an assembly, convened for the purpose of protesting against the passage of the proposed tariff. This may be regarded as a fearful augury, indeed, of the path we are travelling—a path in which there is neither "pleasantness nor peace."

Mr. H. said, that his duty to those who gave him his warrant to be heard on that floor, would not permit him to disguise a single opinion which he entertained in regard to the pernicious character of the measure under consideration. His feelings did not allow him very nicely to measure his words. He would not travel out of his way to say an unkind thing, but for whatever he did say, even in the intemperance of his zeal, he was willing to be regarded as responsible both in this House and out of this House. Privilege with him should never be synonymous with protection and impunity. He would, therefore, speak of the bill and the manner in which it had been got up just as he believed they deserved. The first thing he should say, was, that he believed there had been more outdoor than indoor legislation, in regard to the measure. He feared that the sheet, now so fearfully filled up, had been, for some time before the commencement of the session, held up as a sort of carte blanche in which every monopolist might insert just such a tax as he wished levied on the community to encourage his pious labors. If he had understood correctly, all sorts of pilgrims had travelled to the room of the Committee on Manufactures, from the sturdy iron master down to the poor manufacturer of whetstones, all equally clamorous for the protection "of a parental, of an American policy." A friend, in whose veracity and accuracy he had great confidence, had informed him that he had seen, in a paper of one of the cities north of this, a letter from an umbrella maker, in which he boasted of his having successfully used his influence with the committee, to insert an increase of duty on umbrellas, in some way to encourage their manufacture.

The Tariff Bill.

Mr. H. said he would not stop to inquire whether one of these trips to the Seat of Government was as holy as a pilgrimage to Jerusalem or Mecca; but he nevertheless thought that a man might be more worthily employed at home than in journeys having for their object the transfer of other people's money into their own pockets, although the purpose might be most marvellously connected with great considerations of public utility, and the most lofty and spotless patriotism. Even if he was disposed to subscribe to the policy of the bill, he confessed he had serious distrust of its details. He believed that some one who had had the patience to count them, had ascertained that they consisted of nearly 300 items, on which an increase of duty has been laid. He understood that such a lumping revision of a tariff had never been attempted, even in England. There, no alteration in the existing duties ever took place, that was not proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, after it had passed through the scrutiny of the Board of Trade. And even then merchants and manufacturers of intelligence and experience were examined in committee, or at the bar of the House of Commons, as to the practical operation of the contemplated change.

Now, it was a fact, he believed, of universal notoriety, that the Committee on Manufactures had not officially consulted the Secretary of the Treasury; and a bill, either most oppressively to increase or injuriously to diminish our revenue, is about to be passed, without his public sanction. This deficiency had not been supplied by the abundant knowledge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee, (Mr. Ton,) who had been convicted, on more occasions than one, of a gross ignorance of the operation, bearing, and character, of this measure. If it was indeed destined to become a law, it would be some consolation for those who are to suffer from its effects, to believe that they are not the victims of a blundering blindness. The poor wretch who suffers amputation should at least be comforted, under the knife, with a belief that his doctor knows what he is at.

Mr. H. said, after having fatigued the Committee so much, he certainly would refrain from discussing at length the Constitutional question involved in the measure, which the Speaker had rather passed over, than treated with the seriousness it deserves. That the Constitution contains a specific grant of power to encourage manufactures, would not be contended. It has however been found under a power to regulate commerce and to levy imposts. That the framers of the Constitution intended under this clause to confer no such grant, is obvious from the fact of their negating, in Convention, a proposition to insert in that instrument a section giving the power in question, as might be seen by reference to the Journals. Nor can the power be found under the clause giving the grant of authority to levy duties on imports, for the exclusive purposes of revenue. The proposed scheme for the encouragement of manufactures is destructive of that uniformity of taxation which is the imperative precept of the instrument in relation to this power. A brief statement, which has been founded on the calculations of the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston will show in what this uniformity consists. South Carolina will pay, confessedly, not for the purposes of revenue, but for the encouragement of domestic manufactures, on four articles alone, the following sums:

On 18,500 pices of cotton bagging, at $4 32,
amount of duty - - - - -	$79,910
On 2,000 pieces of Osnaburgh, at $5 50,
amount of duty - - - - -	11,000
On 1,350,000 yards of plains, at 11 cents -	148,500
On woollens consumed by white population	324,000
Total - - - - -	$563,410

A tax, without disguise, levied for the avowed purpose of being put into the pockets of the cotton-bagging manufacturers of Kentucky, and the woollen manufacturers of the North. The cunning implication by which you get at this power, only adds a mockery to an unjustifiable wrong. An act providing that South Carolina should pay from her coffers, in specie, the amount of this bounty, would be quite as righteous and Constitutional. But the objects of this Confederacy furnish the true principles for the interpretation of the instrument. We are independent States, and our league merely looks to a common defence, external and internal commerce, an army, navy, judiciary, and the powers necessary to carry these objects into effect. No one member of this Confederacy could have contemplated joining a Union in which "the common defence and general welfare" meant a sacrifice of any part of it, under fanciful and arbitrary considerations of "the good of the whole." We are not a consolidated empire, and consequently we have no right partially to oppress any portion of the States, however trifling may be the interest violated.

But, on the ground of expediency, is it nothing to weaken the attachment of one section of this confederacy to the bond of Union? Is it nothing to shake the confidence of a portion of our people in the integrity and justice of their Government? Is it nothing to sow the seeds of incurable alienation, by producing a belief that, in your policy you rather consult power than right? Ours is a Government of opinion; it is sustained by the affections of its people. The natural ties and charities of human life cannot remain unbroken under a sense of unmerited wrong. The affections of a child to a parent are sometimes snapt asunder by continued acts of injustice and unkindness. Feeble, in comparison with these, is that artificial contrivance, called a Government. Lord North contended, with a plausibility equal at least to the ingenuity which the honorable Speaker has displayed in proving the power in question, that the colonies had a virtual representation. We, nevertheless, are acquainted with the result. Let no man, however, tax me with holding incendiary doctrines. I know that South Carolina will cling to this Union as long as a plank of it floats on the troubled ocean of events. I know her lofty nationality and generous patriotism; but the honorable Speaker, when he makes his appeal to the gentlemen of the South, and calls upon us complacently to witness odious, partial, and undisguised burdens imposed upon our constituents, without even the justification of that expediency which sometimes gives a colorable pretext to injustice, asks from us an unreasonable boon.

In resisting this appeal of the honorable Speaker, Mr. H. said he could not, at the same time, be insensible to the eloquent tribute which the Speaker had paid to those statesmen of the South with whom it had been his fortune to be associated in the interesting events of the late war. The country, he believed, could not forget all that he had done in powerful association with three distinguished individuals from South Carolina, no longer on that floor; a triumvirate which it would be, he feared, presumptuous in the State to hope very soon to furnish as her contingent to the public weal. He would fain hope, too, that his countrymen at home would find some compensation for the Speaker's zealous crusade against their interests in a just recollection of his inestimable services, at an awful crisis, when the existence of this Union was menaced by the agitation of a question of vast and inexpressible interest. But, notwithstanding the character of these recollections, he would say to that honorable gentleman, that the measure he had so strongly advocated was unjustifiable in its principles, offensive in its character, and pernicious in its consequences.

When Mr. HAMILTON had concluded—

Some remarks passed between Mr. MARTINDALE and Mr. HAMILTON.

The question was then taken on Mr. CLARK's motion to reduce the duty on bar iron from $1.12 to 90 cents per ton, and decided in the affirmative—99 to 90.

At this time, and several times in the course of to-day's sitting, motions were made to rise, all which were rejected.

Mr. BRADLEY, of Vermont, then moved to amend the bill by inserting therein the following provision, viz:

"On all books which the importer shall make it satisfactory appear to the collector of the port at which the same shall be entered, were printed previous to the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five, and also on all books printed in other languages than English, four cents per volume.

"On all other books, when bound, forty-five cents per pound.

"On all other books, when in sheets or boards, forty cents per pound."

This motion was negatived without a division.

Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, then moved, as an amendment to the bill: the following, to come in at the end of the 5th section:

"And be it further enacted, That, from and after the — day of — next, the duties now imposed and payable on the wines, herein enumerated and described, shall, at their importation into the United States from any foreign port or place, cease and determine; and, in lieu thereof, the following rates or duties, respectively, shall be laid, levied, and collected, on all such wines, at their said importation, that is to say: Upon all Madeira wines, 70 cents per gallon; upon Sherry, St. Lucar, Lisbon, Oporto, and other wines of Spain and Portugal, not herein enumerated, 50 cents per gallon; on Teneriffe and all other wine of the Canary Islands, 40 cents per gallon; on Fayal and all other wines of the Western islands, 40 cents per gallon; on Sicily wine, 50 cents per gallon; on Malaga wine, 30 cents per gallon; all other wines, not enumerated in this or some other law, when imported in bottles or cases, 50 per cent. ad valorem; on all other wines, when imported otherwise than in bottles or cases, 40 per cent. ad valorem: Provided, That the amount of duty thereupon shall, in no case, exceed 100 cents per gallon."

After some brief debate on this motion, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 110.

Mr. WICKLIFFE then moved to amend the bill by inserting therein the following:

"Be it enacted, That the provisions of the second section of the act of Congress, entitled 'An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage,' approved 27th April, 1816, shall extend and inure to the benefit of schools and colleges within the United States or the Territories thereof, in the same manner (under the like limitations and restrictions provided in said act) in which they apply to seminaries of learning."

This motion was agreed to—ayes 116.

Mr. CLAY then moved to amend the bill by inserting the following:

"On all manufactured copper in sheets and bottoms of every description, three cents per pound."

This motion was negatived—ayes 76.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, then moved to amend the bill by inserting therein the following:

"On brown sugar, two cents per pound; on white clayed or powdered sugar, three cents per pound."

This motion was negatived without debate and without a division.

Mr. FULLER, of Massachusetts, then moved to amend the bill by inserting the following:

"On printed books, thirty-three and one-third cents per lb."

This motion, also, was negatived without a division.

Mr. MILLER then moved to amend the bill by inserting "on mustard in bottles, fifty cents per dozen." This motion was negatived.

Mr. SANDFORD, of Tennessee, then moved to amend the bill by inserting the following:

"And be it further enacted, That no debenture or drawback shall be allowed to any foreigner, who is not an inhabitant of the United States, on any goods, wares, and merchandise, he may have imported into any of the aforesaid United States, or Territories thereof."

This motion was negatived without a division.

Mr. HAYDEN, of New York, then moved to amend the bill by striking out the following: "On wheat flour, fifty cents per hundred weight," and inserting, "On wheat flour, eighty-five cents per one hundred pounds."

This motion was negatived without a division.

Mr. BAYLIES, of Massachusetts, then moved to amend the bill by inserting, "On race ginger, one dollar per hundred weight; on ground ginger, two cents per pound."

This motion was negatived.

Mr. CONNER, of North Carolina, then moved to strike out eighty cents, the proposed minimum valuation of imported woollens, and insert, in lieu thereof, forty cents.

This question was decided in the negative by the Chair, 94 votes to 92; but, a new count being demanded and taken, there were ayes 100, noes 95; so the motion was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. MERCER, of Virginia, then moved to amend the bill by striking out the second section of the bill; which is in the following words:

"And be it further enacted, That, in all cases whatsoever, all articles, composed of various materials, shall pay the highest duty to which articles manufactured from any of such materials are subject."

This motion was, after considerable debate, decided in the negative—99 to 94.

Mr. MERCER then moved to strike out of the bill the 30th day of June, (the day on which the bill is to go into operation,) so as to defer it to a later day; which motion was negatived—92 votes to 89.

Mr. VAN WYCK then moved to amend the bill by inserting, in lieu of the duty on woollens, to take place after 30th June, 1825, the following:

"Afterwards a duty of thirty-five per centum ad valorem, until the 30th day of June, 1827; afterwards a duty of forty per centum ad valorem, until the 30th day of June, 1829; afterwards a duty of forty-five per centum ad valorem, until the 30th day of June, 1831; and, after that time, a duty of fifty per centum ad valorem."

This amendment was negatived without a division.

Mr. LIVINGSTON then moved to strike out the whole of the proviso which proposes a minimum valuation on imported woollens.

The question on this motion was taken without debate, and decided in the negative—ayes 73.

Mr. BARTLETT, of New Hampshire, moved, at the close of the first section of the bill, to insert a duty on all domestic distilled spirits, of fifty cents per gallon, with a declaration of an intention to propose a drawback on such as should be exported.

Mr. STORRS suggested the necessity of provision, with such an amendment, for officers to collect the duty, &c.

Mr. BARTLETT said his object was merely to introduce the subject in Committee of the Whole, so that he might be able to introduce the motion, with all its necessary details, when the bill should come before the House.

Mr. FORSYTH suggested that a proposition of this sort, for an excise duty, could not, with propriety, be introduced into a bill proposing a duty on imports.

The motion was negatived without a division.

Mr. CRAIG moved to amend the bill, by striking out the proposed duty of four cents per lb. on white and red lead, and inserting a duty of five cents on that article.

The question on this motion was decided in the negative without a division.

Mr. CLAY rose to speak in explanation on one or two points which had been touched upon in debate.

The question was taken on the Committee's rising and reporting the bill, with the amendments made to it, and determined in the affirmative. The Speaker resumed the chair, and the report was made from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FORSYTH then gave notice that he should, to-morrow, move for the indefinite postponement of the whole subject, and require the yeas and nays on the question.

And then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 7.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General, accompanied by a statement prepared in obedience to the resolution of this House, directing him to state "the amount of defalcations in his department, which accrued previous to July, 1823, and which were not sued for, as directed by the 29th section of the act regulating the Post Office Establishment, designating the years when each accrued, and not to extend beyond sixteen years; and the amount of such deficiencies as have been charged against the Postmaster General of the United States;" which letter and statement were laid on the table.

Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the benefit of Alfred Moore and Sterling Orgain, assignees of Morris Linsey," and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Samuel Cleveland, jr., accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The select committee, to which was referred the petition of John Cleves Symmes and Thomas S. Hinde, were discharged from the consideration thereof, and the petition was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FORSYTH, by leave of the House, presented a report and resolutions adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Georgia, in relation to the running and marking the boundary line between that State and the State of Alabama; which report and resolutions were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The House took up, and proceeded to consider, the resolution submitted by Mr. WARFIELD, yesterday; and, the same being read, it was, on motion of Mr. TRACY, laid on the table.

Mr. FORSYTH laid the following resolution on the table for consideration on to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House the proposals made, through General Jackson, by the Path-Killer and his chiefs, of the Cherokee tribe of Indians, in the year 1820 or 1821, to make a cession of their lands to the United States, together with any other propositions made in relation to the subject, of which he may be possessed.

Mr. GAZLAY laid the following resolution on the table for consideration on to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether the 5th section of the act relating to a township of land lying within John Cleves Symmes' patent, and passed 3d March, 1803, has been executed; and, if not, what reasons have prevented the execution of the same.

Mr. BARTLETT moved the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of imposing a tax upon domestic distilled spirits, and of providing, by law, for the collection of the same.

The question was taken, Will the House consider the resolution? and determined in the negative.

An engrossed bill, providing for the appointment of two Indian agents, in addition to those already provided for, and fixing their compensation, was read the third time, and passed.

Ordered, That the title be "An act providing for the appointment of an agent for the Osage Indians, west of the State of Missouri, and Territory of Arkansas, and for other purposes," and that the Clerk do carry the said bill to the Senate, and ask their concurrence therein.

The engrossed bill "providing for the appointment of an agent to reside with the Osage Indians," was read a third time, passed, and sent to the Senate.

A message was received from the Senate, notifying that they insist on their amendment to the Naval Appropriation bill, which was to strike out the specification of the items to which the contingent fund is to be applied, leaving it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy; and ask a conference upon the subject.

On motion of Mr. McLANE, the House resolved to insist on their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate; agreed to the conference, and a committee of five were appointed to meet the committee appointed on behalf of the Senate.

Mr. OWEN, of Alabama, rose, and asked of the Chair, whether a resolution, moved by himself, calling for certain information from the Treasury Department, respecting the two and three per cent. funds arising from the sales of public lands in the several States, had been transmitted to the proper Department; and, if so, whether an answer had been received.

The SPEAKER said the resolution had, doubtless, been forwarded by the proper officer of the House, and, if an answer had been returned, it would have been laid before the House.

Mr. OWEN said, then, of course the information called for by the resolution, had not, as yet, been furnished.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole to the tariff bill.

Mr. FORSYTH rose and withdrew the intimation, yesterday given, of his intention now to move the indefinite postponement of the bill. This he did at the suggestion of several members (contrary to his previous impression,) that the features of the bill were not sufficiently fixed by votes in Committee of the Whole, as to determine all the members to vote decisively for or against the rejection of the bill in its present state. He should therefore defer his motion until the question had been settled as to the amount of duties to be proposed on the leading articles, wool, cotton and iron.

The Clerk then read the several amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole. And the question being on concurring in the first amendment, (reducing the minimum on woollens, from 80 to 40 cents the square yard.)

Mr. TOD, of Pennsylvania, rose and addressed the Chair, as follows:

Mr. Speaker: It was the intention of the Committee of Manufactures that no more of the time of the House should be taken up by any of them, in this debate. Such was generally, I believe, the wish and intention of the friends of the bill. But now some few things appear almost necessary to be said. One thing, perhaps, requires to be repeated; that the measure here proposed is not designed chiefly to promote the profit of manufacturers, but, through manufactures, to relieve the poverty and distresses of the agricultural portion of the country. Petitions and addresses are no proof of distress. That is admitted. Yet, there is a certain extremity of poverty, which, spreading over a great extent of country, wants no proof but the notoriety of the fact. Every one knows that some great portions of this Union are almost exclusively agricultural; that, with few exceptions, they can have nothing wherewith to purchase manufactures, but grain, or the products of grain. It is evident that an agricultural, grain-raising people, importing the manufactured necessities of life from countries which refuse to take, in return, the only articles they have to dispose of, and for which articles they have no other market, must inevitably be poor, and in debt. Statistical recorded facts will of themselves give proof. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) has observed, that the years of former prosperity, selected by the honorable Speaker from his statements of exportation, were probably those most favorable to the argument. Take, then, a different set of years. Take five years together, those of 1790, '91, '92, '93, and '94. The yearly average quantity of grain and flour exported for those five years, was 1,421,335 barrels. The commercial statements of that day do not give the value. But Mr. Pitkin has calculated the value for 1792 at $7,649,887.

Our population, in 1790, was about four millions. In the present times, for the last three years, our exportation of every species of grain and flour has been as follows:

1821	Barrels, 1,360,453	Value, $5,184,999
1822	1,098,768	6,327,510
1823	1,074,528	6,263,237

Yearly average, 1,177,949 Av. val. $5,925,249

The Tariff Bill.

APRIL, 1824.

Our population has now reached to ten millions, and let it not be forgotten, that, during those times when we exported breadstuffs to the amount of $7,649,887, the whole agricultural grain-exporting population of the United States did not, probably, equal the present population of one single State. By far the greatest proportion of our increase of numbers, since 1790, has been to the grain-raising population of the country. Large States and Territories, which are now the most fertile in grain, have been since that time acquired, or were then a wilderness. A few people might then have been encamped in the West, but, to all the purposes of this argument, the States of Kentucky, Ohio, Tennessee, Indiana, and Illinois, have been since settled. So, probably, one half of the grain-raising parts of Virginia, Vermont, Maine, Georgia. Add, not Territories only, but States, since acquired, and now cultivated. Add the improvements in agriculture, mills, roads, and in all the facilities of production and transportation. I will not dispute about particular items and sums. Whatever deduction any gentleman thinks he can in conscience ask for, let him make it, and he will find that our country could now, were there any adequate market, raise and export five times the amount of grain we exported thirty or thirty-four years ago. It is not, perhaps, extravagant to say, that those parts of the single State of New York, which have been settled during the last thirty-four years, are now capable of raising and exporting more grain than was exported from the whole United States in 1790. Thus, with all this increase of numbers and capacity, almost beyond calculation, our exports of grain are reduced from $7,649,887 to $5,925,249; while the importation of foreign manufactures has been increasing with the decrease of the facilities of payment.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) has seemed to question whether this diminution of exports shows any diminution of prosperity. On that head, let it be observed, that the most vehement of the opposers of this bill are so because they apprehend that, at some future day, the effects of the measure may be to prevent the exportation of some part of their staple commodity, cotton. Then they, at any rate, put no very great practical faith in this opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts. They show their idea to be that, as to cotton at least, "agriculture without a market" may be an inconvenience. We indeed believe that their fears are most groundless in supposing that domestic manufactures are to lessen the demand for cotton. We believe the exactly reverse effect to be most inevitable. But they are clearly right in insisting that a defect of market must be certainly hurtful. For, beyond all doubt, those who purchase abroad, without the means of payment abroad, must suffer every description of pecuniary vexation.

Now, in one case, without descending into the odious particulars of misfortune, I would ask whether any one imagines that such reduction of almost all the means of decent living, as is shown by our commercial records, can fall upon such multitudes of people, without oppression? An oppression the more intolerable, because it is produced solely by the policy of our own Government. The victims of it have not, since the close of the war, ceased to petition. They complain that the only surplus products they can have to dispose of are shut out from foreign markets, particularly by the very countries whose manufactures we consume. They show that our own country has, within itself, all the means of producing these manufactures, without paying for them one cent of tribute to foreigners; and that, if the policy of our Government should be only so far changed as to secure to them the privilege of supplying with provisions and with the raw materials, the workmen employed in the fabrication of articles which they, the agriculturists of our country, themselves consume, they might be relieved from their present absolute exhaustion, and be enabled to enjoy, in part, at least, the prosperity they were accustomed to during the general war in Europe. They show that, to protect manufactures, is to protect agriculture, and that protection, to answer any valuable purpose to the country, must be a liberal and bold protection, placing our manufactures not only beyond the reach of foreign competition, but beyond the fears of it. They show that they ask nothing new, nothing visionary or untried. And they prove, by the invariable examples of nations, that the dependence of any country, exclusively, upon its own agricultural and manufacturing industry, is the sure beaten high road to private wealth and national power. With these complaints, and these proofs, suffering, for years together, distresses produced solely by the national policy, which, under any other than a Republican Government, might create an insurrection, these petitioners, coming here, the only place where relief can be had, are, it seems, to be told, "Honest friends, you have altogether mistaken your case; we see you are worn to the bone, sure enough; but it all comes out of your independent banks and your stop-laws." Thus, with much gravity, it is to be attempted to make us believe that the plain and palpable consequences of the distress of the country, are not the consequences, but the causes of it. Worse than all that—we are to be consoled with scraps from the metaphysical books of the economists, and it seems an experiment is to be made upon our understandings, whether we are composed of exactly that sort of stuff as to think ourselves fully compensated for the severest extremity of actual poverty, by imaginary and metaphysical relief, and by the abracadabra of "let us alone," and "get rich by making nothing, selling nothing, but buying where you can buy cheapest."

The matter and substance of the remarks upon our application for relief, have not been much helped by the manner, as far as respects the observation of one gentleman—I mean the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON.) Some of those observations I did not hear. The gentleman from South Carolina, no doubt, believed me to be present. I ought to have been present. The truth is, when the gentleman from South Carolina came to a part of his speech in which he seemed to be commencing a dissertation upon the useful and sublime discoveries of the political economists, calling them, or some of them, immortal, &c., thinking I had heard all these matters before, I concluded nothing would be lost by my going to the committee-room upon some committee business, and stayed, perhaps, longer than I intended. The gentleman from South Carolina charged the Committee of Manufactures, very directly, with gross ignorance of their business; that the chairman of that committee had been repeatedly convicted of gross ignorance. I mention this matter because it is connected with something more material, and not for the sake of any personal complaint. Besides, the gentleman from South Carolina has already explained that part of his observations. It is proper to take this occasion to say, that the Committee of Manufactures have not yet made pretensions to any superior learning. As to myself, I know, perhaps, better than the gentleman from South Carolina, my own inadequacy to this station. It is a station which was not sought for, nor wished for, by me. It certainly found me very unprepared. Much was to be learned; and, no doubt, much yet remains unlearned. But my humility goes no further. It is not admitted that the great cause of domestic industry has suffered from any insufficiency of the Committee of Manufactures. It was their business to know our own laws upon the subject, and all the changes before made in them: also to know from what countries and in what quantities we draw our supply of manufactured articles; to know, also, how they can be paid for, and what commodities of this country are prohibited or permitted to be sent in return; and to know, further, the capacity or incapacity of the several parts of our own country to furnish a supply for our own population.

If the committee know these things, and if they have sense enough to make the proper use of information furnished by practical men, or by experienced officers of Government, communicated to the House heretofore, and to follow, with due precaution, a bill drawn up by abler men, and approved and passed at a former session, by a majority of this House, it is perhaps enough. We admit it to be the business of the committee to be able to know and to do all these things. But it is not admitted that we are bound to know all the usages, nor even all the regulations of foreign countries, nor to know the particular names of all the places in each foreign country, from which manufactured articles are imported. Even if we did know all these things, (which I for one, do not pretend to,) it is not certain that it would have been thought worth while to make a display of our learning. Very minute information is apt to be a very dull matter. We have heard, at some length, the particulars of a story relative to a bull. Have the gentlemen who are disposed to catechize upon these little points, ever heard a certain other story, how upon a time, a certain town corporation had convened upon public matters. The proposition was to banish all the dogs—upon some alarm; it is immaterial what. One Alderman, when it came to his turn to speak, said, that he very much approved of the plan so far, but suggested, that, in his opinion, to act understandingly upon the subject, they should first appoint a committee to ascertain the names of the dogs. Sir, all these niceties of detail do not appear to be wanted to understand the great question whether the industry of our own country is to be preferred to that of foreign nations. The gentleman from South Carolina was pleased to say, as I am informed, that the Committee of Manufactures had been surrounded by blackguards—as I understand the word was—congregated blackguards, each one thrusting his share into the bill; and much more, in the same style. [Here Mr. HAMILTON explained, denied that his language was so applied, said he had spoken of the ruffians sent from a distant manufactory to disturb the meeting at New York.] Mr. TON—As to the disturbance of the New York meeting, if the gentleman from South Carolina had been attentive to the publications on the subject, he would have seen a refutation of the charge of the attendance of the Paterson manufacturers at the New York meeting, supported by proof so conclusive, that I believe it never has been, and never will be, controverted, showing the charge to be a mere fabrication of the same stamp, and for the same purpose, with that pretended letter from this city, published in sundry newspapers, and stating, Down with commerce! to be the cry here of the friends of the Tariff.

As to the persons who have attended the Committee of Manufactures, on the invitation of the committee, or without invitation, it is due to them and to us to say, that they have all been citizens of our country, and gentlemen of good appearance and good credit. And it may be further said, that among the few of them who had any particular interest and manufacture of their own to promote, there has been scarcely one who has not gone away disappointed.

There is a part of the speech of the gentleman from South Carolina, which he has not attempted to explain, and which, not for our own sake, but for the sake of the cause which we advocate, it becomes our duty to protest against. I understand he closed his personal comments on the Committee of Manufactures with a defiance, that, if any gentleman thought himself insulted, he knew where to come for satisfaction, or words of equivalent import. I do not happen to remember that a single word had been said by any one of the Committee of Manufactures against the gentleman from South Carolina, or against any one of those writers called the political economists. There has been no such complaint, nor pretence of complaint. If any severity of comment has been made use of on our side, it came from others. Now, this may be according to rule, but it appears rather odd that all the quarrel, all the provocation, all the insult, whatever it is, and the challenge to boot, should come all from one side; and that a gentleman, by nothing but his own speech, should undertake to fret himself into a passion first, and then into a fight. The gentleman from South Carolina has also thought proper to inform us that he was in the army in the late war. It may be remembered that, in this debate, or some other in the House lately, a gentleman has been mentioned, called Don Quixote. I learn that his practice was to go upon the high road, with sword and pistol, and insist upon fighting with peaceable travellers, unless they would confess, off hand, that, of all fair ladies, there was none in the country to be compared with a certain friend of his, one Dulcinea—I forget the rest of the name, and never was good at remembering long names—perhaps it will not be considered material. I do confess myself to be one of those who, rather than have a duel with Quixote, would say any thing almost for Dulcinea, to the best of my knowledge; and, in preference to a quarrel with the gentleman from South Carolina, I should, if it could be done with any sort of conscience, be most strongly tempted to go as far for the wisdom of the political economists, as I would for the beauty of Dulcinea. Formerly, it is said, the law was, that, when disputes arose, and a cause happened to come up, very hard to comprehend, such puzzling case was to be settled by a mode of decision, called, in the law style of that day, a trial by battle, the very sort of trial which the gentleman from South Carolina seems to prefer. A party might fight his cause by himself, or by his attorney, called, in that process, his champion. Now I give notice that I will not be the champion for this tariff bill, particularly since the amendments. Should I ever change my mind, and agree to enter the lists with the gentleman from South Carolina, I solemnly promise to release him from the oath against the employment of all conjuration and witchcraft. To be more serious, it is a mode of decision which I have never studied. It is not what I was sent here for. It would be conceding what might prove a very injurious advantage. It is a call to a sort of honor which I do not want. I live, and am glad of it, in a part of the country where what little respectability a man may chance to have, needs no such propping—nor does the cause of domestic industry require any such support. If it does, I for one, have no ambition to be a martyr to the best tariff that ever was devised. Besides, it is no discredit to the gentleman from South Carolina to say, that he greatly over-rates his own importance, as well as mine, if he supposes any thing we can do can settle the question. I have other very good reasons. I have, perhaps, mentioned enough. If the gentleman from South Carolina is determined to have a personal contest upon this tariff, he shall not have it with me, without an actual attack.

The gentleman from South Carolina has thought proper to take this occasion to applaud some distinguished citizens of his State. Some of them are living, and too near to make it worth while for me to enter into a discussion of their characters. On the memory of Mr. Lowndes I could go, in the way of encomium, perhaps farther than the gentleman from South Carolina. I have frequently heard him in this House—I have known him out of it. I speak not for the purpose of pre-sending any contrast, but give my opinion, often declared in the hearing of some who now hear me, that Mr. Lowndes was a statesman, who has not left his superior in this nation, nor scarcely his equal. Every one who remembers Mr. Lowndes, remembers that, with talents almost beyond the lot of mortality, and seeing nothing about him but respect and veneration, yet a man more unassuming never entered this House. There was nothing pompous in him, no blustering, no rant. Of one thing only did he ever appear ignorant, and of that always most grossly ignorant—that was, the magnitude of his own powers. If this was a defect in that great man, it was a defect which, I must say, his successor does appear most happily exempt from. To end this matter: I have lived longer than the gentleman from South Carolina, and have, probably, seen more of the events and turns of life, and more of mankind, and have some right to say to him, that he must have been young when he entered into the army, too young to profit at that school, and young when he came out of it; that, in one sense, he is young still, and has much yet to learn, or he will die young. If I have thought it my duty to protest, with some earnestness, against the course which the gentleman from South Carolina has thought fit to take in this debate, it is not that I have suspected any thing in him invidious or malicious. On the contrary, I have no objection to assent, with those who know him better, to the usual frankness of his disposition, and am willing to believe that he exhibits an ardor of feeling, and a vivacity, which, at some day, with a great deal of cultivation and discipline, may render him not a useless defender of the interests of his country.

There is one objection to this bill, which seems to require peculiar notice; an objection that has been most vehemently pressed upon us by gentlemen here, and by memorials and publications without number; the destruction of commerce and the navy. Not in this House, to be sure, have the friends of domestic manufactures been directly charged with the intention and design of destroying trade and commerce; it is only contended that such destruction must be the certain effect. But out of doors our opponents are not quite so generous. There, we are represented as a rustic, envious, malignant, and unprincipled combination, making agriculture and manufactures a mere pretence for the ruin of trade and the navy. It is degrading to plead guilty to such a charge, but the falsehood of it must be shown.

The late war was a war for commerce only. It was not provoked by any injury but to our trade and to our people connected with, and in pursuit of, trade and navigation. Our territory was not touched—our citizens on shore were not molested. That able paper of the declaration of war mentions, for its causes, no outrages but those to commerce and seamen, except the miserable business of John Henry, which, in very doubtful and indefinite language, appears to have been stuck in by way of amendment. The sections of our country, always foremost and unanimous in asking protection for domestic industry, and here assailed as enemies to foreign trade, suffered their full share of whatever there was of hardship or disaster in that war for commerce. It will be admitted that, in paying taxes, in marching against the enemy, and here, by their representatives, they did never, for one moment, shrink from the conflict, in the darkest of times; and it is not extravagant to say that, under God, to the firmness of these people, now calumniated as the sordid malignant enemies of commercial wealth, does foreign commerce owe every solid, sure, and established right it now enjoys; and, from their devotion to the interests of the whole, their contempt for the low and selfish principles upon which this bill is opposed, does it come that we now have a flag that can protect foreign trade, and that we are not, abroad, the common plunder of the world.

Yet it would not have been surprising, in that war for commerce, on occasions of extreme gloom and disaster, which often happened, if some timid few, or some demagogue, anxious to get himself into Congress, by supplanting some of those who had voted for the war, had attempted to inflame the minds of those people against such vexatious war, supported by their blood and their money, to revenge injuries done to foreign trade. But even that never happened, nor was the man found among them who, at any time, would declare his willingness to give up the contest without securing the commercial rights for which it was entered into; and, since the war, they will be found to have adhered to the same principles of attachment to the commercial interest. No matter how their requests have been received; no matter from what selfish motives their interests have been disregarded, if, from the whole immense agricultural population that now demands a tariff of protection, a single vote, in the House, can be found to have been given against any plan for extending or protecting foreign commerce, or against building ships, or providing naval materials, or sending embassies to promote trade, or squadrons to the Pacific ocean or Mediterranean sea, or any other sea, or any other of the immense expenses of foreign trade, let that vote be produced, and, as far as it goes, let it be set down to enmity to commerce—but I believe no such vote can be found.

Does any gentleman imagine that our people who sustained that commercial war with such steadiness and spirit, did so in pursuance of doctrines such as we have here now? or dreaming that, in case of success, they themselves were to be excluded from every possible benefit of it? or, after exerting themselves to the utmost, and risking every thing, they should come to the merchant, reinstated in their rights by their aid and their fidelity, with their hemp, their iron, and their lead, and say to him, "We have no customers but you. If we raise grain, we have no market for it. There is nothing we can sell but the things we have here;" and be told by the merchant, "True; your hemp is water rotted and strong; your iron is tough, and good for cannon and anchors and shipbolts; but it is all country make. And, friends, you don't understand the new light of political economy—it is only when you come in the capacity of purchasers that we can deal with you. We employ the workmen and farmers of England, Wales, and Russia, and we think, in the long run, we can save something to ourselves by it. You have never read Adam Smith. Every man for himself, is the only thing for the country. Here it is in the book. In this way we enrich ourselves, as we know; and we make the nation rich, as the book shows. No monopoly, no restriction, except in our favor. Let us alone, until another war. When the doctrine of Algiers comes next into fashion, with the naval Powers of Europe, or any one of them, you may then have just so much interest in navigation, as to pay taxes and do the fighting for it." Surely no manufacturing or agricultural man, in that war for commerce, could have been slave and fool enough to contend in the cause, had he imagined that there was no community of interests in this nation; no advantage by commerce but to the merchant; no helping of each other; or, if he had foreseen, what has since actually happened, that the very peace and commerce contended for, with such profusion of money and of blood, should, with the exception of some trifle of profit to a handful of merchants, produce, after all, nothing but prosperity to foreign nations, and chiefly to Great Britain, with whom we contended, and nothing but destruction and death to three-fourths of the agricultural, grain-raising, and manufacturing interests of our own country.

There is one species of commerce which we avow ourselves opposed to. It is that which is employed in bringing from abroad, for our consumption, those common necessities of life which we can produce at home, lead, glass, iron, hemp, and at least one half our present supply of imported cotton and woollen goods. And here arises a dispute with the advocates of commerce. We say we are beggared and undone by these importations—that the nations which send them to us will not take in return any thing we have to spare. We say, that, to make all these things at home, will take nothing from us but grain and things which we at present know not what to do with; while we are utterly exhausted by buying them from foreigners. The men of commerce contend, that, to supply us with these articles, is one of their perquisites. They claim it as a right, not, as they say, altogether for their own profit, but because the commercial interests of the country and the Navy in a great measure depend upon it. Now examine the case, and see if this trade of importation of goods ought to be upheld for the benefit of the merchant, or for any other purpose. First, the very freight, the benefit so much talked of, is not confined exclusively to our own citizens, nor to our own ships. About one-eighth or one-seventh of the importations which such a clamor is made about the profits of, are by foreigners, in foreign ships, and this even in time of peace. In times of war with any naval Power, even that miserable advantage of freight will certainly go, almost entirely, with the rest of the profits, to foreigners.

Even if it could be secured entirely to our own merchants, it would be no sort of indemnity for the evils of the trade. Observe, I speak only of those things which we may have made at home, of our own materials. But, if made at home, there is no freight or profit to the importer. He seems to think it very reasonable that we should agree to pay one hundred dollars to foreigners, in order that he may gain a profit of ten dollars, or fifteen. On this head, let it be remembered, that it has been often said, and never, as I know, denied, that more than half of all the importations of manufactures from Europe, are by foreigners themselves, directly on their own account, and vended here by themselves or their agents. From that fact the true nature of all this alarm about the trade and the Navy of the country may be understood. So far from agreeing that the naval power of the country depends upon the consumption of foreign goods in preference to the domestic, I contend that all we hear about the destruction of trade and the Navy, by checking the importation of dry goods, means nothing more than the diminishing the profits of the importer. Are we to believe that these merchants are seriously apprehensive only for navigation and the Navy? Why, sir, it has been during this very session of Congress, that the deplorable case of our spermaceti whale fishery has been presented to us; the noblest nursery and school of the noblest seamen perhaps on the globe, comprising two years ago, 142 ships, and 3,100 seamen—a quantity of tonnage double or thrice that employed in the trade of importing all the woollen and linen goods, and cutlery, and hemp, and lead, and glass, and leghorn hats, that we get from Europe; and a body of men perhaps combining a greater mass of nautical skill, hardihood of body and mind, devotion to country, discipline, self-command, and obedience, than was brought into action on both sides, in the battle of the Nile—all now dwindling, perishing, on the point of extinction. But has any one ever heard of any Chamber of Commerce, or any merchants, or any of their advocates, interfering with us, or any where else, in favor of this perishing whale fishery?—they, who can snuff danger a mile off, to the Navy and to the navigation, when it threatens to stop the importation of a yard of calico, or a hob nail: and who, almost before the bill for the protection of domestic industry can be printed, are here with their remonstrances. I complain not of the merchants. They wish us to import the necessities of life, instead of making them at home. They are right; for, by it, they gain their freight and profit. They wish to go far for our supply, and they are right; for the farther they go the less chance there is of competition, and the greater the chance of profit. Hence, all that outcry, some years ago, against the protection of domestic cottons, and the exclusion of cheap muslins from the East Indies. I repeat it, the merchants are right. They act just as Providence intended they should act, taking care of their own interest, and adhering to that solely. They were created for this purpose, and all very good. There is no possible harm in it; because Providence intended also to give to the men of the land sense enough to take some little care of themselves, and, when they are the immense majority of a nation, not suffer themselves to be made beggars in order to make nobles of a few merchants; not suffer all their resources to be exhausted in paying for foreign goods, that the merchant may be enriched by the profits of transporting them.

The land part, the agricultural part of a nation like this, Providence intended to be supreme. Our country is the land. Every thing permanent is on the land. Yet the commercial interest is to be cherished. Certainly it is; but not with such extravagant devotion as to make ourselves tributaries and slaves to foreign industry. If, indeed, we found ourselves thus picked to the bone, and consumed by our own citizens for their own benefit, and if the means and resources of our own country were increased by exhausting us; that is, suppose it to be the case that some sections of our country should supply us with manufactured goods, as Europe does now, and, thus supplying us, suppose they by some means should refuse to take from us, in exchange, the chief articles we have to give, our grain, our flour, and agricultural productions, though we could afford them at half the price which they would be obliged to pay for them at home—in that situation, impossible, indeed, under our form of Government—but which, if it was the very actual fact, would, indeed, as to all purposes of individual poverty and oppression, leave us exactly as we are now—yet then we should have the consolation to know that what caused weakness and depression to us, produced some wealth and power to our country. But there is nothing of that in our case. Our distress is more bitter from the reflection that we are exhausted for the purpose of giving affluence and power to strangers, to aliens, to rivals, to enemies. And so far from helping the case, it is an aggravation and an insult to be told by our own merchants that we ought to submit tamely to be devoured by foreign industry, because some of the crumbs, one miserable tenth part of the plunder, may go, by way of freight and profits, into the pockets of the merchants.

As to fact and experience, there is not now, nor was there ever since the world began, a country possessing commerce and naval power, and maintaining them by the importation of foreign commerce; nor is there any possible connexion between naval power and consuming foreign goods. We import nothing, which can be strictly called manufactured goods, from the Island of Cuba; we import none such from Hayti; yet we have more ships and more tonnage employed in the trade with these islands than we employ in the importation of goods from all parts of Great Britain. Further, the only considerable articles, the importation of which is likely to be diminished by this tariff, are woollen and cotton goods, iron, lead, hemp, hempen and linen goods, and Leghorn hats. We know the quantity and weight of iron, lead, and hemp, imported, and what tonnage they employ; and we may, by estimate, come near enough to the amount of tonnage employed in importing those other goods. Then, sir, let any gentleman make the calculation; let him set it down that all these importations are in our own ships, which is not the fact, and that they will always continue in our own ships, and no war ever molest us; let him set it down that, by excluding a part of these things, we are to import nothing instead of them; that our domestic manufactures are never to be exported, and their prosperity to have no beneficial effect upon the wealth, and of course upon the commerce of the country, and what will it all amount to? Why, sir, he will find that the loss of tonnage, by the diminished importation of woollen and cotton goods, iron, lead, hemp, hempen and linen goods, and Leghorn hats, cannot, by any tolerable mode of calculation, be made to reach anyways near the amount of our tonnage now employed in the importation of the three articles of molasses, coffee, and tea.

I pray, then, that we may have an end to this charge of hostility to commerce; there is not solidity enough in it for a congregation from the wharves of a city. To import the necessities of life, which may be produced at home, is not commerce; it is the worst abuse of commerce; it is to be the victim of commerce. We declare ourselves to be the friends of commerce, when we profess ourselves the friends of industry on shore; they may consist together—indeed they may stand better together. We are not bound to choose between them; if we were, I should say that the land is our home, and not the sea. I should say that internal wealth and manufacturing industry can of themselves create commerce. Without them commerce is precarious; liable to total destruction in the first war with any first, second, or third rate naval Power of Europe. With them commerce is imperishable. Sink every ship, public and private, in the ocean—with domestic industry, and freedom from foreign tribute, we can be able, in less than five years' time, to replace them all. But why rely on argument? I repeat it, we have experience to go by, and the actual fact that every commercial nation in Europe, without exception, is prosperous exactly in proportion to the vigilance with which it protects its own manufacturing industry, by excluding the foreign, and puts down this spurious, pernicious commerce of importation of manufactured goods. As to the island of Great Britain, the first commercial country of the world, everybody knows that not only her wealth, but her salvation, is supposed to depend upon her naval power and her commerce, both of which it has been her chief aim for ages to promote. If any interest predominates in that country, it is the commercial interest. Yet no temptation of cheapness, no employment or encouragement of shipping or seamen, no argument of the political economists, has ever induced her for one day, since her naval ascendancy, to permit the importation of any article for domestic use which domestic industry could possibly be made to produce. France, probably the second naval Power of Europe, follows the same policy with the same success. So other countries; and from their examples, and from the contrary examples of weak and miserable nations, we may learn and may know, that to employ commerce to supersede home manufacture, by the importation of foreign goods, is ultimately as destructive to the naval power as it is to the domestic industry of a country.

Gentlemen have apprehended the resentment of foreign nations if we discontinue the use of their manufactures. They ask, Will not Great Britain retaliate? The same gentlemen are very unanimous in denouncing what is called the system of restrictions, the system of exclusion of the foreign, and protection of the home industry. They say it is despotic, useless, pernicious. That it can serve no possible purpose but that of mischief, and destruction to commerce, trade, and the Navy. They say that not only all the philosophers and economists of England condemn it, but the speakers in Parliament, the committees of the Commons denounce it; that the opinions of Lord Bacon, and of all the statesmen of that great country, from time immemorial, have all gone out of fashion; and that, since the light of the economists has sprung up, the Government and the nation are tired of the present destructive system, and watching the first opportunity to rid themselves of it. Further, they say that England has acquired her wealth and power, not by her restrictions, not by her protection of domestic industry, not by her manufactures, but in spite of them all; and that the truest estimate of the balance of trade, and criterion of national wealth, is, not what a nation fabricates and sends abroad, but what she imports. In fine, that England is very unhappy, from having started her system before the new light of modern times; while we, by following the dogmas of the economists, are in the high road of prosperity. Very good. Then, it seems, England is to be very much hurt if we presume to beggar ourselves by the passage of this tariff bill. The English will show resentment if we do all we can to relieve them from the effects of a system which they are anxious to abandon; which they find to be pernicious; and, most dreadful of all, they are sure to be grievously offended at our destruction of our own Navy. I despair of throwing any light upon such arguments, and quit them with one word. It appears worse than idle to apprehend, in the British Government, such a silly malignity as to resent our attempting to do a part of our own work, to relieve our own distresses, and give employment to our own people. Does any one among us feel resentment against the British Government, for their policy, which extracts from us a voluntary tribute of so many millions a year? Do we think ourselves injuriously treated, because Great Britain refuses to take from us our grain and flour cheaper than she can produce them herself? Every one knows the prodigious efforts made, and the immense expenses incurred, by Great Britain, for the restoration of the royal family of France. They succeeded, at last, and restored the Bourbons to the throne. If ever England had a fair title to a great foreign customer, here certainly was one;

and how gladly British policy would have seized this occasion to break down the new manufacturing establishments of France, particularly the cottons, every one may judge. Yet the French Government was deaf to all terms for the admission of British manufactures. One of the first acts of power, by the restored Government, was, to protect the industry of their own nation, by excluding British competition. Did this produce in England any resentment, or any complaint? Never any, that we know of. It may be said, and I believe has been said, somewhere, that the French Government, newly seated in power, were deterred from admitting foreign manufactures, through fear of popular displeasure. How that may be, we cannot pretend to know. But let it be so. What a lesson ought it to give us. The populace of France, whom we sometimes affect to consider as not the deepest thinkers—France, the chief nest of the brood of political economists, and of the advocates for buying always where you can buy the cheapest—they, it seems, could have firmness of purpose and forethought sufficient to resist the temptation of buying cheap foreign goods, some of them, particularly the cottons, at a price very greatly below what they could be had for at home, and could forego a present advantage for the sake of futurity. Largely, indeed, have they been indemnified for the temporary loss occasioned by this wise protection of the rising manufactures of the country, by a subsequent prosperity, almost unexampled.

Are we, then, to be led away by the words, freedom of trade, monopoly, restriction, and every man gaining most for the nation who gains most for himself? They are all mere words, mere sound, as applicable to this argument. Sir, Government is restriction; laws are restriction. It is for the sake of restriction, and for combining and directing the parts for the good of the whole, that men enter into society. It is only by restriction that we can meet the unanimity and discipline of foreign nations. As well in time of war might it be insisted on that soldiers should fire and load, and advance and retreat, each one according to his own discretion, under pretence that every man who does best for himself does best for the army.

It is apprehended that the encouragement of domestic industry will injure the public revenue. We admit that our present revenue is derived chiefly from the duties on importations. Yet I trust it will be admitted on the other side, that the consumption of foreign goods is not the only means of raising the revenue. And further, I trust, it will be admitted, that while the nation exists, and while our people are wealthy and prosperous, there never can be a want of revenue to support the credit or defence of the country. There must be taxes. The question is only as to the preferable mode of taxation. The tax on imported manufactures is paid by the people, the consumers. It is said to be a concealed tax, and therefore paid willingly. Let it be that it is paid willingly. I deny that it is paid ignorantly. Now, then, let us in a few words, with an eye constantly to the bill before us, examine the soundness of this policy which is contended for with such gravity by some, and with such heat by others, of importing, for the sake of revenue, manufactures from abroad which we are capable of producing at home. For that portion of woollen and cotton goods, hempen and linen goods, iron, hemp, lead, glass, and Leghorn hats, now imported from abroad, and which will be excluded and supplied by domestic industry, if this bill becomes a law, we now pay to foreigners, say ten millions of dollars a year. These articles, on their importation, afford, on the average, to the revenue, a tax, say of twenty-five per cent. This tax is paid by the people of the country, the consumers of the goods. It amounts to $2,500,000; which sum goes into the public treasury. Clearly, the people of the country not only pay this tax, but in paying it they have also to pay the prices of the articles, the ten millions of dollars original purchase money. They must pay, also, the importer's profits, the merchant's profits, the freight, the insurance—not, probably, less, altogether, than twenty-five per cent. on the $12,500,000. So that, in advancing to the public treasury the sum of $3,500,000, our citizens actually pay the sum of $15,625,000; ten millions of dollars of which sum, as far as respects ourselves, might as well be sunk in the ocean—perhaps better—for it goes, perhaps, to rivals; perhaps to enemies. At any rate, our citizen, contributing by this sort of assessment to the support of his Government, for every one dollar he pays to his own country, has four dollars to pay to foreign industry. But, worse than any thing yet mentioned in this mode of raising revenue, is the circumstance that, with respect to the greatest proportion of the people, who pay this $15,625,000, in order to place $2,500,000 in the Treasury, so far are they from getting the slightest incidental advantage from this mode of supporting their Government, that, by it, they only drive their neighbors, the manufacturers, into idleness and beggary, and deprive themselves of the only possible market they can have for their agricultural productions. And this is the very popular mode of taxation spoken of. Sir, if there is, among our countrymen, such fanatical blindness, as to prefer to pay their taxes in this way, I do not know where it exists.

In answer to the objections that we are too young a country to do our own work, and that we lack capital necessary for manufactures, I ask leave to adopt a remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) who, if I am able to judge of the matter, is more of a philosopher than a politician; and when I apply the word philosopher to him, if the term has more than one sense, I give it no sinister meaning. He has remarked that the age of a nation is not to be counted from the settlement of a country—never was a thing said more truly. We were taken not from the seed, but, like a tree, or rather a branch, transplanted; and when our forefathers landed on these shores, and had formed themselves into Governments, they were, for all the chief purposes of this discussion, as old as the stock they sprung from. As to capital, whenever there has been in our country a demand for the products of domestic industry, there never has been felt a want of capital to carry it on. Have our glass works, our iron works, sunk for want of capital, our lead mines, our straw and grass hats, our hemp? Are our woollen factories now sinking for want of capital? Or rather, are they not all sunk, or sinking, for want of customers, for want of a market? Industry is capital—credit is capital—protection is itself capital; and whenever a moneyed capital may be wanted, all these will insure it.

Not a little has been said about the balance of trade, and we have been beset, throughout almost the whole of this debate, by authorities drawn from the books of the writers called modern political economists. The practical rule for national wealth has been, not willingly to purchase the products of a foreign country more than they will take of your own; that is, not to encourage the industry of those who refuse to encourage yours: for example, not buy the manufactures of those who reject your grain. This is wrong, gentlemen say, in theory. So be it; but, in practice, it is adhered to, I need not say by every wise nation, but certainly by every wealthy and prosperous nation. Gentlemen say, and so say the economists, that what is called an unfavorable balance of trade, is no reason against importing manufactures instead of making them. It is impossible, they say, to purchase more than you are able to pay for. The remark is true and intelligible enough, but it has no application to the subject. What sluggishness, what dependence, what beggary, either of an individual or of a nation, may not be defended by the same argument? You cannot be exhausted of more than you have. Very true; but, what would be just as bad, you can be exhausted of all that you have—all the consolation of that argument will apply as well to a pauper in the poor house. Bonaparte and the British ministry, it has been stated, wrangled for whole weeks, if not for months, during the peace of 1803, about the quantities of goods which the people of the two nations might exchange with each other. Each party, obstinate to the very last in refusing to take the products of the other, unless they were permitted to be paid for in the products of the nation receiving them. Whether right or not, all this was done by statesmen; and let it not be forgotten that, while doing it, they had all the metaphysical books of the economists before their eyes; or, if not all their books, yet all their discoveries had been made before that time, made and published by Frenchmen and by Britons, for the good of their own dear countries, and calculated for their own latitudes. Of these discoveries, the grandest is said to be that, in order to get rich, a nation has nothing to do, but to refuse to eat or drink or wear any thing made or produced at home, provided it can be had cheaper from abroad, so that we see how completely opposite to these discoveries has been the practice of the two nations; and, from this, and from all their conduct before and since, it is plain that the two countries which produced these political economists have always looked upon them as so many conceited enthusiasts, and have taken special care never to meddle, practically, with their books, except so far as to print and export them. In some foreign countries, they have had, to be sure, an amazing run. I am not going to try my hand at disentangling their arguments. Let it be, that all their reasoning on the subject is so correctly metaphysical, and so deep, as not to be comprehended nor refuted. What then? In legislating for a great country, are we to draw our information and our opinions from the deductions of theoretical writers? Or are we to look to the practice of statesmen, and to the actual effect which different systems have had upon the prosperity or the decay of nations? In the concerns of private life, we know how to guard ourselves from the delusions of theory. If a projector brings us his patent machine, we do not ascertain its utility by sitting down to chop logic with the inventor, and puzzle ourselves with his metaphysical reasons, wherefore the contrivance ought to answer the purpose; but we cut short the debate by asking, how will it go? how will it work? So, if you are sick, and a quack produces a bottle full of his medicine, though he may call it the very elixir of life, and may enter into all the most sophisticated refinements of unanswerable reasoning to show the properties and effects of the ingredients he may have put into the kettle, yet, because you cannot refute the doctrine, you do not, therefore, swallow the drug, at any rate, not until you ascertain the small matter of fact that it has cured, or at least not killed, some former patient. So in every thing else relating to the real business of private life, we, in the same way, know how to distinguish what is useful from what is good for nothing, or pernicious, and we invariably trust not to the palaver of argument, but to the test of experience. Let us, then, apply the same rule of common sense to the business of the public, and not think it enough to be told that such and such is the opinion of the immortal modern philosophers. The best of philosophers are not, perhaps, of much use in practical legislation. The gentleman from New York (Mr. CAMBRELENG) has instructed us by a very good quotation from Edmund Burke. Let him, if he pleases, try his hand again at the business, and see if he cannot produce Burke's opinion of this race of political economists.

Somebody (no matter who) once imagined how thunderstruck a quack would be, if, in the very heat and midst of his harangue upon the virtues of his medicine, one of his patients, at the first draught, should drop down dead before his eyes! But he (whoever he was) knew nothing of modern times, our quacks of economists, and their disciples, so far from being confounded, seem to acquire fresh assurance upon the death of every new patient. Holland took the dose, and is blasted. Russia tried it for a while—with what effect, has been already sufficiently stated. To describe the condition of that country, while under the operation of the drug, is exactly to describe our present condition. We have had fully enough of it. No nation has ever escaped, that has followed "the new guide to wealth." Even our very Indians have not escaped. They, to be sure, have never read Adam Smith. But, corrupted and undone by partial civilization, or by the neighborhood of civilization, (not all of them, perhaps,) they are true modern political economists from instinct or habit, and without dreaming of any exertion to help themselves, from mere laziness, depend on begging, as we do on importing. And what a glorious proof it must have been of the wisdom of the immortal modern philosophers, to have seen those Indians, with their bare backs, waiting for an arrival from England, and our importing Government obliged to depend upon the magnanimity, or, if you please, upon the avarice of our enemy, for a supply of blankets to save the yellow economists of the forest from perishing!

I have said that Great Britain and France, the countries that produced the political economists, reject their doctrines. Gentlemen say that Great Britain is fast becoming a convert to the books; and they prove it, not by acts of legislation, but by selecting a stray speech or two. If the strictness of their laws respecting navigation has been in some instances relaxed, what has that to do with their protection of agriculture and manufactures? So, some of our regulations in favor of our own navigation have been relaxed, not from any liberality to foreigners, but for the benefit, and probably at the request, of our own merchants. In these restrictions on navigation, it is found at last there are two sides. But will gentlemen seriously contend that the British Government have thought of admitting our grain and flour, and the manufactures of France, without restriction, into the consumption of their country?

The gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) in opposing this bill, has asked, "Do you not see the angry war-clouds gathering in the South?" As if the probability, or even the possibility of war, was not of itself the strongest reason; and even if there was no other, was not of itself a sufficient reason for our encouragement of domestic manufactures, and dependence upon our own industry. Whether we regard the revenue necessary for carrying on war, and the inconvenience and danger of stopping it at the time it is most wanted, or any other of the resources demanded for carrying it on; or the loss and confusion which attends the sudden interruption of our usual supply of manufactures,—it is very clear that domestic industry is more wanted for war than for peace.

There is a matter which, as it has been already discussed, I shall advert to very briefly. It is said the passage of this bill will be peculiarly injurious to those portions of the country whose staple article is cotton. Let it be remembered that it has been asserted (and though denied, the denial has not been supported by fact or argument or probability) that the protection allowed by this bill, to the different interests comprehended in it, is not so high nor so complete, generally, as the protection by the existing law to the cotton grower of a duty of three cents per pound on the imported article. And further, it has been said with great truth, that no article better deserves to be protected; and that there is no portion of our agricultural industry, nor scarcely any portion of our manufacturing industry, that requires a larger protection. The consumption of cotton in our country is at present immense. With a due encouragement of our own manufactures, it must be next to incalculable. Those manufactures must afford a certain market—it ought to be the greatest market—it will be the greatest market.

I speak the opinions of men practically acquainted with the whole subject, when I say that, with what is called free trade, our cultivators of cotton must be undersold by other nations; and their reasons appear conclusive; that it is an article which, in some other countries, has but lately began to be cultivated, with the greatest success; and that nearly all countries, where it is raised, are possessed of advantages in almost every respect superior to ours; that they have generally a better soil; that the greater rigor of our climate in Winter makes the clothing of slaves in our country much more expensive—while the greater lenity with which they are treated, a lenity produced by our laws or our manners, makes their labor less profitable to the master. So that of all parts of our country those most unanimously opposed to this bill owe the most, and must continue to owe the most to the system of protection. If protection is a tax for the benefit of those protected, that tax is imposed for the benefit of the cotton grower: rightly, I say. And if an increase shall be required to effect the full purpose, I am for increasing it. But I am not for stopping there, but for giving, upon the same principles, a just and equal protection to domestic industry wherever else it may be wanted, so as to secure at least our own markets for the productions of our own country.

Mr. TOL having taken his seat—

Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, rose in reply, and observed that, although the gentleman from Pennsylvania has buried in the very centre of his argument the personal notice with which he has been pleased to honor me, in a manner somewhat calculated, at this late hour, to subtract from the effect of its pungency, I cannot permit his sarcasms, caustic and successful as they have been, (and however hopeless the warfare on my part,) to pass without a brief, and I trust, temperate notice. I confess, without any feeling of self reproach, that the excitement they occasioned has gone by, and I now regard what he has said "more in sorrow than in anger."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania knows, and knows full well, that I did not require his admonition this morning to convince me that I had wronged him yesterday in the tone and temper of my remarks. He has, therefore, correctly stated, what I do not blush to hear, that I waited on him this morning, and expressed my sorrow and voluntary regrets for the unkind and disrespectful character of these remarks. In truth, sir, the reflections of my pillow advised me of my error. Yesterday, in the heat of an irritating discussion, I spoke intemperately of the gentleman, without just provocation; for it would be uncandid in me not to admit that, during the unpleasant and protracted discussion of the tariff, his manner has been civil, and his temper, on the whole, conciliatory. When, therefore, I made him this atonement, I did it without parsimony or stint, from the sincere overflowing of my regrets. I moreover confess, in making him the reparation to which he had, then, so just a claim, I did not measure my words with a punctilious jealousy, but went cordially and honestly to the purposes of conciliation; for I felt that these were offices which became me, as a gentleman, even if I could be altogether insensible to the obligations of a Christian. From this statement, I might, I think, without hesitation, submit to the candor and magnanimity of this House the question, (if I desired such support) how far I have merited the harsh and unkind retort of the gentleman, after all that has passed. Yet, nevertheless, though his conduct does not permit me to reiterate, on the present occasion, the atonement I privately made him, I scorn to take back one jot if it. No, sir: This is due to the House, if not to the gentleman himself. I was wrong yesterday; I will not put myself more entirely in the wrong, to-day, by the smallest intemperance. The gentleman has got his reparation, and may keep it.

The gentleman will, I hope, bear with me, when I say that, from the character of that gallant and luckless knight (Don Quixote) to whom he has alluded, (and who, by the way, was one of the best bred men of his time,) he might have learnt a useful lesson of courtesy and generous feeling, neither difficult in its practice, nor requiring very romantic notions of honor: That, when a foe proffers atonement, to receive it in the spirit in which it is tendered. But let this pass. The gentleman may have sentiments of his own, on this subject, the permanency of which I will not disturb, either by my counsels or commentary.

There are a few things, however, which it has pleased him to say of me, that are somewhat too serious, at least for my own laughter. He accuses me of an overweening conceit in my own merits and opinions. As this is one of those charges to which, if a man pleads, the very plea involves him in ridicule, I shall say nothing. But there is one thing which I have no hesitation in confessing, that the charge might be urged with great force and justice against me, if I had risen in my seat time after time, and sneered at the authority of Smith, Ricardo, and Say. I thank God that I have not had the presumption to speak of these men as shallow and visionary thinkers, or to put my exploded common place, and idle prosing in competition with the fruits of their wisdom, experience, and research. I leave the application to be made by those who have witnessed the career and the opinions of the gentleman, and content myself with telling him, he had better take care how he throws stones. His own tenement may be more frail than his self complacency will permit him to believe.

But, in reference to another subject, the gentleman's sarcasms have indeed been most triumphantly successful. He has tried me by a standard, and I have been found wanting. He has contrasted me with that gentleman (Mr. LOWMEES) whose most unworthy successor I am. The very contrast has barbed the keenest arrow in his quiver. I could have learnt my immense inferiority to that great and good man without the lessons of that gentleman. It would almost be presumptuous in me to say, that I was humbled by the comparison, for I know the distance between the orbit of my predecessor and my own. I nevertheless thank the gentleman even for his tribute to the memory of this pure patriot and profound statesman. It has been delightful to my heart in spite of his unfeeling parallel. Will he permit me, however, to say to him that I think we may both of us live and learn by the example of this individual. He must pardon me, moreover, for saying that I regret, when this example was a living instruction for him, he profited so little by the advantages he enjoyed. The opinions of this statesman might have taught him less confidence in his own, more especially in relation to the tremendous measure of which he is the leading and uncompromising champion. I might even recommend, as a pattern for the adoption of this gentleman, the modesty and humility of my predecessor; but I will not turn his own comparison against him. It might be made stinging enough for the purposes of the most vindictive retribution.

The gentleman has likewise accused me of having referred, (no doubt he meant to imply,) with some vaunting and presumption, to the fact of my having been in the army. I do not mean to charge him with intentional error, but, by the most painful tax to which I can subject my memory, I have not the most distant recollection of ever having discussed a subject before this House, into which I could have forcibly lugged any such reference. I would fain believe, as well as hope, that the gentleman is mistaken; for, however proud I may be of having once belonged to one of the noblest of all professions, yet I am habitually cautious of alluding to it. It was not my fortune to win laurels, or perhaps to deserve them. The soldier who cannot show these memorials of his valor had better speak sparingly of his calling. I will, therefore, say to that gentleman, that, to prevent the passage even of the pernicious bill on our table, I would make no appeal to the sword, which he accuses me of having done. When, therefore, in jest or earnest, it matters not which, he ascribes to me a disposition to fight him into a conviction of my own opinions on the subject, I will say to him, and I thank God I say it with the most perfect sincerity, that I would not, in malice, seek his blood even to prevent the passage of forty tariffs as potent as the one he has advocated!

The gentleman has most generously told me that I may be, at some future period, not entirely useless to my country, after a protracted discipline and cultivation to which, in his candor and condescension, he has indicated no limit. Even this single lump of sugar he has not permitted to come to my lips without being dissolved by the surrounding acid in which it is dropped.

I fear, however, in his estimation, I shall never reach this point of improvement. If my usefulness is to be measured by his own utility, I shall perish in the desert before I reach his land of promise. I do not think I shall ever attain that acme of wisdom which will qualify me to sit in judgment on Smith, Say, and Ricardo. I trust, however, if I do, I shall be able to prove, by something more significant than unmeaning sneers, that I have at least read, if not digested, what they have written.

I must, before I have done with the gentleman, not permit him to have the whole game of playfulness in his own hands. He must recollect I am still somewhat in his debt, although I feel that, in humor and wit, I can never discharge it.

When I commence my knight errantry, (for the adventures of which he seems to think me quite as well qualified as Don Quixote,) I shall certainly select him, above all other men on the face of the earth, for my Sancho. For the offices of a faithful squire he is admirably qualified. "Right merry and conceited," prudent and discreet withal, full of mirth, and with such an admirable knack at raising a laugh, even at his own expense, that I should find in his wit a never-failing resource, even after a rib-roasting in a blanket, or during the operation of the sacred balsam. It is true that he tells me he will not fight, with, or without compulsion, and, although I should have to do all this troublesome part of our adventures myself, yet I think I might calculate on the unpremeditated gallantry of my squire on some occasions. If he would leave me to myself to rescue a forlorn damsel, or to attack the genius of an enchanted castle, I am sure that the sight of a flock of sheep would inflame his valor to the highest pitch of enthusiasm. Chivalry itself would co-operate, at such a crisis, with his ruling passion; for, on this enterprise, he would be merely at his old game, sir—wool-gathering. Yes, sir, a business in which he has been engaged for the last seven weeks, with a perseverance that is beyond all comparison or praise.

But I am done with the gentleman. If I possessed both the gall and the wit of Aristophanes, I would not say one word more. I part with him in the spirit and with the feelings of peace.

Mr. Ton rose, and, after making one or two remarks in reply, said, that he would not consent to become the squire of the gentleman from South Carolina without he would enter into bond and security to give him the island of Barrataria as the reward of his services.

Mr. HAMILTON replied, that the gentleman should have his island to a certainty, but upon the express terms and condition that he should confine his tariff exclusively within its precincts.

The question was then put, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

So the House concurred with the Committee of the Whole, in reducing the minimum on woollens from 80 to 40 cents.

And then the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 8.

A new member, to wit, JOHN TALIAFERRO, in place of William Lee Ball, of Virginia, deceased, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the gradual supply of cannon, bombs, howitz, shot, shells, and materials for carriages, for the fortifications of the United States, and for other purposes," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRENT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the subject had been referred, reported a bill disapproving, in part, an act of the government of the late Territory of Orleans, incorporating the Orleans Navigation Company, passed on the 5th day of July, 1805; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. GAZLAY, respecting a township of land in Symmes's patent, was taken up, and agreed to.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. FORSYTH, in relation to cessions of land to the United States by the Cherokee Nation, was taken up, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. TATTNALL, the Committee on Naval Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a navy yard for the purpose of building and repairing sloops of war, and other vessels of an inferior class, at some suitable point on the St. Mary's river.

On motion of Mr. WICKLIFFE, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the justice and propriety of settling and allowing to the widow of Lieutenant James Norris, the arrearages of pay due to him for his Revolutionary services.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then passed to the unfinished business of yesterday, being the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill for a revision of the Tariff of Duties on Imports.

The question being on the second amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole, viz: to strike out, after "manufactured," in the 51st line, to the end of the section, "a duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem, until the first day of June, 1825; afterwards, a duty of thirty per centum ad valorem, until the first day of June, 1826; afterwards a duty of forty per centum ad valorem, until the first day of June, 1827; and, after that time, a duty of fifty per centum ad valorem;" and insert the following: "A duty of twenty per centum ad valorem, until the first day of June, 1825; afterwards, a duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem, until the first day of June, 1826; afterwards, a duty of thirty per centum ad valorem, until the first day of June, 1827; afterwards, a duty of thirty-five per centum ad valorem, until the first of June, 1828; afterwards, a duty of forty per centum ad valorem, until the first of June, 1829; afterwards, a duty of forty-five per centum, until the first of June, 1830; and, after that, a duty of fifty per centum ad valorem: Provided, That all wool, the actual value of which, at the place whence imported, shall not exceed ten cents per pound, shall be charged with a duty of fifteen per centum ad valorem, and no more."

Mr. POINSETT rose, and said, that he should make no apology to the House for making, at this time, the remarks he was about to submit on the general principle of the bill. In adopting this course, he only followed the example of the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, and of those who had preceded him in this debate. That, in what he was about to say, he begged to be understood as not calling in question the sincerity of those gentlemen who declared that, in this measure, would be found a relief for the depressed state of the country, and the means of promoting its present prosperity, but he wished the Committee to believe him equally sincere in expressing his deliberate conviction that this measure will check the growth, if it does not utterly destroy the prosperity of the country; that it is calculated to change the character of our institutions; to drive thousands of our fellow-citizens from the business and pursuits for which they were educated, and in which they have hitherto found wealth and happiness; to build up large fortunes among a favored class at the expense of the people, and on the ruins of the commercial and agricultural interests of this Union; to substitute the miserable population of manufacturing towns for our hardy race of husbandmen and sailors, to whom we owe our liberties, our safety, and our national glory; to plunge this country into all the corruption and immorality which are the never-failing consequences of a prohibitory system of duties; and, by depriving Government of the revenue now derived from duties on imports, to compel it to resort to internal taxation and excise, which, however lightly gentlemen may treat them, are most odious to a free people. But, sir, said Mr. P., the evil to be dreaded, above all others, from the adoption of this measure, is the hostile feelings it will create between the different interests in various parts of this Union, and the combinations that will be formed, in the agricultural States of the South, to protect themselves against its destructive effects. The agricultural States of the South, said Mr. P., are devotedly attached to the Union; and even this measure, harsh and unjust as it is, and violating, as it does, the spirit of the compact, cannot drive them from it. They have proved their attachment to the Federal Government, not only by submitting to sacrifices without a murmur, but by courting them whenever they believed the good of the whole required sacrifices at their hands. They have never murmured at any revision of the tariff for the purposes of revenue, however hard and exclusively it bore upon their interests; but this attempt to encourage one branch of industry at the expense of all others; to protect the manufactures of the country, by sacrificing to them the navigation, the commerce, and the agriculture of the country, they will resist, by every Constitutional means in their power to adopt, and they will resist it successfully; for they will be aided by the interest of a vast majority of the people of this country—interests which will be deeply affected by a very short trial of what may be truly called a foreign policy—for it has nothing American in it.

The people of the West will soon discover that they cannot enter into successful competition with the Eastern States in the manufacture of the simplest articles; it will require but a brief trial to convince them that they cannot contend with a people who possess the advantages of capital and a sound currency; of superior skill, more steady habits of industry, free labor and cheaper, and more direct transportation to the markets of consumption.

The gentlemen of the West are deceived by the market that portion of the Union enjoyed for its manufactures during the last war. They forget that the communication along the coast, at that time, was interrupted by the enemy. In time of peace, when the easy and cheap transportation by sea is open, they will be undersold, even in the simple article of cotton bagging, by their more active competitors. Perhaps we shall be told, by the admirers of the parental policy of Great Britain, that, as England is protected against Scotland and Ireland, Kentucky ought to be protected against Massachusetts and Rhode Island. This might give that State a market for its manufactures—nothing else can. As this cannot be done, the inhabitants of the Western States will feel only the evils of this English policy, they will be deprived of the advantageous market they now enjoy in the South; for, if we are cut off from our intercourse with Europe, as there is good reason to believe we shall be by the operations of this law, we shall no longer be able to purchase the produce of the West; we shall not have wherewith to pay for it; we shall be compelled to adopt the last of the "alternatives" so kindly presented to us by the honorable Speaker—we must raise and manufacture every article we require, or we must starve. And when, besides this certain loss, the people of the West have to contribute to the support of Government, not as at present, indirectly, by imposts on articles which they may consume or not, as they think proper, but by direct taxes, and by an oppressive excise, they will become as eager and as clamorous for the repeal of this law as they now are for its passage.

The people of the Eastern States, after being compelled to abandon the pursuits of their early life; after being driven from the employments afforded by navigation and commerce, and from the manufacture of ships to that of woollen and cotton cloths, will find that the same act leaves them without a market at home or abroad for this product of their industry. The general poverty to which the agricultural States of the South will be reduced by the operation of this law, will deprive the manufacturers of their best market at home; and advantageous treaties between the manufacturing nations of Europe and the cotton-growing countries south of us, will deprive them of their only foreign market. In our political combinations we ought always to infer, that nations will pursue that policy which their interest dictates. If we refuse to take the manufacture of Great Britain, it will become the interest of that nation to foster those States that will do so. The free Governments of South America, south of us, already manifest a preference in favor of that great commercial and manufacturing nation, and we are about to furnish them both with still farther inducements to unite more intimately, to the exclusion of our raw material on the one hand, and of our manufactures on the other. The inevitable consequence of such a system will induce the people of the Eastern States to unite their efforts more strenuously than ever to those of the people of the South, to restore that order of things under which they have enjoyed unexampled prosperity, and will be content to lose one-half of their capital to effect the change. It is well known to every gentleman on this floor, that a very large proportion of the capital of the manufacturer is fixed capital, buildings and machinery; and if, after this dangerous experiment, a reaction should ensue, as it certainly must, there is no calculating the amount of capital that will be lost to the nation. One of the most serious obstacles to the creation of manufactures by legislative provision, in a Government like ours, consists in the uncertainty of the duration of such unequal laws. This consideration ought to deter us from adopting this measure, even if it were as politic as it is really unjust, arbitrary, and ruinous. It is difficult, likewise, to calculate the amount of capital that will be sunk in trying this scheme. Capital never changes its course suddenly and violently without great losses. They will be experienced on all property now employed in navigation and commerce, on ships, docks, magazines, warehouses, and lands, and houses in our seaport towns. And for what are we called upon to hazard this costly experiment? To protect and foster the manufactures of the country. They do not need it. They have grown up rapidly and steadily with the protection they now enjoy. Capital has been gradually withdrawn from commerce and agriculture, and has been invested in manufactures as a more profitable employment for it. They are not only able to meet the foreign article in the home market, but are brought into successful competition with foreign fabrics abroad. From the advantage now enjoyed by our manufactures, of having the best cotton in the world at their own doors, their fabrics are of superior quality to the same description of goods manufactured in Europe, and are preferred by the Americans of the South. The consumption of our manufactures is already great in Buenos Ayres and Peru, in the Brazils and in Mexico, and whenever our interests shall be properly attended to in those countries that consumption will be increased, unless, indeed, the policy we are about to pursue deprive us of those markets. If we refuse to take the wool and tallow of Buenos Ayres, and the hemp of Chili, must we not expect countervailing regulations on their part? It is ridiculous to compare the complaints of the manufacturers with the provisions of this bill. One of their memorials sets forth—"That they are unable to cope with foreign nations in supplying our markets with woollen goods. Their machinery is more perfect, the wages of labor are less, and wool is more abundant and cheaper." And we propose by this tariff, (if we credit its advocates,) while we find employment for half a million of the idlers of the land, who exist only in the imagination of gentlemen, to augment the wages of labor, and to raise the price of wool, by prohibiting the importation of the foreign article. The defect of skill and machinery is probably to be provided against, by prohibiting the importation of the best iron for casting the finer parts of machinery. But it is New York that will feel most oppressively the injurious effects of this measure. It is there that its operation will be most ruinous. That State, with its sea-girt frontier, (if I may be allowed the expression,) is essentially commercial. Its prosperity depends mainly upon that of the city, which must be deeply affected by the privation of the carrying trade of the bulky agricultural products of the South, and by the prohibition of foreign importations, which the chairman of the Committee of Manufactures told us yesterday was the avowed object of the bill. With the decline of navigation and commerce, the great advantages now derived from the happy situation of this seaport will be wrested from it; the market of New York must fail; it cannot remain one of great consumption. Capital will depart from it, and be diverted into other channels. There will remain nothing to give in exchange for the produce of the interior, and it must rot upon the hands of the farmer. The great canal, so justly the pride of the State, will become a stagnant pool, choked with weeds, instead of bearing on its surface the rich products of the West, and the produce and manufactures of every soil and of every clime. I saw, said Mr. P., the seaport towns of France during the existence of the restrictive system of Napoleon. The houses were abandoned; they were worth little more than the dry trees of the forest. Grass grew upon the borders of the docks and in the streets. They were the abode of poverty and wretchedness, and such must be the condition of New York under the operation of this law. The honorable Speaker quoted, the other day, Napoleon's account of the operation of his favorite prohibitory system—a measure directed entirely to injure Great Britain, not to benefit France. He attributed the prosperous and flourishing state of France to the effects of prohibition. I, said Mr. P., humbly apprehend that the prosperity of that country is due to other and very different causes—to the emancipation of that people from despotism and superstition, to the distribution of the Church and Crown lands into small farms, by which means the peasantry of France became proprietors of the soil, and were elevated to the rank of free and independent landholders. This change is in itself sufficient to account for the improved condition of that country. The state of the seaport towns of France during the prohibitory system of Napoleon, was not more deplorable than that of the manufacturing establishments. The fabrics of other countries found their way into France, notwithstanding the vigilance of a host of custom-house officers. Their price was enhanced to the consumer, the revenue was defrauded, but they could be purchased in any part of France. It is true, that the internal commerce of the country was extensive and flourishing. But what did it arise from? From war! That was the only trade which flourished during the reign of Napoleon. The only manufacture in successful operation was that of arms, with the exception, perhaps, of that of silks, and their prosperity was due to other causes, and principally to the superior quality of the raw material, the produce of the country. Such was the state of the cotton manufactures that Government connived, and, indeed, still connives, at the introduction of the finer sorts of thread from England, without which the manufactures of fine cottons could not go on. They are prohibited, but if the manufacturer can smuggle them over the frontier he may use them. I shall not comment on this most singular policy—the natural consequences of measures like the one proposed by this bill. The wars in which France was engaged, were carried on beyond her own frontier, and at the expense of enemies and allies. The beneficial effects of such wars upon the internal commerce of the country must have been great. Clothing half a million of soldiers, feeding them on their peaceful passage to the frontier, the transportation of provisions, clothing, arms, munitions of war, gave life and activity to the interior of France—causes altogether foreign to the prohibition of imports. Our attention has been called to the public works erected in France, as a proof of the prosperity of that country—a prosperity arising, it is said, out of the prohibitory system. What were they? Magnificent roads over the Alps to open an easy communication with Italy, in order to keep those States in subjection; roads and canals for the transportation of heavy ordnance and munitions of war to the frontiers; monuments erected as trophies of the victories of the conqueror of Europe. Neither such causes nor such effects ought to be subjects of admiration to the people of this Republic, much less, of imitation. The honorable Speaker and the Chairman of the Committee of Manufactures account for the prosperity and depression of nations by the existence or absence of a prohibitory system of duties; they reject the theories of speculative writers as too absurd to require refutation; they triumphantly appeal to facts; they would direct their footsteps by the lamp of experience. Let us, then, examine the facts on which they rely. Ireland and Spain are the two countries of the world where the industry of the inhabitants is most unprotected, and are, on that account, the most miserable countries in the world. That was, I think, the proposition of the honorable Speaker, and of the Chairman of the Committee of Manufactures. The subject of the state of Ireland is now before the British Parliament, and it would appear that both the Treasury benches and the Opposition are so blind as to attribute the depressed state of that country to the unequal distribution of property, to the non-residence of landholders, to the system of underletting, so oppressive to the poor cultivator, to the exaction of excessive taxes and tithes, and to the degraded state of four-fifths of the population, who are denied the privileges enjoyed by their Protestant countrymen. Not one word of want of protection; nothing said of the necessity of prohibition. That oppressed people themselves would be not a little astonished, if told, that the remedy for all they suffer was so simple. Parliament had only to extend the "sweets of prohibition" to Ireland, to render the people prosperous, and to make the land flourish like a garden. It is surprising that so simple a remedy never occurred to her patriot statesmen—to Curran, Grattan, Hamilton, Rowan, Tone, or Emmett. But I cannot discover any essential difference, in this respect, between England and Ireland. What difference there is, is in favor of the latter. The linen manufacture, the most important in that country, is not only protected from foreign competition, but enjoys a bounty on its exportation. By an agreement between the two countries when they were united, a duty of ten per cent. is exacted upon the manufactures of each country, when imported into the other. These union duties, as they were called, were intended to favor Ireland, and the duty on the raw materials of manufactures is somewhat less when imported into Ireland, than when imported into England. The Irish manufacturers have lately prayed for a repeal of the union duties. They say nothing of the propriety of further protection from foreigners. They are now able to enter into competition with the English manufacturer, and desire to have the markets of England and Ireland open to the rival industry of the manufacturers of both countries.

What is the fact with respect to Spain? The depression of that country was very satisfactorily accounted for by the gentleman from Virginia; but, Mr. Speaker denies that the causes assigned by that gentleman have had any effect, and attributes the decline of Spain altogether to the want of protection. All the writers on Spain attribute the depressed state of that country to the mesta, the free transit of immense flocks of sheep from the plains to the mountains and back, feeding freely and destroying the timber enclosures of the land in their passage; to the large amount of property in mortmain, to exactions of oppressive taxes and of tithes, and to the abuse of the power of the Church. Jovellanos, with the fear of the Inquisition before him, accounts in this manner for the decline of every branch of industry. I will not trouble the Committee by reading any part of this report, but will refer them to the fourth volume of "Laborde's view of Spain," where they will find a bad translation of that eloquent work. And, sir, is it not true that the abuses of the Catholic Church have produced a powerful effect both upon the liberties and the prosperity of Spain? I speak only of its abuse. As it exists in this country, I feel for that religion the greatest respect—freed from its superstition and abuses, I join the honorable Speaker in all his admiration of its principles. But, sir, the power and influence of the Church in Europe has been abused to the destruction of the prosperity of many countries under its dominion.

The Speaker says it is not so, and calls upon us to look at France—France is not now under the dominion of superstition; and compare its present state with what it was before the Revolution. Look, said that gentleman, at the States of Germany, and to the difference between the Catholic and Protestant States of Germany. The gentleman from Virginia may confidently appeal for the truth of what he advanced. Look, said Mr. Speaker, at Switzerland. Well, sir, look at Switzerland—pass from the Catholic to the Protestant cantons—pass from Luzerne to Zurich, and the distinction is not more obvious; the line is not more strongly marked, that separates the desert of Atacama from the fertile plains of Chili. But, there are other causes which operate in Spain, to depress the industry of the people, and destroy their prosperity; and, as the state of this country has been so strongly urged by the advocates of this measure, as a proof of their theory, the Committee will pardon me for dwelling upon them. Laborde says that—

"The country contains 100,000 persons, existing as smugglers, robbers, pirates, and assassins, escaped from prisons and garrisons; about thirty or forty thousand appointed to guard the public from these depredators, and often having an understanding with them; 250,000 servants, according to the enumeration of 1788; 60,000 students; 100,000 beggars, fed by 60,000 monks; 600,000 persons who are of no use to the mechanic arts."

But the number of those that live upon the fruits of the earth, without adding to them by productive labor, of the "fruges consumere nati," is much greater. Spain contained 10,143,965 persons. Subtract women, children, and old and infirm men, five-eighths at least of the population, leaving 3,803,981 men.

Leaving only 2,582,592 employed in productive industry. Among the many complicated and oppressive taxes on industry, a tax was levied in some of the provinces, on the wages of labor. In Catalonia, it amounted to 8½ per cent. upon the earnings, which were calculated upon one hundred and eighty days of labor; one hundred and eighty-five days being supposed to be consumed by Sabbaths and festivals of the church. Look at the difference between the Alcabala and other provincial duties on articles of home produce, and manufactured in Spain, and on those imported. The first paid only two per cent., the second fifteen; and, as this duty was paid as often as the article was sold, the foreign article never paid less than 30 per cent., besides other duties; for, it first paid the Alcabala, when placed in the warehouse of the merchant, and again when sold at retail; very often, indeed, 45 per cent. was paid in this way alone, on goods brought from foreign countries; so that the Spaniards enjoyed the "sweets" of protection, if not of prohibition. On this subject, Laborde has the following passage:

"The provincial taxes include a variety of articles. These are levied upon all kinds of produce of the soil, and every branch of agriculture, trade, manufacture, wheat, and other grain, oil, wine, fruits, pulse, vegetables, animals of all kinds, and beasts of every description; upon all merchandise manufactured in Spain, as often as it is sold; upon all foreign goods, the same, after having been subject to the import duties; and these taxes must be paid every time the articles are bought or exchanged.

APRIL, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

"The husbandman, the proprietor, or farmer, cannot sell or exchange the produce of the soil, the increase of his flocks, his poultry yard, stud, or kennel, nor the manufacturer the goods in his factory, nor the merchant those he has in his warehouses, without, at every sale and resale, paying this duty. No individual can sell his horse, ass, or pig, without being equally liable. No person can kill a calf, sheep, or lamb, from his own stock, without having previously made a solemn declaration that the animal is bona fide one of his own herd or flock, and that he kills it merely for the use of his own family.

"This duty is fixed at the rate of two per cent. ad valorem, for the home produce and articles manufactured in Spain; but fifteen per cent. for that brought from foreign countries. It is paid every time the goods change their owners; and instances have occurred where they have paid it ten, twelve, and fifteen times before they came into the possession of the consumer. Numerous substances pay many times when they are converted into different forms: as grease, three times—first, when purchased with the animal which produces it; afterwards, as tallow; and thirdly, when made into candles; oxen, calves, sheep, lambs, and pigs, twice—first, when purchased by the head; and, secondly, when the carcass is sold retail; the first three pay it a third time, upon the skins when dressed; grapes pay it three times, as, first, when converted into wine, and again when made into vinegar; oil three times; first, as oil, second in soap, and lastly when changed into paint; wool and silk pay twice; first, in the raw material; and, secondly, when converted into cloths and stuffs.

"This duty is one grand obstacle to agricultural improvements, because chiefly falling upon articles of prime necessity, and of ordinary and most extensive consumption. It principally oppresses those persons who, from their scanty means of subsistence, are obliged to purchase from a fourth or a fifth hand, and who, consequently, pay this duty an equal number of times over, while the rich, who can buy by the wholesale, and of the first supplier of the market, pay it only once."

Speaking of the state of the manufactures in Spain, Laborde says:

"The very high price at which goods manufactured in Spain, sell, arises from a combination of causes. The dearness of provisions, the great expense of manual labor, the few hours workmen labor in the course of the day, the number of holidays, in which none or very little work is performed, the difficulty and high rate of conveyance of articles used in the manufactories, from want of canals, navigable rivers, good roads, and convenient carriages; and the duties imposed, not only upon the raw, but also upon the manufactured article, the constant restraint resulting from fiscal obligation, the domiciliary visits, the difficulties continually arising from persons employed in collecting the customs, are all so many obstacles which hinder the sale of national manufactures, and consequently impede the progress of national prosperity."

The prosperous state of Great Britain is due, say gentlemen, entirely to the protection afforded to its commerce and manufactures, to its restrictive and prohibitory systems. The first was intended to foster the navigation of the country, and was considered, at the time of its adoption, as hostile to commerce. I will not detain the Committee by reading extracts from the work I hold in my hand, "Reeves on Shipping." From that work, it appears that all the acts on this subject were intended to protect navigation. They were at first entitled "acts for the maintenance of the Navy;" and afterwards, "acts for the encouraging and increasing shipping and navigation;" and, in the history of these acts, it will be seen, that a constant struggle was maintained between the Government and the merchants.

On the part of the Government of Great Britain, this was certainly a wise policy at the time it was adopted. Surrounded as that nation was, by great maritime Powers, it was essential to create a navy, and the immediate interests of commerce were sacrificed to that paramount consideration. By steadily pursuing this policy, they became masters of the seas, and masters of the commerce of the world. But, for a long period, they continued to export little else than the produce of the soil. After being engaged for a long series of years in successful and lucrative trade, a vast amount of capital was accumulated, and a part of it was naturally directed to manufactures. Their establishment was favored, too, by the arrival of the refugees from France, who were driven from their country by the edict of Nantz, to seek an asylum in England. The system of protecting duties grew up slowly, and always in consequence of excessive taxation and excise upon every article of life. The corn laws which we complain of, originated in the necessity of protecting the agriculturist in England, who pays tithes, land tax, and poor rates, from the farmer of other countries, who pays none of those taxes, or where they are moderate, and who could, therefore, undersell him in the home market. It is a tax levied upon the whole community, so as to equalize the burden of general taxation, which would otherwise overwhelm the English cultivator. Such a regulation here would be an odious imposition upon the people for the benefit of one class. So far is the prosperity of the manufactures in that country from being due to protecting duties, that Lowe, in the work so frequently quoted by gentlemen on the opposite side, says, expressly, "that, of 123,000,000, the total value of British manufactures, 80,000,000 consist of the 'three great articles, cotton, woollen, and hardware,' none of which receive protection from custom duties." "What," he asks, "was the real motive 'on the part of Government for these multifarious regulations—this long list of duties, drawbacks, and bounties? Not to confer on any of the parties, whether agriculturists or manufacturers, an absolute advantage, but to reconcile them to the taxes imposed on the respective articles of their produce." Great Britain has been compelled, from frequent and expensive wars, to resort to an oppressive system of taxation, and to lay an excise on every manufactured article. To encourage her navigation, and to enable the English manufactures to meet the foreign fabrics in foreign markets, drawbacks are granted, and, without that provision, English goods could not be exported or sold on any thing like equal terms with those produced by the same measure in other countries where no excise exists. Such a system would be unjust here; it would be a tax upon the people for the benefit of a single class; as for many articles of English fabric, an Englishman pays more at home than we do here. It is true that Great Britain does present a magnificent spectacle of increasing national prosperity and greatness; but gentlemen have not attributed this to its true causes—the vast accumulation of capital, superior mechanical skill, persevering industry, and minute division of labor. They have ascribed it altogether to the defects of the regulations of that country, for such they are acknowledged to be by all their writers, and all their enlightened statesmen.* There is another cause which has great weight: it is the existence of a sound national currency. Even the Opposition in England attribute the present highly prosperous state of the country mainly to the resumption of specie payments. But, sir, let us look at the state of individual happiness, and at the prosperity of the people of that country, as compared with our own. I heard, with the utmost surprise, an assertion that they were better fed, and better clothed, and enjoyed more comforts, than the people of this country. It has been my lot, said Mr. P., from inheriting a feeble constitution, to be compelled to travel much. I have been frequently in England, and, in returning to my native country, I have remarked, with pride and delight, the superior condition of the people of the United States—superior to that of every other people on the face of the earth that I have ever seen. For the truth of this, let us look at the facts. A large proportion of the people of England, about three-fifths, are manufacturers, I mean artisans, workmen, and laborers, in manufactories; for the capitalists who own them are too inconsiderable in numbers to be counted, although we seem to regard them as the only part of the community worthy to be encouraged. These men toil through life on a small stipend, barely sufficient to enable them to rear up a family, to become themselves laborers at a very tender age. This is all they ever aspire to. Owing to this circumstance, the poor laws have become a part of the manufacturing system. †If the laborer is thrown out of employment, by accident, disease, or the invention of a new labor-saving machine, he must be relieved by the parish or starve. Such is the division and perfection of labor in that country, that a man thrown out of employment from his place being usurped by another machine, cannot, in many years, hope to earn his livelihood in any other manner. The only advocates of the poor laws in England, and I never expected, said Mr. P., to have heard any one here praise such a system, contend that they have become necessary, in order to provide for laborers, and to equalize taxes. That is to say, to tax the landed interest for the support of the poor laborer and artisan in sickness, in want of employment, or when the proprietor finds it convenient to lower their wages below their actual necessities. The workmen whose condition is represented to be so happy, cannot insist upon an advance of wages, let the profits of the manufacturer be what they may. The wages of labor bear an exact proportion to the price of provisions, and, so far is the laborer from having it in his power to accumulate any thing, that, if his labors are accidentally suspended, he must be relieved by the parish. The workman passes in this manner through life, hopeless of ever bettering his condition; this is the case with all the lower classes in England. The servant who puts on a livery is content to die with it on his back. This makes excellent artisans and good servants; but we ought not to seek to reduce our fellow-citizens to such a state.

* "For some years past, there certainly has prevailed, in this country, among its ablest statesmen and most eminent writers, I should say, indeed, among all men of sense and reflection, a decided conviction, that the maintenance of this prohibitory system is exceedingly impolitic."—Speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the financial state of Great Britain.

† At a late meeting in England, to take into consideration the state of prison discipline in that country, it was objected, that convicted felons received a larger share of meat, vegetables, and bread, per day, than could be procured by an agricultural laborer. The reply was, that the agricultural laborer could, from the poor's rates, obtain that supply which his own wages were inadequate to procure:—A state of things the American farmer is called upon to envy!

I will not refer to Colquhoun's statements to prove the number of beggars and disorderly persons there are in England; that is now considered of very doubtful authority. But I will refer gentlemen to the report of a committee of the House of Commons on the state of mendicity in England. God forbid that the assertion made on this floor that there are as many, if not more, beggars in our towns, should be true. The number of poor supported by the poor rates in England and Wales amounts to one million, one-twelfth of the population, at an annual expense of 6,000,000*l.* sterling, more than $26,500,000. So much for the people whose lot we, in the United States, are called upon to envy!

The effect of these regulations, which may be traced all to a system like the one proposed by the bill upon your table, upon the middle class of landholders, has been most oppressive. Thousands have abandoned their farms, and gone into voluntary banishment, to avoid the pressure of taxation, tithes, and poor rates. They may be seen in thousands, settled in France, in the Netherlands, and in Italy, living where the necessities of life are within the reach of men of moderate fortunes.

The laws and regulations which the advocates of this bill think have been productive of the greatness and prosperity of England, and which they believe that we have only to adopt, in order to arrive at the same result, if they have had any effect, have produced the extremes of wealth and poverty—a state of society we ought carefully to avoid, if we value our republican institutions, and desire to preserve them.

Look, too, at the force constantly kept on foot to suppress smuggling, where such a system as the one proposed exists. In Great Britain, besides a host of custom-house officers, there is an army employed in what is termed the preventive service.

In France, upwards of thirty thousand men are kept in constant employment to guard the customs from fraud. In Spain, it requires twenty-seven thousand men to collect the taxes; yet, notwithstanding those armies of custom-house officers, smuggling is carried on so extensively that a small premium will insure the transit of prohibited articles between England and France. From the Netherlands to Paris costly articles are smuggled at a premium of less than one-half per cent.* Our customs are now guarded by public opinion; destroy that—let it no longer be considered infamous to violate our revenue laws, and the whole Navy of the United States, and ten times our present land force, will not prevent smuggling. In the States of Europe, the existence of these armies of officers adds to the strength of Government. They are more dependent upon, and more devoted to, the authority that employs them, than any other description of force—we ought to be extremely cautious how we place such means at the disposal of our Treasury to enforce this prohibitory system; and on a coast like ours, no maritime force this Government can afford to keep up, will prevent smuggling.

The example of Russia is cited; Russia, say gentlemen, tried a free and unrestrained trade, which occasioned her ruin, and has wisely resolved to abandon it. The distresses of that country are to be attributed to any other cause—to the maintenance of nearly a million of soldiers—to the civil institutions of the country, and, principally, to the excessive issue of paper money. During the long wars with France, Russia, in order to subsist her armies abroad, was compelled to send almost all the specie out of the country, and to replace it by paper money, which has now depreciated so much that a ruble is not worth more than one-third of its original value. We can draw no lessons from the experience of Russia. This country is totally dissimilar. But, if their experience does apply at all to us, it is all against the conclusions of the honorable Speaker. The restrictive system was tried by the Emperor Paul; and Russia was not only greatly impoverished at the time, but lost markets for her produce, which she has never regained. The Emperor Alexander, after the peace of Tilsit, attempted to carry into effect the prohibitory system of Napoleon; but even he was compelled to yield to the will of his people. They bore, without murmuring, every burden but that. It is well known that the relaxation of that system led to the war between Russia and France, which terminated in the overthrow of Napoleon. The "enlightened Minister" of Russia will find himself as much mistaken as the advocates of this bill, in his attempt to restore Russia to prosperity, by adopting a prohibitory system of duties. The remedy must be applied to the causes of the depression he complains of. This experiment, however, may be tried without danger to Russia, already depressed as low as possible; but here, in a country in an unexampled state of prosperity, its failure will be ruinous.

* Mr. Huskisson, in his speech on the silk trade, repeatedly states, and quotes evidence to prove, that, notwithstanding the prohibition, French silks are introduced into England for a premium of ten per cent.; one of the witnesses says: "When I was at Paris, they had no idea I was a manufacturer, and they offered me, for an insurance at ten per cent. to send me any quantity of manufactured silks I chose to select, to any part of London I pleased, notwithstanding their liability to be seized as French wherever they were found."

And here let me remark that the happiness or misery of a people, and the prosperity or depression of a State, are comparative terms. The condition of this country, and the sum of human happiness in it, if compared with any other, would bear me out in the assertion that we are, at this moment, the most prosperous and happiest people in the world.

The honorable Speaker was at great pains to explain the amount of taxation each nation bears, and considered that as showing the comparative wealth and capacity of a country. It is true "that the burden of taxation is always relative to the ability of the subjects of it." But it is not true, that the existence of immoderate and excessive taxes in a country, proves the ability of the people to bear them without serious inconvenience or ultimate ruin. It is true, that the same amount of taxation would press more heavy upon a poor, than it would upon a rich nation; more heavy upon Spain, than upon England. But it is not true, that the amount of contributions a Government draws from the pockets of its citizens, is a proof of the prosperity or capacity of the country. It proves little more than that the expenditure of that Government is extravagant; it is not true, that because the taxation per capita in England, is three pounds two shillings sterling, ($13 78,) and that in the United States, nine shillings, ($2,) the prosperity of England, and the capacity of that people to bear taxation, are to those of the United States in the ratio of $13 78 to $2. This fact shows only that we live under a wise and economical Government, which, instead of lavishing the substance of its citizens, leaves them the means of accumulating wealth from the most humble beginnings. Look at the condition of the people of the two countries. How easy it is here, where the taxes are light, for the poor man to elevate himself by industry and economy to wealth and consideration; how impossible is it for the same description of person to succeed in England, where the last surplus cent is drawn from him for the support of Government; there he can do little more than maintain himself above want.

The true test of the prosperity of a people consists in their means of consumption; and, if judged by this standard, by the quantity and quality of the food and clothing they consume; by the manner in which they are lodged, and their rapid accumulation of wealth, the great mass of the people of this country are more prosperous and better able, in proportion to their numbers, to bear an equal burden of taxation, than any people in the world.

Situated as we are, with an extensive seacoast frontier, our independence, our very existence as a nation, depends upon our ability to protect our shores from the attacks of great maritime Powers. The effects this bill is calculated to produce on our navigation, have been clearly and unanswerably shown by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I know, said Mr. P., we shall be told, that if it does affect our foreign commerce, it will increase the coasting trade. But, if the Atlantic States be impoverished, and deprived of the means of purchase, how can the coasting trade be carried on? If the Eastern States and New York cease to import the articles we want, what will remain to be carried? If the South is compelled to raise and manufacture for its own consumption, if it is deprived of the means of purchase, must not the coasting trade suffer? Commerce, of every description, coasting or foreign, cannot be carried on advantageously, if at all, unless it embraces articles of every description; confine it to one or two, and it perishes.

It is idle to say, that any one trade is a losing trade to the nation, if it furnishes the merchant with the means of carrying a variety of articles to other markets. The East India trade has been cited. Let us see how it operates. A vessel is sent out to Europe, with a cargo of domestic produce, and returns laden with French and German goods, suited to the Mexican and South American markets. To these are added more produce and domestic manufactures, silks and nankeens of China, dyed here. This assorted cargo is sold in Mexico, for what is the produce of the earth there—for gold and silver—which are brought to this country to be shipped to China for more silks and nankeens and teas, which are again sent to South America and to Europe.

On every one of these transactions, there remains a profit to the revenue and a profit to the merchant: yet we are told that commerce is not productive. It is productive always in proportion to its extent,—in proportion to the variety of articles the merchant has to make up his cargoes with. Speaking on this subject, the eloquent Patrick Henry exclaimed, "Fetter not commerce; let it be free as air; she will range the whole creation, and return on the four winds of heaven, to bless the land with plenty."

The gentleman from Massachusetts has demonstrated the fallacy of the assertion, that the ruinous state of our commerce is deducible from the unfavorable balance of trade. He has shown, too, that the difference of exchange between this country and Great Britain did not depend only upon the state of trade between the two countries, but, in a great measure, upon the difference of their currencies. In corroboration of what he advanced, I will, said Mr. P., mention a circumstance which will make it familiar to every gentleman that hears me. Being about to leave England in 1820, and having a few sovereigns more than I required, I exchanged them, in Liverpool, for dollars. The dollar, at par value, is 4s. 6d., 54 pence sterling. I bought them for 4s. 2d., 50 pence sterling, which has been the price for some years past. I received for my 20 sovereigns, 96 dollars, whereas, at par value, they were only worth 88; and, by this operation, I gained more than eight per cent. The exchange at this time was in favor of England, nominally, ten per cent., so that if we take into account the freight and insurance, it was, in fact, very nearly at par. The exchange is made, not in currency, but in a merchantable commodity, liable to some fluctuation in value, in England, where only a given quantity of silver coin is issued and where payments over a certain sum must be made in gold.

The effect of this bill on our revenue, if it produces the results anticipated by its advocates, must be ruinous. It is, however, useless to urge this topic on the attention of the Committee.

It is clear that, if this bill produces the effect anticipated, of protecting and encouraging our domestic manufactures by preventing the introduction of foreign fabrics, the revenue now derived from imports must be diminished; if it does not produce that effect, it will not afford that protection—if the foreign article continues to be imported, it is, in the present state of our Treasury, an unjust and impolitic tax on consumption.

Its effects on the cotton-growing States, no one can deny. We now supply Great Britain with more of that raw material than all the world besides. But, says Mr. Speaker, "Will she refuse to take our cotton because we refuse to take her cotton fabrics, and thereby deprive herself of the market she now enjoys?" This would be true enough if Great Britain could not obtain cotton elsewhere, and must either consume ours or stop her manufactures altogether. We now supply Great Britain because we are her best customer; she may not refuse to take our cotton, but her manufacturers, who are many of them shipping merchants, will bring their cotton from those places where they sell their fabrics—from Brazil and from Mexico.

How this bill is to operate in favor of agriculture, I am at a loss to understand. Will it increase the consumption of bread corn? This can only be done by opening foreign markets, and by augmenting our population; and is this to be effected by prohibiting foreign fabrics, or by shutting the people up in manufactories? Will it augment the comforts of the people to compel them to become artisans, or enable them to consume more? The only possible effect this policy can have upon the agriculture of the country, will be, to augment the price of produce by diminishing its quantity. The farmer, deprived of a market, and cut off from all means of support by cultivating the earth, condemned to pay an increased price on every article of consumption, and driven from his home by tax-gatherers and excisemen, must seek refuge in some manufactory. The rich man will alone be able to contend against the effects of this law, and the lands must fall into the hands of a few.

And yet we are told that "the opponents of this system are the rich of the land." The effects of a system which transfers property into few hands, upon the liberties of the people, I leave the intelligence of the Committee to infer. The effects upon the freedom of election, by the existence of great manufacturing establishments, containing half a million of people, who must be under the control of a few men, is too obvious to require a comment.

The honorable Chairman of the Committee of Manufactures has likened the inhabitants of this country to an army marching to battle, and asks, what would be the condition of such an army, if every man was allowed to march as he chose, and to load and fire when he pleased? This, then, is an avowal of the intentions of that gentleman. We shall not be permitted any longer to do as we please. We are to be marshalled as an army. We must march with a regular front. No man must leave the ranks; no man is to be allowed to surpass his fellow-men, and to spring forward to gain the prize his talents and industry had placed within his grasp. We are to be reduced, like the Hindoos, to castes, and condemned to toil all our lives at one employment. I trust in God the Committee will not sanction a law intended, avowedly, to produce such effects.

The natural progress of a country like ours is first to become a great agricultural State; from that agricultural prosperity springs commerce, which ought to be fostered unremittently until it has created a navy sufficient to protect our maritime frontier, and that commerce which gave it birth. The accumulation of capital from successful commerce leads naturally to the establishment of manufactures: to this order of things they now owe their flourishing condition in this country. The extensive commerce this nation enjoyed during the late wars of Europe, led to the accumulation of a large capital, which, as it could no longer be profitably employed in navigation and trade, was invested in manufactures. They presented to the capitalist the best prospect of profit. But, say gentlemen, we are not advancing fast enough—let us legislate the nation into greater prosperity; let us direct how every man shall employ his capital.

The most sanguine projectors of this scheme cannot believe that the prohibition of foreign fabrics will create capital; their object can only be, in their zeal for long exploded doctrines of political economy, to drive their fellow-citizens from their present pursuits; to control the industry of individuals; to urge forward the premature growth of manufactures by forcing the capital now in existence from all other channels: attempts that have proved ruinous wherever they have been made.

Look, said Mr. P., at the unexampled prosperity of this country; a population advancing with a rapidity beyond all parallel—an accumulation of capital, within a small space of time, which is almost incredible; a revenue more than adequate to all our wants in time of peace, without resorting to internal taxes. Within half a century we have become a great and powerful nation; and by what means? By the freedom of our institutions. By the liberty every man enjoyed to employ his industry and capital in the manner he judged most advantageous. By the Government having kept steadily in view the spirit of the Constitution, and having enacted laws for the benefit of the whole, without favor and without partiality. That the law now contemplated is the reverse of all this, no one can deny. It is intended to control industry, and to favor a few at the expense of the vast majority of the people. It is a law intended for the rich man, for the capitalist; it will not profit the laborer, but will drive him from a healthy pursuit to a sedentary and sickly employment—if, indeed, the number of industrious men who now gain a livelihood by the prosperous state of our seaports and of our navigation and trade will find employment, when we shall have taken from them their present means of support. There are, said Mr. P., other considerations, which he had intended to have offered to the attention of the House, but his exhausted strength compelled him to conclude.

It requires, indeed, no arguments to prove, that, by destroying our navigation, by restricting importation, and consequently exportation, the maritime power of the nation must be annihilated. By prohibiting the introduction of foreign fabrics our revenue must be impaired. By crushing the enterprise of our merchants, all who depend upon commerce for support must suddenly be reduced to poverty and distress.

When Mr. POINSETT had concluded—

The question was taken on agreeing to the amendment, and decided in the affirmative without a division.

The House then proceeded to the third amendment, which is, to strike out the words "printing types" from the class of twenty-five per cent. ad valorem duties. This amendment was agreed to.

The fourth amendment proposes to insert, in the eighty-seventh line, the following: "On all ingrain carpets or carpeting, twenty-five cents per square yard."

The fifth amendment proposes to insert, "on oil cloth carpeting, and on oil cloths of every description, a duty of thirty per centum ad valorem."

With these two amendments, the clause reads as follows:

"On Brussels, Venetian, Turkey, and Wilton carpets and carpeting, fifty cents per square yard; on all ingrain carpets or carpeting, twenty-five cents per square yard. On all other kinds of carpets and carpeting of wool, flax, hemp, cotton, or parts of either, twenty cents per square yard; on oil cloth carpeting, and on oil cloths of every description, a duty of thirty per centum ad valorem."

Both these amendments were agreed to, the first without a division, and the latter by a vote of ayes 99, noes 72.

Mr. KREMER, of Pennsylvania, then observed that he had been requested by several members who were absent yesterday when the vote was taken on reducing the minimum on woollens from eighty to forty cents, and by some others who had voted under a misapprehension with respect to the consequences of their vote, to move for a reconsideration of the vote taken.

Being called upon by Mr. A. STEVENSON, of Virginia, for his reasons, Mr. KREMER stated them more fully.

It was then resolved, that the question of reconsideration should be taken by yeas and nays; and after a prolonged debate, in which Messrs. LIVERMORE, STORRS, and KREMER advocated, and Messrs. MERCER, RANDOLPH, OWEN, and FORSYTH, opposed reconsidering.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, a call of the House was made, the names of the absentees were called over, and the doors closed; when

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, all farther proceedings in relation to absent members were dispensed with.

The doors were then re-opened, and the debate was renewed by Mr. WEBSTER, who spoke in opposition to reconsidering.

The question was then taken, and the House agreed to reconsider—yeas 110, nays 95, as follows:

son, Taliaferro, Tattall, Thompson of Georgia, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Vance of N. Carolina, Warfield, Webster, Wickliffe, Williams of New York, Williams of Virginia, Williams of North Carolina, and Wilson of South Carolina.

The question then recurring on the House's agreeing to the report of the Committee of the Whole in that amendment of the bill which reduces the minimum on woollen goods from eighty to forty cents the square yard—

Mr. McDUFFIE, of South Carolina, rose, and delivered his sentiments, at length, in favor of agreeing.

Mr. CUTHBERT of Georgia, and Mr. LIVINGSTON of Louisiana, followed on the same side.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. LIVERMORE of New Hampshire, McLANE of Delaware, and TOD of Pennsylvania, in opposition to agreeing with the Committee; and by Messrs. LIVINGSTON of Louisiana, WEBSTER of Massachusetts, COBB of Georgia, MERCER of Virginia, RANDOLPH of Virginia, and P. P. BARBOUR of Virginia, in favor.

Mr. RANDOLPH expressed his surprise that the votaries of humanity—persons who could not sleep, such was their distress of mind at the very existence of negro slavery—should persist in pressing a measure, the effect of which was to aggravate the misery of that unhappy condition, whether viewed in reference to the slave or to his master—if he were a man possessing a single spark of humanity—for, what could be more pitiable than the situation of a man who had every desire to clothe his negroes comfortably, but who was absolutely prohibited from so doing by legislative enactment? He hoped that none of those who wished to enhance to the poor slave (or, what was the same thing, to his master) the price of his annual blanket, and of his sordid suit of coarse, but to him comfortable woollen cloth, would ever travel through the Southern country to spy out the nakedness, if not of the land, of the cultivators of the soil. It was notorious that the profits of slave labor had been, for a long time, on the decrease, and that, on a fair average, it scarcely reimbursed the expense of the slave, including the helpless ones, whether from infancy or age. The words of Patrick Henry, in the Convention of Virginia, still rung in his ears: "They may liberate every one of your slaves. The Congress possess the power and will exercise it." Now, sir, the first step towards this consummation, so devoutly wished by many, is to pass such laws as may yet still further diminish the pittance which their labor yields to their unfortunate masters. To produce such a state of things as will insure, in case the slave shall not elope from his master—his master will run away from him. Sir, the blindness, as it appears to me—I hope gentlemen will pardon the expression—with which a certain quarter of this country—I allude particularly to the seaboard of South Carolina and Georgia—has lent its aid to increase the powers of the General Government on points—to say the least, of doubtful construction—fills me with astonishment and dismay. And I look forward, almost without a ray of hope, to the time which the next census, or that which succeeds it, will assuredly bring forth—when this work of destruction and devastation is to commence in the abused name of humanity and religion—and when the imploring eyes of some will be, as now, turned towards another body, in the vain hope that it may arrest the evil and stay the plague.

The question was finally taken, and the House refused to agree in reducing the minimum to forty cents—yeas 101, nays 104, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander of Virginia, Allen of Tennessee, Archer, Baylies, P. P. Barbour, J. S. And then the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 9.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts providing for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land in the St. Helena and Jackson Courthouse land districts," reported the same with amendments; and the bill was committed to the Committee of the whole House to which the bill of this House upon the same subject is committed.

Mr. RANKIN, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for the extinguishment of the debt due to the United States, by the purchasers of public lands," reported the same without amendment; and it was committed to the Committee of the whole House to which the bill of this House, upon the same subject, is committed.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Alfred Moore and Sterling Orgain, assignees of Morris Linsay," reported the same without amendment; and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the same committee, made a report on the petition of William Cocke, accompanied by a bill to compensate him for certain military services rendered the United States during the late war; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the revision of the tariff.

The House concurred with the Committee of the Whole in the fifth amendment, which is to strike out the following:

"On Russia duck, per piece of fifty-two archeens, two dollars each piece;

"On Raven's duck, per piece of fifty-two archeens, one dollar and twenty-five cents each piece;

"On Holland duck, per piece of fifty-two archeens, two dollars and fifty cents each piece."

The House also agreed to the sixth amendment, which is to substitute the four and a half cents, instead of six cents, as the duty on cotton bagging. Ayes 84, noes 62.

The seventh amendment, which is to reduce the duty on bar iron, from $1 12 to 90 cents per cwt., being under consideration—

A debate arose, in which Messrs. BUCHANAN, UDREE, BROWN, and STEWART, opposed the reduction; and Messrs. REED, RANDOLPH, TUCKER, McDUFFIE, MERCER, CAMBRELENG, WEBSTER, and MARVIN, supported it.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, it is not my design to enter into a discussion of the general principles of the bill now before the House. Although I am fully prepared to do so, yet, time has become so precious, and so much has already been said upon the subject, that I have abandoned any such intention.

I will, however, take the liberty of asking the Committee to attend to some observations which I shall make, in reply to that part of the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) which related to hemp and iron. The reasons which that gentleman urged, with great ability and zeal, against an additional duty upon these articles, were, that much injury would result from it, to the manufacture of ships and to the navigation of the country. In the course of his remarks, he alleged that our navigation had been left dependent upon its own resources, without any protection from Government; that it was in a depressed and declining condition; to use his own phrase, that it was barely able to keep its head above water; and that the weight which this bill would bring to bear upon it, by the additional imposts on hemp and iron, might destroy it, or, to repeat the gentleman's words, might be the last ounce which would break the camel's back. As a consequence from all these observations, he inferred that the Navy was in danger of destruction.

In opposition to this argument, I trust I shall be able to show, conclusively, that no branches of domestic industry have ever been cherished by the legislation of this country with as much care as those of ship-building and navigation; that both these branches, although they have suffered in the general depression of the country, are now in a more prosperous condition than any other portion of domestic industry; and that they are perfectly able, and ought to be willing, to bear the additional duty upon hemp and iron proposed by this bill, even if it should amount to what the gentleman supposes. If, said Mr. B., I can establish these positions, it will result as a necessary inference, that our Navy is in no danger from the measure now under consideration.

Sir, said Mr. B., it is fortunate that the first Congress which sat under the Federal Constitution, when they came to legislate upon the navigating interest of the country, were not guided by the principles which we have so often heard reiterated in this Hall. They did not belong to that school of politicians whose principal dogmas are, "Let trade regulate itself;" "Let not legislation attempt to divert industry or capital from the channels in which they are flowing into other branches." On the contrary, they believed that the manufacture of ships, and their navigation, were interests which required legislative protection, and they afforded it in the most effectual manner.

The third act which ever passed the Congress of the United States was that of the 20th July, 1789, imposing duties on tonnage. It was afterwards repealed by the act of the 20th July, 1790; which, however, re-enacted in substance the same provisions. Whilst these acts declare that ships or vessels of the United States, arriving from any foreign port or place, shall pay a duty of only six cents per ton upon each entry, they enact that all other ships or vessels shall pay a duty of fifty cents per ton, except those built within the United States and belonging to foreigners, which shall pay thirty cents per ton. The legislative protection afforded by these acts, to that portion of our tonnage employed in the coasting trade and in the fisheries, was of a still more decisive character. Whilst ships or vessels of the United States, engaged in these pursuits, paid a duty of but six cents per ton, in each year, those "not of the United States" paid fifty cents per ton upon each entry.

In addition to these discriminating duties upon tonnage, in favor of our own citizens, the act of the 10th August, 1790, added 10 per cent. to the rates of duties imposed, "in respect to all goods, wares, and merchandise, which shall be imported in ships or vessels not of the United States."

What, Mr. Speaker, was the effect of this legislative protection upon our tonnage and navigation? Let Mr. Pitkin and Dr. Seybert answer this question. Mr. Pitkin, in his View, declares that—

"These extra charges on the navigation and commerce of foreign nations were sufficient to drive from our ports the greatest proportion of the foreign tonnage. All foreign nations were affected by the system we had adopted in favor of the ship-owners in the United States. The diminution of the foreign tonnage employed in our trade was, with very few exceptions, rapid, regular, and permanent."

Dr. Seybert, in his Statistical Annals, bears the same testimony. He states that—

"Our discriminations operated powerfully in favor of our shipping. Vessels not of the United States, of 200 tons burden, on entering our ports, paid £20 tonnage duty, and for a cargo of the value of £2,000, they paid £15, extra duty, more than did the vessels of the United States, of the same tonnage, and laden as aforesaid. These extra charges were sufficient to drive from our ports the greatest proportion of the foreign tonnage. All foreign nations were affected by the system we had adopted; it seemed to operate like magic in favor of the ship-owners in the United States. The diminution of the foreign tonnage employed in our trade was, with very few exceptions, rapid, regular, and permanent."

I will freely acknowledge, said Mr. B., that the wars in Europe, and our neutral condition, by placing within our reach a large portion of the carrying trade of other nations, assisted these discriminating duties in producing their effect upon our navigation, with such astonishing rapidity. Dr. Seybert states, that "in 1789, our shipping was not sufficient for the transportation of the domestic produce of the States; one-third of that which was then employed for that purpose, belonged to foreigners;" and that "in 1793, our tonnage exceeded that of every other nation, except Great Britain."

These discriminating duties, and the unexampled increase of our tonnage, alarmed the Government of Great Britain. They dreaded the rapid progress of our navigation, and made it a primary object to check its augmentation. For this purpose, they proposed, in the year 1791, "that British ships trading to the ports of the United States, should be there treated, with respect to the duties of tonnage and impost, in like manner as ships of the United States should be treated in the ports of Great Britain." By this means, they expected to crush our navigation in its infancy. They well knew, if they could persuade our Government to cast it, at that period of its existence, upon the ocean, without protection, they would obtain what they so ardently desired—a monopoly of our trade. They were convinced, that our navigation could not then endure a competition with the long established navigation of Great Britain.

The statesmen of that day, thanks be to Providence, did not act upon the modern fashionable doctrines of political economy. They refused to accept this offer of a reciprocity of trade between the two countries, which Great Britain had made. They did not adopt the principle, that trade should regulate itself. No, Mr. Speaker, they cherished and nourished our navigation in its infancy, by protecting duties; and, in this manner, infused into it such energy and vigor, that it can now fearlessly go forth, and, upon equal terms, challenge competition with the world. The same kind of protection will produce the same effect upon the manufactories which this bill proposes to encourage.

Dr. Seybert informs us, that these discriminating duties on tonnage and imports alarmed the British merchants and ship-owners. That was a most favorable omen. In this particular, I can congratulate the advocates of the present bill that they are equally fortunate. Every British merchant, every British agent, and every vender of British goods, within the United States, have taken the alarm. Should this bill pass, they know that the day is not far distant, when they shall cease to drain from us our wealth, and to enrich themselves and the British manufacturers, at our expense.

The House have distinctly perceived the effect of these discriminating duties upon the foreign tonnage of the United States. Their operation upon that employed in the coasting trade was still more decisive. In this trade, the voyages from port to port in the United States being, comparatively speaking, but short, the burden of fifty cents per ton, upon every entry, imposed upon foreign vessels, was so onerous that, in its effect, it soon amounted to an absolute prohibition. In this manner our own navigation was virtually put in the exclusive possession of that important branch of our commerce, long before the act of 1817 declared "That no goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be imported, under penalty of forfeiture thereof, from one port of the United States to another port of the United States, in a vessel belonging wholly or in part to a subject of any foreign Power."

It is manifest, therefore, that these acts of Congress went much further in protecting our navigation against foreign competition, than the bill now before the House contemplates going, in regard to any branch of our agriculture or manufactures. And yet the representatives of the navigating interest in this House, not only complain that it has been left dependent upon its own resources, without any protection from Government; but they are the first and loudest in resisting the moderate encouragement which this bill proposes to other branches of domestic industry. Is this grateful? Is it generous? Is it just?

Here, Mr. Speaker, it may be necessary to show in what manner the acts of Congress, to which I have referred, gave our ship-builders protection. It will be found that the statesmen, by whom they were enacted, had a proper idea of the importance of encouraging the manufacture of ships; and, I trust, those of the present day are not so degenerate, that they need to be reminded of it by the toast of a Prime Minister of England, which the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) has thought fit to repeat for our edification.

We have seen that these discriminating duties upon imports and tonnage, in favor of our own citizens, were confined in their operation to "ships or vessels of the United States." To constitute "a ship or vessel of the United States," it is necessary not only that it should be owned by a citizen or citizens thereof, but that it should have been built within the same. This is a general rule, to which I know of but two exceptions—the one in favor of vessels captured by our citizens from the enemy, and declared to be lawful prize, and the other of vessels condemned for a breach of the revenue laws. There never was a time in the history of the United States when an American merchant could purchase from a foreign ship-builder a vessel built in a foreign country, and have her so naturalized under our laws as to free her from the imposition of these discriminating duties. Of consequence, the domestic manufacture of ships was as completely protected by these regulations against foreign competition as was our navigation. The ship-builder and navigator moved hand in hand. The same encouragement was afforded to both, and the same success attended that encouragement. We are now able to manufacture ships much cheaper, as I shall show hereafter, than they can in Great Britain.

Let us now pause for a moment, and reflect what would have been the present condition of our ship-building and navigation, had the same system of policy been pursued in relation to these important interests, which gentlemen now wish to pursue towards our domestic manufactures. England, our great rival, possessed tonnage in abundance, capital, and skill. It was both her interest and her inclination to overwhelm our rising navigation. The struggle would have been between the vigor of manhood and the feebleness of infancy. Our navigation, without protection, must have been crushed. It then stood in the same relation to British navigation, that our infant manufactures do at present towards the long existing establishments of a similar nature in Great Britain.

The very same arguments which the navigating interest have used against this bill, might have been urged in opposition to the discriminating duties for their protection. The agriculturists, who had produce to be transported to a foreign market, might have argued that, if freight could be procured at a cheaper rate in an English than in an American vessel, they had a right to this advantage; that these discriminating duties were bounties, paid by the great mass of the people to the navigating interest, and, therefore, they should not be imposed. The shipping merchants might have said, Let us buy where we can buy the cheapest, and sell where we can sell the dearest. If it be for our advantage, permit us, without the payment of discriminating duties, to purchase our ships in foreign countries. Government should not, by legislation, divert capital from other branches into ship-building and navigation. Whenever it shall be for the interest of individuals to employ it in this manner, it will be so employed; and then, and not till then, will it be the interest of the nation.

The true answer to all the suggestions of this nature, which might have been urged against our discriminating duties, and have been used against the present bill, is, that a wise nation, like a wise individual, should be willing to suffer a trifling temporary inconvenience in the beginning, that it may attain a great permanent good in the end. Should you plant and nourish those domestic manufactures only, which are congenial to your country, and of which you possess the raw material in abundance; if, in their infancy, you shield them, by protecting duties, against destruction from foreign competition and foreign capital; although, for a short time, the price may be enhanced to the consumer, yet, before long, it will be reduced below that of the foreign article. Our experience with respect to coarse cotton goods completely justifies this remark.

But, upon the present occasion, we should be governed by higher considerations than these. I would vote for this bill upon the same principle that I would for the erection of a necessary fortification or the building of a navy. Are not the woollen and the cotton manufactures necessary to our independence? Is a nation perfectly independent, without clothing for its people, without iron, and without hemp? Is it either patriotic or wise to rely for the means of defence upon foreign nations, when we possess them in abundance within ourselves?

In the days of peace, whilst those nations are all desirous of pouring their manufactures upon us, and of exhausting our wealth for their aggrandizement, we shall experience no difficulty in obtaining supplies. But, let the clouds of war lower over our heads, let the nation be deprived of its foreign supplies, and cast upon its own energies for its defence, and what will then be our condition? The events of the late war, within the recollection of every gentleman on this floor, afford the best answer to this question. If there ever were a nation which should have been taught wisdom on this subject, by the lessons of experience, it is our own.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have been wandering from that portion of the subject, to which I promised I would confine myself, into the general principles of the bill. The best apology which I can make for this digression is to return to it immediately.

I admit, said Mr. B., that the navigating interest, in common with the other great interests of the country, suffered considerable depression in consequence of the general peace in Europe. I deny, however, that this depression was at all in proportion with that experienced either by agriculture or manufactures. During the long period in which the nations of Europe were involved in war, we had a large portion of the carrying trade of the world. The general pacification terminated this profitable branch of commerce, and left our navigating interest dependent upon its own resources, and those of the country. It will be found, however, upon examination, that, notwithstanding the disadvantages against which it had to contend, the Government and the people of the United States sustained it in this crisis. It has always been the favorite of our legislation.

The American tonnage, employed in foreign trade, which entered the ports of the United States, during the year ending the last day of September, 1823, was 775,271 tons. This is greater than it has been in any year ending on the last day of December, since 1811, except the years 1816, 1817, 1819, and 1820. It is nearly 5,000 tons less than in 1817; but it is above 20,000 tons more than in 1818, and upwards of 5,000 tons more than in 1821. The House will understand that I am now speaking of the tonnage which paid duties. It will at once be perceived, that this is greater than our actual foreign tonnage, inasmuch as the same vessel may, and often does, pay duty more than once in a year. If, however, we look at the actual registered tonnage of the United States, engaged in foreign trade, the prospect is equally cheering. It has been gradually increasing for several years. I hold a statement of it in my hand, from 1816 up till 1822, both inclusive; from which it appears that, in 1822, it amounted to 628,150 tons. In 1818, it had been 606,088. Between these two periods, its increase was 22,062 tons. Although, from this statement, it appears that, in 1816, it was 800,759 tons, in 1817, 809,724 tons, and that, in 1818, it was suddenly reduced to 606,088 tons, yet this is not a true state of the case. The Register of the Treasury has certified that this sudden decrease arose "principally from the registered tonnage having been corrected in 1818, by striking off all the vessels, the registers of which were granted prior to the year 1815, and which were supposed by the collectors to have been lost at sea, captured," &c.

Whilst the present state of our foreign tonnage presents nothing calculated to produce despondence, the condition of that employed in our coasting trade is flourishing beyond example. It has been increasing gradually and rapidly ever since the adoption of the Federal Constitution. In 1816 it amounted to 522,164 tons. In 1822 it was 624,188 tons. Thus, it appears that, in the short space of six years, it increased more than 100,000 tons. The same quantity of tonnage, in this trade, affords employment to a much greater number of sailors than in the foreign trade; and the actual tonnage engaged in each is now about equal.

This branch of our commerce must grow with our growth, and strengthen with our strength. Human foresight cannot calculate its future extent or advantages, should it be directed by a wise system of policy. The territory of this nation is so vast, and its capacities for the production and manufacture of almost every article of necessity or luxury are so extensive, that nearly all our mutual wants will, at no very distant day, be supplied by a free and unrestricted commerce with each other.

Besides, this trade will be a powerful means of perpetuating our Union. Providence, by rendering the different portions of our country dependent upon each other, has laid the foundations of that intercourse which will bind us together by the adamant bonds of mutual interest and affection.

Sir, said Mr. B., it must strike every person with astonishment, who examines this subject, that our foreign tonnage has not been greatly diminished since the general pacification of Europe. How has this interest been able to support itself at its present amount, notwithstanding the loss of the foreign carrying trade? I answer, by the aid of Governmental protection; and, although this allegation may be at variance with that of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) I hold myself bound to prove it.

In the year 1815 the United States, believing her marine to have acquired sufficient strength and vigor to sustain a competition upon equal terms against the world, proposed to all nations a fair reciprocity of trade. By the act of the 3d of March of that year, we declared that we would admit into our ports the vessels of every nation, carrying articles the produce or manufacture of such nation, without levying any other tonnage or impost duty than was levied on American vessels; provided such nation would admit into their ports American vessels, laden with American produce or manufactures, without imposing any impost or tonnage duty beyond that which was paid by their own vessels. On the 3d July, 1815, the United States concluded a commercial convention with Great Britain, founded upon these principles, so far as respected our trade with her territories in Europe; but her possessions in the West Indies, and on the continent of North America, were expressly excluded from its operation.

The British Government, after the general peace in Europe, determined to adhere rigidly to their colonial system, so far as their own navigation was concerned. Although they were willing that there should be a direct trade between the United States and their West Indian and North American colonies, yet they insisted that it should be carried on by their own vessels. The ports of these colonies were therefore closed against American vessels, and they were entirely excluded from any participation in the trade.

What portion of our citizens was injured by the exclusion of American tonnage from these ports? It was not the farmer, who had corn and flour, nor the planter, who had tobacco, nor the merchant, who had lumber, to be transported to market. To them it was a matter of no importance, whether these articles were carried to the West Indies in an English or an American vessel. In either case, they could be exchanged for the same quantity of rum, sugar, or molasses. It was the navigating interest alone, which was directly injured by this regulation. No other class of society had any concern in the question, except that general one, which every good citizen ought to feel in protecting the useful establishments of his country. Our navigating interest petitioned Congress for relief. What was the consequence? For their benefit, we conceived the bold design of compelling Great Britain to abandon her colonial system, and to break those fetters in which she had for ages bound this portion of her trade. On the 18th April, 1818, the Congress of the United States passed a law, declaring that "the ports of the United States shall be and remain closed against every vessel owned wholly or in part by a subject or subjects of His Britannic Majesty, coming or arriving from any port or place in a colony or territory of His Britannic Majesty, that is or shall be, by the ordinary laws of navigation and trade, closed against vessels owned by citizens of the United States." The provisions of this act were considerably extended by those of the supplementary act of the 15th May, 1820.

What, then, were the weapons with which we commenced this great undertaking? For its accomplishment, we depended altogether upon the patience and patriotism of our people. The contest was, whether our citizens interested in the trade with the British colonies, or those colonies, could the longest, and with the most fortitude, endure its destruction. How much those citizens suffered, for the benefit of the navigation of the country, will appear from the very able memorial from Norfolk, which was presented during the first session of the last Congress. The memorialists urged the repeal of these acts. They stated their conviction, that the attempt to compel Great Britain to abandon her colonial system was altogether hopeless; as she had "often and openly avowed her determination not to abandon it but with her existence." They declared that, under the operation of the existing laws, their farmers, their merchants, their dealers in timber and lumber, in fact all classes of their citizens were deprived, in a great measure, of their former resources, and were, many of them, burdened with debts which they were unable to pay. This picture, drawn by the inhabitants of Norfolk, of their sufferings for the benefit of our navigation, is applicable to every other part of the Union interested in the trade with the British West Indies.

The spirit of the country, however, nobly sustained its navigation in this contest. The great agricultural interest stood unmoved. They were willing to suffer for the benefit of the ship owners. Congress refused to repeal these acts.

Our bold policy finally triumphed, and, on the 24th June, 1822, an act of the British Parliament repealed their colonial system in favor of the United States, and opened their ports in the West Indies and North America to vessels belonging to our citizens. And yet, notwithstanding, the navigating interest complain that they have been left unprotected by the Government to struggle against the world.

Here, said Mr. B., I will take leave to remark, that I was astonished to hear it alleged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) that this concession, made by the British Government in favor of our navigation, was an evidence that they were departing from their restrictive system. No, sir; if it proves any thing, it is the efficiency of this system. This concession was extorted from them by the adoption of our countervailing restrictions, and is strong testimony in favor of the power of that policy, when properly exercised, to obtain justice from foreign nations. However much English statesmen may talk about the new doctrine of the freedom of trade, they take care to act, in every case of importance, upon their old principles. It is, therefore, not improbable, that the scraps of speeches made by my Lord Liverpool, and others, which the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) has collected and read to this House, have found their way to the very market for which they were intended. Should this bill be defeated at the present session, as I trust it will not, I have no doubt but that we shall have a fresh supply of the same articles imported before the next session of Congress. In Great Britain they dread nothing more than the adoption by our country of that system, which the Speaker has aptly styled the American policy. Rest assured, sir, they will leave no means untried to defeat it.

I will mention one other example to show with what care, and at what expense to the other interests of the country, this Government has fostered, and I admit wisely, its navigation. France, immediately after she had extricated herself from the long wars in which she had been involved, devoted herself to the cultivation of the arts of peace. Among other things, she immediately directed her attention towards her marine. She was anxious to obtain the exclusive privilege of carrying those of our productions which she used in her manufactures. For this purpose she established discriminating duties, in favor of cotton, tobacco, and potashes, imported in her own vessels, which are equivalent to a tonnage duty of from $18 to $21 per ton. The navigating interest of the United States took the alarm, and memorialized Congress upon the subject. To that interest Congress never lent a deaf ear. On the 15th of May, 1820, an act passed, which imposed a countervailing duty of $18 per ton, upon all French vessels entering the ports of the United States. The consequence of this measure was the suspension, in a great degree, of the direct trade between this country and France. That profitable branch of our commerce was at once sacrificed to promote the interests of our navigation. The House will readily perceive to what degree that portion of the citizens of the United States, who had commodities to be carried to market in France, must have suffered under the operation of this system. They, however, suffered without murmuring; because they knew that their misfortunes were intended to benefit that class of their fellow-citizens concerned in navigation.

Our countervailing duties on French tonnage produced the desired effect. On the 24th June, 1822, the very day on which the British Parliament opened their colonial ports to our vessels, the convention with France was concluded, which placed our carrying trade with that country upon a fair and reciprocal basis.

From this brief history, we have learned that the patience and patriotism of the people of this country have obtained for their foreign navigation, a signal triumph over both England and France; and have opened new and profitable avenues for its enterprise. And yet the Representatives of that interest upon this floor, complain loudly that it has been left unprotected. They make this complaint in the face of a system of legislation in its favor, which is unparalleled in the annals of the country in regard to any other object. The Government watched over its infancy with parental care, and afforded it protection against foreign rivals, whilst such protection was necessary. When it had attained sufficient vigor to fear no rival—when a fair competition with all nations was that which it most desired, the Government obtained for it this important advantage. Now, when it is in a prosperous situation, having got every thing which it asked, it is the first to cry out against affording a comparatively trifling protection to other branches of American industry. Is this gratitude? Is it even-handed justice? Is it doing unto others as you would they should do unto you?

I shall now proceed to prove, that the navigation of the country is perfectly able to bear the additional duty upon hemp and iron proposed in the bill, as reported by the Committee on Manufactures. In order to establish this position, it will not be necessary to add much to what I have already said. For the sake of the argument, I shall suppose, with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) that the small additional duties upon these articles will be permanent additional burdens to that amount imposed upon our navigation. Even under this view of the subject, that interest is able to bear them; and considering what has been done for it by the country, ought to bear them for the common good, without a murmur.

The House, I feel certain, will understand, I do not admit that these additional duties will continue to be additional burdens upon the navigating interest. On the contrary, I firmly believe that the domestic competition which must necessarily spring up under this protection, will, in a few years, reduce the price both of hemp and of iron.

These additional duties cannot injure the tonnage employed in our coasting trade. This portion of our navigation, which, in 1822, was nearly equal to that engaged in foreign trade, and which must increase rapidly, has no competition to dread. It enjoys a monopoly. It will, therefore, sustain no loss in consequence of the additional duties, because, in proportion as you enhance the price of the vessel, you will increase the freight. The case might be different, if foreign competition were not altogether excluded. Would it not, then, be just, that this portion of our tonnage should be compelled to use the hemp and iron of our own production, even at an advanced price? We have established a prohibitory system in its favor—should not, then, the same rule be adopted in favor of our farmers and manufacturers, at least so far as respects the hemp and iron necessary in the construction and repair of the vessels which it employs? The bill before the House, however, instead of proceeding thus far, only imposes a small additional duty upon these articles, and yet it has been denounced, as though it would prostrate the navigation of the country.

I admit, said Mr. B., that our foreign tonnage must enter into competition with the world, and, therefore, it stands upon a different basis from that employed in our coasting trade. Under these circumstances, can it endure the proposed additional duties? I answer boldly in the affirmative. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) has stated, that all the materials of ship building, except the timber, are cheaper in England than in this country.

This may be, and no doubt is the case. But is not timber the chief, and by far the most expensive material in the construction of a ship? In England they are compelled to purchase this article in foreign countries, and to pay the heavy expense of its transportation; whilst we possess it in abundance at home. The consequence is, that a ship of the same tonnage may be built much cheaper in this country than in England. We have the testimony of the Mercantile Society of New York to this effect. The Committee of Manufactures, before they reported their bill to this House in January, 1821, addressed certain questions to that Society, two of which, with their answers, I will take leave to read to the House:

"Question. What is the cost of a British ship of say 300 tons? What of an American of the same force and burden; and, generally, the difference in the price of shipping, by the ton, in each country, completely equipped?"

Answer. A British ship of 300 tons, equipped for sea, will cost $24,000, or $80 per ton. An American ship of the same quality, will cost $18,000 or $60 per ton.

Question. The quantity of iron and cordage to the 100 tons of shipping?

Answer. It will require 4 tons of iron, 1,500 lbs. of copper bolts, 4½ tons cordage, and 20 bolts of duck to the 100 tons."

In answer to another question, the same Society state, that "foreign vessels would not have a preference, in our ports, over American built vessels, unless at a reduction in freight of 25 per cent. or advantages equivalent, at the port of destination."

Thus, it appears that the additional duty of $7 50 per ton, proposed upon iron by the bill, as reported, on a ship of 300 tons burden, would amount only to $90, and that upon hemp would be equal to about $200. How, then, sir, can this additional duty of $290 upon a ship of 300 tons, seriously injure, much less destroy, our navigation? Is it possible we can, in the slightest degree, be alarmed by such a clamor, when we consider that a vessel of this description now costs, in England, our great rival in navigation, $6,000 more than it does in our country?

It has been urged, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) against the proposed additional duties on hemp and iron, that if a sufficient quantity of these articles to supply the domestic demand, were produced in this country, that our navigating interest would lose their freight from Russia and Sweden. Sir, said Mr. B., has it come to this? Shall we be compelled to purchase articles in foreign countries for no other reason but to increase the employment for our navigation? Are all the other interests of the country to be sacrificed, that the welfare of this one may be promoted? I trust not. It appears to me that the bare statement of this argument is its best refutation. We are asked to buy hemp and iron from foreigners—we are called upon to transport our wealth to distant countries to pay for these articles—and for what reason? Not that we cannot produce them in abundance for ourselves; not that we need them; but simply because the favored class of our citizens concerned in navigation want to enjoy the advantages resulting from their carriage. You must, sir, purchase the merchandise, that they may receive the freight. I am glad the gentleman has come out boldly and avowed this position.

After what I have already said, it will be necessary I should add a few words only, concerning the Navy; because it is manifest that it cannot be injured by the additional duties upon hemp and iron, if I have taken a correct view of their operation upon our ship building and our navigation. I feel myself constrained, however, to make one or two observations on this subject.

I am a sincere friend to the Navy. One of the earliest political maxims impressed upon my mind was, that it would be our most safe and natural bulwark against foreign invasion. This opinion has been confirmed by the victories which it achieved during the late war—victories which have equally covered both itself and the nation with glory. I would, therefore, warn its true friends to have a care how they introduce it into every debate upon the subject of this tariff. Like all the other institutions of this country, it must depend, for its support, upon public opinion. Withdraw that from it, and it must and will sink. Are those gentlemen, then, its genuine friends who wield it as the chief weapon of opposition against the present bill?

If, whenever any measure calculated to promote the domestic industry of the country, and to benefit its landed interest, shall be introduced into Congress, the cry is resounded, that it cannot be adopted, because thereby you may injure the Navy; the people will at last begin to believe that there is something incompatible between their prosperity and its existence. If they shall at any time be impressed with this conviction, which I trust in God they never may, but to which the course of argument that has been pursued by the enemies of this bill directly leads, its swift destruction will be the inevitable consequence. The people will not continue to sustain an institution which they have been taught to believe stands as a perpetual barrier against the adoption of any system, calculated to encourage the agriculture and manufactures of the country, and for the promotion of whose glory their own welfare must be the sacrifice. The Navy has nothing to fear except from such friends and from itself. Recent events have alarmed its true friends with serious apprehensions that it has become intoxicated with prosperity, and has been relaxing in discipline. If, at this moment, when such impressions are abroad throughout the land, it shall be made the instrument by which this bill shall be defeated, and you should pass the one now on your table creating a magnificent establishment of vice admirals and rear admirals, the consequence may be justly dreaded. Should these measures not shake its standing in the opinion of the people, I confess for one I shall be disappointed. Thanking the House for their attention, I shall not trouble them longer upon the subject, having already said much more than I intended when I rose.

When Mr. BUCHANAN had taken his seat—

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, rose, and said he regretted that the motion now submitted, to reduce the proposed duty on iron, compelled him to depart from the determination he had formed not to trouble the House with any remarks of his upon this subject. But when he saw, in this motion, a blow aimed at the vital interests of those whom he had the honor to represent upon this floor, it would be a culpable dereliction of public duty in him to remain silent. He did not intend, however, he said, to enter upon the discussion of the general principles of the bill, further than was necessary to meet and obviate the arguments which had been employed by gentlemen who had supported the proposition now under consideration.

The objections urged by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. FULLER) who first addressed you, are in substance these: That the proposed increase of duty on iron would impair the revenue; injure the farmer; tax all classes of the community; destroy the business, and increase the burdens of commerce and navigation; prostrate the Navy; create monopolies; shut the ports of Russia against our produce—and all for the benefit of a few overgrown and wealthy iron masters. This, Mr. S. said, he believed was a fair and full statement of the grounds of opposition assumed, not only by the honorable gentleman, (Mr. FULLER,) but also by his colleagues, (Mr. WEBSTER and Mr. REED,) as well as the gentlemen from South Carolina and Virginia, (Messrs. McDUFFIE and RANDOLPH.)

In the first place, Mr. S. said, it would be proper to inquire into the nature of this proposition, fraught with such direful consequences. It was, he said, nothing more nor less than a proposition to add thirty-seven cents a hundred to the existing duty on bar iron, equal to $7 40 cents per ton—not a protecting, but a mere revenue duty.

The quantity of iron consumed in the United States was estimated at 45,000 tons per annum. During the existence of the embargo, non-intercourse, and war, which created a necessity for the domestic manufacture of this article, capital to a large amount was invested, iron works sprung up in almost every part of the country, and the home supply was soon equal to the demand. However, peace was soon restored, which again let in the foreign article. Still our infant establishments maintained the unequal contest successfully, until Congress interposed, not to protect but to destroy them; and by the iniquitous tariff of 1816, which increased the duties upon sugar, &c., near one hundred per cent., reduced the duty upon iron from thirty-two per cent. to nine dollars per ton. This gave the death blow to the American manufactures. They sunk one after another—the importations increased regularly every year, until they rose from 3,000 to 33,787 tons per annum, leaving about 12,000 tons for domestic production; and the importation of pig iron had also increased, from 104 tons to 3,000 per annum. But, sir, we are told by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. FULLER) that the Russians, (from whom we get the most of our iron) are poor, and if we do not buy their iron they cannot buy our produce. The gentleman feels no regret for the fate of the American manufacturer who is thus destroyed—the American laborer who is thus left without employ and without bread—the American farmer who is thus left without a market for his produce—but his sympathies are all alive for the poor serfs and Cossacks of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, lest they should starve for want of our produce. But, sir, do they take our produce for their iron? No, sir; they are not such fools as to follow our example, and take from us what they can produce at home. Sir, they take almost nothing but your cash. How stands the account? Last year we imported from Russia to the amount of $2,258,797; while the amount of domestic produce exported to Russia amounted to only $51,635; leaving a balance to be paid in cash, of $2,207,162. So much for the often repeated argument that we must buy from Russia, or Russia would not buy from us. We give at the rate of $44 for their produce, and get back one for ours. Such a policy as this would ruin any nation. No wonder that, with such a system, our currency was reduced in three years from one hundred and ten to forty-five millions; no wonder that our stocks, and every thing transferable, was remitted to Europe to pay an unfavorable balance of trade; no wonder that agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, were all alike struggling for their existence. If there is, however, continued Mr. S., any article we ought to manufacture above all others, an article for which we should be independent of the world, he contended that it was iron; it was equally necessary in peace and in war; it was intimately connected with the defence of the country—as much so as powder and ball. Our country, he said, abounded with ore, with coal, provisions, every thing necessary for its manufacture, and the raw material was useless for any other purpose; the capital was already vested, and labor unemployed, which wanted but the vivifying touch of Governmental patronage and protection, to spring at once into successful operation, saving millions to the nation, affording a market to the farmer, and employment to labor.

But, we are told by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) that our iron is not so good as the imported—that it is not suitable for the manufacture of cannon. And, sir, is it come to this? Are we to depend on Europe for our cannon? Is this nation, boasting of its independence, to look to Europe, to the Holy Alliance, for the means of national defence? He disputed the fact of inferiority. The cannon, as well as those who manœuvred them, during the late war, were purely American; and where, sir, is the evidence of their inferiority? He fearlessly affirmed that neither the metal of our guns, nor the metal of our men, were ever surpassed. He would appeal for proof to the splendid achievements on the plains of Bridgewater and New Orleans—to the glorious deeds on Erie and the ocean.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. S. then went on to another objection urged by his colleague, (Mr. BRECK,) who said we must wait till we acquire capital and skill. These, he contended, were in existence, and it was the object of this measure to put them in motion. During the war there was no want of either capital or skill. Though they were put down at present by an unwise and ruinous policy, yet he hoped, by the adoption of this measure, they would be re-suscitated. If his colleague, he said, wished to create capital and skill, the only way to arrive at his object was to pass this bill. He would wait forever, if he withheld protection and encouragement, which was the breath that gave being, life, and motion to industry, capital, and skill, in every country where they were seen to prosper. Gentlemen might ransack all history, ancient and modern, and they could not find a single instance to the contrary.

The gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) continued Mr. S., has contended, with more ingenuity than force, that the country could not furnish the article in question, and that the only effect would be to increase the duty, which operated as a tax upon the whole community, without benefiting the manufacturer—he also contended that it would impair the revenue. Mr. S. said he could not comprehend how the tax on the imported article could be increased, and the revenue diminished; both positions, he contended, could not be correct—the duty and the revenue were the same. If the duty was increased on an article imported, the revenue must, of necessity, be increased in the same proportion. But it appeared that the effect of a measure on the revenue, did not depend on the nature of the measure itself, but upon the source from which it originated. A bill was reported during the last Congress, by the Committee of Ways and Means, in which, (according to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury,) a duty of $20 per ton was proposed on iron, not for protection, but to increase the revenue. Now, when the same duty is recommended by the Committee of Manufactures, together with fifty or sixty other items of that revenue bill, at the same rate of duties, we are told it will ruin the revenue. So that the same duties, when proposed by the "Ways and Means," will improve the revenue, which, when proposed by the "Manufactures," will destroy the revenue, and lead to direct taxation. Such arguments might do to frighten and alarm the people; but, for his part, he did not believe there was any witchcraft in the word "manufactures," which could thus change the effect and operation of this measure. He had no doubt but that this bill would greatly promote the prosperity of the farmers and manufacturers, and, at the same time, add several millions per annum to the revenue. The true plan to increase the revenue, according to his judgment, Mr. S. said, was, by a wise policy, to increase the wealth and resources of the people who pay it. Cherish and sustain your own industry; rely upon your own means; develop and bring into activity your own vast resources; keep your money at home; buy less and sell more; in short, make a rich and prosperous people, and you will make a rich and flourishing Treasury—depress the people, and the revenue would sink with them. The revenue derived from imposts, he contended, would always be in proportion to the ability of the people to purchase and consume foreign products; those who now merely raised bread enough to live upon, would, if employed in manufactures, be able to consume tea, coffee, sugar, and other articles, which paid an enormous revenue to the public Treasury.

To illustrate this, he would, with the permission of the House, refer to a few facts which fell within his personal knowledge and observation. In the county in which he resided, during the late war, and at its close, there were in successful and prosperous operation some twenty or thirty iron works, of different kinds, employing perhaps fifty persons each, and saving to the nation from ore (which now remains buried and useless) near $500,000 a year. Attached to many of these works were found stores of foreign goods, supplying the workmen and others, to the amount of say $2,000 per annum—mostly groceries, tea, coffee, sugar, &c.—of which nearly one half of the whole price went into the public Treasury, in the shape of duties. Since the restoration of peace, and the repeal of the protecting duties in 1816, these works, he said, had been mostly abandoned; their owners were ruined and insolvent; the miserable hands were turned adrift without employment; the farmer, who then received from fifty to eighty cents per bushel for his grain, was now unable to get half that amount; the Government had lost the thousands of revenue derived from the sale and consumption of foreign goods; and commerce and navigation had lost the profits of their importation. The nation was impoverished by the annual loss of millions of money, which now went to support and enrich the farmers and manufacturers of England and Russia, instead of our own, who were suffering for want of a market. Land, and its produce, property of every kind, had depreciated more than 100 per cent., producing the most heart-rending scenes of distress, embarrassment, sacrifice, and bankruptcy, among those who lately enjoyed the most cheering and flattering prospects. Sir, upon what principle can such policy as this be justified or defended? He put it to honorable gentlemen to say, whether they could look on such a scene with indifference; whether they could reconcile it to their consciences to give a vote which would withhold protection from their suffering fellow-citizens, who were struggling with the boors of Russia and Sweden? He hoped the protection would be granted; if not for the sake of the manufacturer, he asked it for the sake of the farmer; for the sake of the revenue; for the merchant; for the nation; it was demanded by every thing American—by every proud and patriotic feeling. But, sir, even if it would diminish the revenue, (which he by no means admitted,) and created a necessity for an excise, still why was an impost preferable to an excise? They were both equally a tax upon the people. They were paid by the consumer. The only difference was, that the impost was paid upon the consumption of the products of foreign industry, and the excise was paid upon our own. The impost was a kind of financial trick, by which the people were compelled to pay fifteen or twenty millions of taxes without their knowledge; it was taken out of their pockets without their observing it, while they paid the excise with their eyes open; and they would, therefore, look to its appropriation and expenditure by those who represented them. This would check extravagance and promote economy, which was the life and soul of Republican Government. Extravagance and prodigality always led the way to aristocracy, when the few fed and fattened on the hard earnings of the many. Besides, he contended that the revenue derived from imposts was precarious and uncertain. In time of war it failed, when it was most wanted; the whole price of the article consumed was lost to the nation, and went to support the industry of foreign countries, to the destruction of our own. It was a most miserable policy, which sent millions out of the country to purchase what we could and ought to produce at home, for the sake of obtaining a few thousand dollars of revenue upon it, which was ultimately paid by the people. In the case of excise, the money was retained and kept in circulation to reward our own industry; and $10, which changed hands once a day, was better than $3,000, which changed hands once a year.

But, sir, we are told by the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) that this duty on iron will oppress the poor; that it will tax the farmer, who, having no market for his corn, cannot buy iron, and "will be compelled to plough his fields with a crooked stick." Sir, the object of this bill is to give to our farmers a market. Iron works consumed immense quantities of grain, and would gladly give iron in payment; whereas, in Europe, they refuse our grain, and require cash. He could safely assert, upon the best evidence, that there were single manufactories in the United States which consumed, annually, more of our grain than both England and France put together, from whom we purchased to the amount of thirty or forty millions a year. He would refer the honorable gentleman to the farmer himself: ask him whether the erection of manufacturing establishments in his neighborhood will injure his farm or his business; whether it will compel him to "plough with a crooked stick?" But, says the gentleman, it will oppress the poor, and tax all classes. Let gentlemen before they pronounce the proposed addition of 37 cents a hundred on iron oppressive, look to some of the existing duties.

By the existing tariff, which is too sacred to be touched or altered, you impose duties varying from 50 to 180 per cent. on tea, coffee, sugar, salt, &c., articles consumed by the poor, while many of the most refined luxuries, jewelry, &c., pay but seven and a half per cent. According to the existing duties, the poor man who buys fifty dollars worth of sugar, tea, and salt, a year, pays twenty-five dollars of taxes into the Treasury; while the rich man, who buys fifty dollars worth of jewelry, pays but three dollars and seventy-five cents. A more iniquitous system of taxation never existed in any country; yet it must not be touched! A duty of a few cents on iron, for the purpose of encouraging the manufacturer at home, was pronounced by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. McDUFFIE) an intolerable tax; while a duty of one hundred and twenty per cent. on tea, which could never be raised here, was not worth the gentleman's notice at all; it excited no uneasiness whatever. But we are referred by gentlemen to the remonstrances from our Chambers of Commerce. Sir, and who compose these Chambers of Commerce? He was credibly informed that a majority of them were composed of British merchants, and persons connected with British merchants and manufacturers. No wonder, sir, that they complain; that they remonstrate against any alteration of a system of policy by which they have been enabled to grow rich at our expense—which has rendered this nation more dependent and more completely tributary to Great Britain than we were when colonies—a system which favored foreigners and destroyed our own merchants, which gave them almost the entire supply of our market. It was a fact, of universal notoriety, that more than two-thirds of all the goods imported from Great Britain were imported on account of British merchants and British manufacturers, who, if let alone, with the facility of our auctions, and the benefit of our system of credits, by which we loaned to British merchants, out of the pockets of our people, more than five millions a year, without interest, they would soon succeed in driving the American merchant completely from the ocean. No wonder, then, that they should remonstrate against any change in such an admirable system, by which they receive from us more than thirty-four millions a year. But the British Minister, it is said, has remonstrated with the Secretary of State against the increase of duty on iron! The British Minister has remonstrated! And are we so humbled? Must we ask the British Minister whether we may employ our own people to make our own iron? Sir, does Great Britain ask us whether she may exclude our produce from her ports? Such a suggestion there would meet with merited contempt. These remonstrances against the measure were, with him, Mr. S. said, so many arguments in its favor. It would benefit us in the same proportion that it would injure them; our loss was their profit, and our profit would be their loss.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) has made a most pathetic appeal to the House in behalf of "commerce and navigation," which he represented as struggling for its existence, scarcely able to keep its head above water. If you impose this duty on iron, the honorable gentleman says, you throw the last stone to sink the ship. What! $7 40 a ton on iron, ruin commerce and navigation! An interest which had experienced more favor than any other in the nation—which was owned and directed by men of great wealth and capital, ruined by a trifling duty on iron! It was impossible. To build a ship of one hundred tons burden, only four tons of iron were required, upon which the whole increase of duty would be only $29 60. So that $29 60 on each vessel of one hundred tons burden, was to "sink the ship," ruin commerce, and destroy the navy. He had a better opinion of our commerce and our navy than to suppose they were to be seriously affected by a matter of this kind. But, sir, with what propriety can commerce complain, when a slight protection is asked by the manufacturing interests of the country—foreign commerce, which has ever been the favorite of Government; which has been protected at the expense of every other interest in it—not only by fleets and navies, but by discriminating duties, equal to six or seven hundred per cent. An American coasting vessel, of one hundred tons burden, for instance, making twelve entries a year, only pays six dollars duty, while a foreign vessel of the same size, and for the same entries, pays six hundred dollars. An American vessel of three hundred tons, engaged in foreign trade, making five entries per annum, would pay only ninety dollars duty, while a foreign vessel, under like circumstances, must pay seven hundred and fifty dollars. But, sir, permit me to remind the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) of some of the other burdens and taxes to which the farmers and manufacturers of this country are subjected, for the benefit and protection of foreign commerce. Sir, for what was the late war declared? Was it not, emphatically, for the protection and defence of "free trade and sailors' rights?" A war which had involved this nation in a debt of more than a hundred millions of dollars; had filled this land with widows and with orphans; a war in which the farmers and manufacturers had suffered every privation; in which they had freely and bravely fought and bled and died, for the defence of "free trade" against foreign aggression; and now, when they ask a trifling duty to protect them against foreign competition, equally destructive to them, they are gravely told that it cannot be afforded, lest it may injure "commerce and navigation." But, sir, this is not all. Are we not called upon, almost daily, in this House, to appropriate millions after millions of the public money to erect lighthouses, buoys, and beacons, along the coast, for the protection and benefit of "foreign commerce;" to support ministers, consuls, and agents, throughout the civilized world; for the regulation and protection of our "foreign commerce;" for the erection of forts and fortifications, for the defence of our harbors, dock-yards, and commercial cities; for the support and maintenance of fleets and public ships to guard and protect our foreign commerce throughout the world; and he understood, it in some instances cost the Government more money to protect our merchants, especially in the Baltic, than the whole commerce was worth. Look, sir, at the enormous expense of sending abroad fleets to distant seas, to suppress the pirates that annoy our foreign commerce. And who pays these immense expenditures? Not the merchants, but the farmers and manufacturers of this nation. And when they, the farmers and manufacturers, ask, in turn, that their interests may be protected, not by duties of six or seven hundred per cent.; not by war, nor by forts, nor lights, nor fleets, nor navies—not at the expense of millions of the public money, but by a mere act of legislation; what, sir, is the reply of the friends and champions of commerce and navigation, this highly favored interest? They gravely tell us, that we don't need protection; they cry "Let us alone; you will injure the revenue, tax commerce, and destroy the carrying trade." Might not these replies be retorted, when the merchants claim protection? Might they not be told, that the protection they sought would diminish the revenue, tax the farmer and manufacturer? Might they not, moreover, be asked, what great and signal service the foreign merchants had rendered this country, to entitle them to such special favor? Look at the ruinous balance of trade against us. But he would not recriminate. He was willing to extend every reasonable aid and protection to commerce; but he, at the same time, thought that this was not the only interest in the country; he thought there were other great and important interests in the nation entitled to favor. But commerce was represented as being on the decline, as well as agriculture and manufactures. This was, he considered, a matter of course. Commerce was the offspring of agriculture and manufactures. Where there was neither agriculture nor manufactures, there could be no commerce: they must rise and fall together. The only legitimate business of commerce was to distribute and exchange the surplus productions of labor. If by a wise policy you restore your agriculture and manufactures to their former prosperity, commerce will revive; and soon again will it be seen to spread its white bosom to the prosperous breeze. But, even if this measure should have the effect of lessening the foreign carrying trade, still we would be more than compensated by the increase of internal commerce and the coasting trade. But, would it be seriously contended that we should import what we do not want, for the sake of employing foreign commerce? Was it consistent with sound policy to import our iron from Russia, when we could produce it at home, merely to employ commerce? As well might it be contended that we ought to export our flour to England, and have it manufactured into bread, and reimported, to keep navigation and commerce employed! And this would not be more absurd and ruinous than much of the system now in operation.

Mr. S. begged leave here to notice another argument which had been urged, not only against the duty now under consideration, but against the bill generally. It was this: that the proposed measure would operate injuriously on the farmers—that it was “taxing the many for the benefit of the few.” The effect, Mr. S. contended, would be directly the reverse—it would benefit the farmers much more than the manufacturers. To simplify his views on this point, he said, he would confine them to a single county, in which he would suppose there to be at present a single manufacturing establishment, employing 100 hands, consuming $10,000 worth of grain and other agricultural productions, and making $20,000 worth of the manufactured article; and then suppose, that, by the operation of this measure, there should spring up in this country ten new and rival establishments, of equal extent,—you thus withdraw 1,000 hands from agricultural employment, and make them consumers instead of producers. You give the farmers an increased market, to the amount of $100,000; and you save $200,000 a year in one county, which is kept in profitable circulation at home, giving life and activity to every branch of industry, instead of being sent to support the industry of England, who, by her existing laws, will not suffer her people to consume a pound of our flour, even if it were offered at fifty cents a barrel? This, Mr. S. contended, was the plain and obvious tendency of the great measure under discussion. And which, he begged leave to ask, was the most benefited, the farmer or the manufacturer? Undoubtedly the farmer. The increased market, and increased demand for his produce, necessarily increased the price; while the increased competition among the manufacturers, and the increased quantity of the manufactured article thrown into the market, as inevitably diminished the price;—so that the farmer would get more for his grain, and give less for his manufactured goods. Yet, with these plain results before us, it was still gravely urged upon the House by almost every honorable gentleman who had opposed this bill. It was a principal ground of opposition, that it would “ruin the farmers—tax the many for the benefit of the few—create monopolies—enable the rich manufacturer to extort from the people,” &c.—while, in fact, its real tendency and effect was, he contended, precisely the reverse.

But, Mr. S. said, there was another and still stronger view of this subject, in relation to its effects upon the interest of the farmer and agriculturist. It was a fact, however strange it might appear, susceptible of the clearest demonstration, that this nation, almost entirely agricultural, instead of exporting, actually imported agricultural labor from the poor and wretched countries of Europe to the amount of twenty or thirty millions a year. He did not mean to say that it was imported in its rude and original shape, but it entered into the composition of manufactures, and thus altered and modified, was imported and consumed among us. Sir, of what is your imported cloth composed? your imported iron, spirits, hemp, linen—in short, almost every thing? Count the cost of the raw material, the wool, hemp, flax; then add the price of the provisions, the bread, meat, fuel, &c., consumed by those employed in the fabrication of the manufactured articles, and you will find that one-half, nay, two thirds of the price of our imported goods consisted of agricultural labor, and went to support and sustain the farmers of foreign countries, of England, France, and Russia; while our own, shut out from Europe, and shamefully abandoned at home, were left without a market, and without a motive to industry. With an almost unlimited extent of fertile territory, abounding with the finest soil and most delightful pastures, we were importing even grass from foreign countries in the shape of tallow and wool. Last year we had imported vast quantities of both; four million pounds of tallow, equal to the product of 80,000 cattle. And, was it wise in this nation, where eighty-three per cent. of the whole population were employed in agriculture, to import twenty or thirty millions of dollars' worth of agricultural produce every year, in the shape of manufactures from abroad, and most of it from England, whose territory was not much larger than some of our States, and where the proportion of agriculturists was not equal to one-third of her population? The immense sums, thus sent to Europe, he argued, were worse than thrown away, for the amount was not only lost to the country, but it introduced the labor and industry of other countries to paralyze and destroy our own. He compared it to the money expended by an individual in the purchase of spirituous liquor, or other deleterious drugs, the use of which impaired the health and ruined the constitution; in both cases, the loss of money was the smallest part of the evil. These being the effects of the present system on the farmers, any change would be to them desirable—it might be for the better, it could not be for the worse.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) has been pleased to denounce the restrictive policy as unwise and injudicious. He, Mr. S., would respectfully ask the honorable gentleman to point to the country which, neglecting the protection and encouragement of its own industry, and depending on foreign labor and skill for the supply of its wants, was not ultimately ruined? History furnishes, he said, no such instance. Look at miserable Poland, Italy, and Portugal, adopting the free trade policy. Look at wretched Ireland, dependant on England. Look at the once flourishing, but now degraded Holland, sinking, like ourselves, under the deleterious influence of the free trade system. He also referred to the once powerful and proud, but now poor and prostrate Spain. She, when self-dependant, relying on her own internal energies and resources, was feared and respected by the most powerful nations on the Continent; but since, like us, she has opened her ports to foreign nations, and become dependant on foreign labor, foreign capital, foreign industry, and skill, for the supply of her wants, all the wealth of her South American provinces, the rich mines of Peru and Chili, could not save her; she soon sunk under the withering influence of this wretched and ruinous system, to her present abject and degraded condition. And, were it not for the cheapness of our Government, the freedom of our institutions, the wars in Europe, which gave us a market, and the great and unparalleled advantages, natural and political, that we enjoy, this country, too, would have long since sunk under our present unnatural, anti-American, and destructive system of policy. But, sir, look, for a moment, on the other hand, to the condition of those nations with inferior advantages, protecting by high duties and prohibitory laws their own people, and their own industry, against the injurious effects of foreign competition. Look at France, rapidly rising, like the Phoenix, from the ashes of a wasting and desolating war of thirty years; her finances prosperous; her revenue ample; every branch of industry protected, prosperous, and successful; excluding even England, who had so recently placed the Bourbons on the throne. Look at all-powerful Russia, guarding herself against foreign competition by a perfect system of prohibitions, selling us iron, &c., to the amount of between two and three millions a year, and taking in return less than a fortieth part in the produce of our soil, and the balance in cash. It is true, sir, that, in 1820, Russia determined to try our system of free trade, of “buying where she could buy cheapest.” But mark the consequence. She soon found herself on the brink of ruin, and quickly retraced her steps. In less than two years, the Russian Minister, Count Nesselrode, declares, in his official report, that this policy compelled Russia to pay a “ruinous tribute” to England, France, Prussia, and Austria, “who remained faithful to their prohibitory systems.” “Agriculture,” he says, “without a market, industry without protection, languish and decline; specie is exported, and the most solid commercial houses are shaken,” &c. Accordingly, in 1822, Russia re-enacted her tariff; not like ours, proposing mere revenue duties, but one which contained no less than 340 prohibitions, and, in January last, a few months since, this Russian tariff underwent a “judicious revision,” by which the number of prohibitions was greatly increased. And finally, look, sir, at Great Britain, the most illustrious instance that the world has ever furnished of the complete triumph of the protecting policy. But we are told that England prospers in spite of this system. As well might it be said, that men live in spite of the bread they eat; that the grass grows in spite of the rain and sunshine; or that the globe we inhabit performs its splendid course in spite of the agency of that Being “who rides on the whirlwind and directs the storm.” Sir, England extends ample protection to every branch of her industry—agriculture, manufactures, and commerce. England is dependent on England alone; she buys nothing that she can produce, and produces every thing that can be bought. By the use of labor-saving machinery, England, with a population of fourteen millions, wields a manufacturing force equal to 220 millions of hands; one boy, in an English factory, will produce as much as will purchase the produce of fifty American farmers; one pound of cotton is so manufactured as to purchase 2,000 pounds; thus, ten cents is made equal to $200, by the addition of labor, principally of machinery. Her cotton manufactures, alone, are estimated at 224 millions, while the raw material costs less than 25; her agricultural produce, upon a territory comparatively limited, and of inferior soil, is estimated at $487,000,000 a year, while our whole agricultural exports, exclusive of cotton and tobacco, is less than $12,000,000—not equal to the support of 250,000 manufacturers, at $50 a head. Sir, what is it that enables Great Britain to lay the world under contribution? What enabled her to subsidize all Europe; to support an army of 400,000; to sustain, for nearly thirty years, an exhausting, bloody, and desolating war, with the colossal power of France, and finally enabled her to triumph on the ever-memorable field of Waterloo? Was it not the wealth derived from her manufactures? What was it, he asked, that enabled her, during that period, to raise 7,038 millions of dollars, 4,653 millions by taxes, and 2,070 millions by loans, whilst her people, notwithstanding these tremendous burdens, enjoyed an unusual degree of prosperity? Was it not attributable to her flourishing manufactures? And how was it that now, in time of peace, she could raise, and her people could pay with ease, and without a murmur, 252 millions of revenue per annum; 119 millions of which arose from the excise on twenty-five articles of manufacture, while it would convulse this nation to its centre to raise, in the same way, one-twentieth part of the amount? Sir, were we not ruined in our resources, and prostrate in our power, by a petty war of two and a half years' duration? The revenue paid by the people of Great Britain, in one year, was equal to half the whole amount of the expenditures of this Government for thirty years. Since the late war she had reduced her taxes twenty-eight millions a year; and, after defraying her enormous expenditures, and paying 135 millions, the annual interest of her national debt, she had left an efficient annual sinking fund of twenty-two millions and a half. And whence did she derive these immense resources? Trace them to their origin, and you will find it to result from the protection and encouragement afforded to her national industry, to her manufactures; which, at the same time, afforded a market for her farmers, and employment for her commerce. In Great Britain, without manufactures, neither agriculture nor commerce could be sustained; they were to them the breath of life—the daily bread they fed upon. The opposition to this measure, Mr. S. said, sprung from two sources: The commercial interest on the seaboard, and the cotton and tobacco planting interest in the South; the first from an unfounded, though sincere apprehension, that it would diminish the business and increase the burdens of commerce and navigation; the second from an apprehension, no doubt equally sincere, but equally unfounded, that, if we cease to purchase from Europe what we can and ought to make for ourselves, Europe will cease to purchase their cotton and tobacco, which now constituted three-fourths of the whole agricultural exports of this Union. These two powerful interests had hitherto governed this nation, and dictated its policy. The interior, and the West, until lately, constituting but a small part of the great concern, of course had to submit; but, having now arrived at the age of discretion, they claimed a right to participate in the administration of the Government. They were opposed to the present ruinous system of policy, which was predicated on a state of war in Europe. While all Europe was in arms—when Kings, abandoning all other pursuits, were contending in fields of blood for kingdoms, crowns, and diadems, the United States, enjoying an unbounded market, grew rich at their expense. But Europe had changed in her condition; instead of universal war, there is now universal peace; millions of men had exchanged the sword for the plough; had quit war and went to work; instead of consumers they had become producers; instead of customers had become rivals; and our produce was not only excluded from Europe, but the rival commodities had, in many instances, followed us to our own shores. During the last year even wheat, potatoes, oats, &c., had been imported in considerable quantities; and it had become necessary to protect ourselves, by duties, against these importations; and even this (the proposed duty of twenty-five cents on wheat) had been opposed by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) on the ground that the importation of foreign wheat gave additional employment to our mills, and increased the business on our canals. Our own iron works were also to be abandoned, to import our iron from Russia, for the sake of employing our "commerce and navigation!" This, he said, appeared to him to be about as wise as it would be in a Pennsylvania farmer, who, having a mill on his own farm, yet carried his grain a hundred miles into Virginia to have it ground, for the sake of employing his wagon and horses! Would it not be better for the farmer to sell his wagon, or employ it in some other way? And so he would say to the merchant.

But, sir, look at the effects of this policy—this system of free trade—"buying where we can buy cheapest." Look to what it has brought this once happy and prosperous land. With a Government the cheapest, the freest, and the best upon earth; with a country possessing every advantage of climate, situation, and soil; yet filled with monuments of misery and wretchedness, of general embarrassment, and bankruptcy, and ruin. Peace brought no relief to the farmer—none to the manufacturer; to them it brought no blessings; to the country at large it presented a cheerless prospect—of agriculture depressed, manufactures ruined, and the energies of the nation relaxed, broken, and prostrate. And even commerce, we are told by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER, though he contends that the country was never in a more prosperous condition,) is "scarcely able to keep its head above water." Sir, all the great interests of the country are at the lowest point of depression; they are struggling for life—sinking with agriculture, the basis and foundation of all, into a common grave. And why was this land of freedom, this home of liberty, thus clouded and overcast with this dark gloom and despondence, without a ray of hope to lighten or to cheer the long vista of futurity? There was no war, no famine, no plague, no taxes in the land. Could the cause then be doubtful? Did it not evidently result from our present ruinous system of policy? Was it not because the national industry was unprotected?—because we looked to Europe, instead of our own people, our own resources, for the supply of our wants?—because we buy from abroad almost every thing we eat, and drink, and wear? Look at the national currency, reduced, says the Secretary of the Treasury, in three years, from 110 to 45 millions of dollars—all gone, together with the evidences of the public debt, government, canal, and bank stocks, to pay part of the debt due to foreign merchants and manufacturers, to whom it was estimated that we were still in debt 92 millions of dollars; more than double the whole currency of the country. Our imports increased, and our exports diminished. In 1815 and 1816, our imports amounted to the enormous sum of 244 millions, and our exports to only 134 millions. Property of almost every kind, and in almost every part of the country, with which he was acquainted, depreciated more than 100 per cent.; the migration of foreign skill and capital into the country checked; eight millions of dollars of revenue lost by the surrender of public lands; sales stopped, and the price reduced to $1 25; the manufacturing establishments, erected throughout the country during the war, abandoned and dilapidating; insolvencies, sales, and sacrifices, had become common and familiar matters of every day's occurrence; while all the efforts of State legislation to administer relief had proved unavailing; the disease was beyond their reach; it was national, and required a national remedy. That remedy, he said, was contained in the bill under consideration, and he hoped to see it speedily and successfully applied. It was true it had been called by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GARNETT) a "bitter pill;" he believed, however, that the best medicines were not always the most pleasant; and it was certainly better to take even a "bitter pill," than perish. But it certainly could not, with propriety, be pronounced bitter, since the honorable Speaker had just thrown in such a vast quantity of molasses.

The strong ground, however, on which this measure was met and opposed was, that it would operate injuriously on the interests of the sugar, cotton, and tobacco planters of the South; that it would increase the price of the coarse fabrics with which they clothe their slaves, &c. This argument takes for granted the fact in controversy; a fact which he could not admit, viz., that this measure would enhance the price of the article manufactured. This he denied; and insisted that New England could, and would, manufacture the raw materials of our own country cheaper than it could be done in Europe, after being transported 3,000 miles, and encountering all the expenses of shipping and reshipping, excises, imposts, &c., to which it was subjected. When it was proposed to increase the duty upon coarse cottons, this same objection, that it was "taxing the many for the benefit of the few," was echoed in newspapers, speeches, and memorials, from Maine to Georgia. The duty was nevertheless imposed; and what has been the result? Coarse cottons, of superior quality, are now manufactured in this country, for one-half the price formerly paid to Great Britain; and now, instead of importing, we exported, last year, to the amount of $545,000 worth to foreign countries, after supplying the home consumption, amounting to many millions; which was saved and distributed among our own farmers and cotton growers, instead of going to Europe to reward foreign industry instead of our own. The same result had attended every thing that had received adequate protection—leather, nails, wood, umbrellas, shoes, boots, hats, &c.; and, from estimates made, it appeared that we saved by the manufacture of shoes, boots, and hats, alone, upwards of $34,000,000 per annum. He therefore felt warranted, by uniform experience, in the opinion, that the articles proposed to be protected by this bill—cotton, iron, coarse woollens, hemp, &c., would ultimately, and at no distant period, be furnished cheaper of American than foreign manufacture. If there was any certainty in the laws of cause and effect, this result was inevitable. But the establishment of manufactories of cotton, &c., would not only afford a market for grain and other provisions, but also for the cotton of the South; for the time might come, and was perhaps not distant, when the planter of the South might share the fate of the farmers of the Western and Middle States. They, too, might be deprived of their European market, which might be interrupted and cut off, not only by war, and the many other vicissitudes that interrupt the intercourse between nations, but it was a fact of serious import to the South, that the culture of cotton was rapidly extending itself, not only in the British islands, but also in Egypt and South America. Since 1818, the price had fallen, as appeared by the English prices current, from 28 to 7 cents a pound; our flour had also, owing to the glut of the market, fallen from $8 and $10 a barrel, to $4 50; and tobacco from $185 to $75 per hogshead.

These were some of the effects of a general peace in Europe, and they furnished powerful arguments in favor of the abandonment of a policy subject to such ruinous vicissitudes; and pointing out the necessity of adopting a permanent system of American policy, which should extend protection and encouragement to American industry, and look to American means for the supply of American wants; and if there was any nation under the sun capable of supplying all its own wants, he contended it was this. It was as inconsistent, he said, with our interest, as it was incompatible with our honor and independence, to look to the crowned heads of Europe—the Holy Alliance, for either the means of national defence or national subsistence; our fathers had achieved their independence in vain, if it was thus to be compromised and "sold for a mess of pottage." What did we not suffer, during the late war, for want of necessary supplies? It cost you at least one hundred per cent. more to clothe a soldier than it does at present. And the humiliating spectacle was presented to the world, of an American Minister applying to Congress to suspend the non-intercourse, to enable us to get from our enemies blankets, to fulfil our treaty stipulations with the Indians! This state of things soon forced into existence every variety of manufactures. Millions of capital was promptly invested, which relieved the nation. But, as soon as peace was restored, Congress, by an act of the most flagrant injustice, instead of extending protection to those who relieved them in the hour of need, repealed the duties, and enabled the enemy to crush them at once, by throwing into our market a supply of goods equal to two years' consumption; the customs that year (1816) amounted to thirty-six millions, whereas, in 1820, (four years afterwards,) they amounted to but twelve millions. In 1815 and 1816, our imports, he repeated, amounted to 244 millions, and our exports to only 134. Great Britain thus, by a single blow, did more to prostrate and destroy American wealth, independence, and power, than they could have effected by a ten years' war. We were thus at once reduced to our former dependent, colonial, and tributary condition. But he hoped the period had now arrived when these shackles, forged and riveted by foreign hands, were to be broken asunder; when this nation, taking a high, a dignified, and independent stand, summoning forth her own boundless resources, should tell the kings of Europe that she would no longer "pay them tribute." When the South and the West would look to New England, instead of Old England, for a market and supply for an exchange of equivalents, thus strengthening the bonds that unite us, by the strong ties of interest and intercourse.

And, in conclusion, he would beg leave to appeal to the liberality, the magnanimity, to the patriotism of the enlightened Representatives of the South, who, under an ample protection, were basking in the sunshine of prosperity; and he would ask them, in a spirit of frankness and conciliation, whether they could reconcile it to their consciences to withhold the trifling protection offered in this bill to the suffering farmers and manufacturers of the interior and the West? He would appeal to the distinguished Representatives of the sugar planters of Louisiana, who, with a protecting duty of three cents a pound on sugar, were rapidly acquiring unbounded wealth and princely fortunes. He would also appeal, with the same friendly feelings, to the liberality, nay, he would say to the justice of the gentlemen from the North, who so ably represented, upon this floor, the interests of "commerce and navigation," the favored few, and he would ask them whether, while they were protected and defended, not merely by enormous discriminating duties, but also at the expense of millions of the public treasure—at the expense of the best and richest blood of this country—they would turn a deaf ear to the calls of the farmers and manufacturers, the great mass of the community, for protection, not by the sword or the purse of the nation, but by a simple act of legislation—by the passage of this bill. Sir, said Mr. S., I hope and trust the protection they ask will be granted, and granted by the votes of some of the gentlemen, at least, to whose liberality, to whose justice, to whose patriotism, he had appealed. He hoped the present destructive system of policy would now be abandoned; and, upon its ruins, there would arise a system of American policy, protecting and cherishing American industry; a policy which, in his conscience, he believed would alone save this nation from ultimate bankruptcy, and raise it to that proud pre-eminence among the nations of the earth, to which the distinguished advantages derived not only from the valor of our forefathers, but from nature, and from nature's God, give us a just right to aspire.

When Mr. STEWART had concluded—

The question was taken by yeas and nays at a quarter of an hour before four o'clock, when the House agreed to the reduction—ayes 120, nays 85, as follows:

So the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, April 10.

On motion of Mr. OWEN, the Committee on Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for the appointment of a naval officer and surveyor of the port of Mobile; and to make such other provisions relative to said port as may aid commerce and secure the revenue.

Mr. WHITTLESEY laid the following resolutions on the table for consideration on Monday, viz:

1. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to report to this House the number of non-commissioned officers and privates of the marine corps in the service of the United States, and where stationed or performing duty.

2. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to report to this House the amount paid the lieutenant colonel of the marine corps, the past year, for his monthly pay and emoluments of office.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety of allowing to the heirs of Aaron Huff, late a private in the United States Army, the privilege of commuting the bounty lands for money, according to the provisions of the act of Congress heretofore in force.

The resolution was read, and, on the question being put, was disagreed to by the House.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. WARFIELD on the 6th instant; and the same being modified, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be submitted to this House a statement of the several purchases of real estate in behalf of the United States within the territorial limits of any State, since the 4th day of July, 1776, for public purposes, in pursuance of any act of Congress, or by any department or officer of the General Government, denoting in each case the particular authority under which each purchase was made; its date, and the end or use for which it was effected; the nature of the estate thereby acquired; and the person or persons by whom and to whom such estate was conveyed; together with the fact whether such purchase was or was not accompanied with the express consent of the State of whose territory such real estate constituted a part; and in the former case whether any, and if any what, special jurisdiction accompanied the cession or conveyance.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to abolish imprisonment for debt;" in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the resolution submitted by him some days since, to reduce the per diem compensation of members of Congress to six dollars, should now be taken into consideration.

The question being put, the House refused to consider the resolution.

Mr. RANDOLPH then remarked that he thought this a subject of so much importance that he should feel it his duty to press it upon the notice of the House so long as he had the honor of a seat there.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The unfinished business of yesterday, being the further consideration of the amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole, to the bill "to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports," was again taken up.

Two or three material amendments to strike out or reduce certain items, were agreed to by the House.

The question being put on concurring in the insertion of the following clause: "On all other fire arms, and on side arms, 30 per cent. ad valorem." Mr. RANDOLPH said, he could not consent that the people should be taxed, even if it were but a penny or two a pound upon tea, without knowing who taxed them; he, therefore, called for the yeas and nays upon the question. The yeas and nays were accordingly taken, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander of Tennessee, Allen of Massachusetts, Allison, Baylies, Barber of Connecticut, Bartley, Breck, Brown, Buchanan, Buck, Buckner, Burleigh, Cady, Campbell of Ohio, Carter, Cassidy, Clark, Collins, Condict, Cook, Crafts, Craig, Crowninshield, Day, Durfee, Dwight, Eaton, Eddy, Ellis, Findlay, Foote of Connecticut, Foote of New York, Forward, Frost, Garrison, Gazlay, Govan, Harris, Harvey, Hayden, Hemphill, Henry, Herrick, Herkimer, Hogeboom, Holcombe, Houston, Isacks, Jenkins, Johnson of Virginia, Kidder, Kremer, Lathrop, Lawrence, Letcher, Little, Livermore, Locke, Longfellow, McArthur, McDuffie, McKim, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Ohio, Mallary, Markley, Martindale, Marvin, Matlack, Matson, Metcalfe, Miller, Mitchell of Pennsylvania, Mitchell of Maryland, Moore of Kentucky, Morgan, O'Brien, Patterson of Pennsylvania, Patterson of Ohio, Plumer of New Hampshire, Plumer of Pennsylvania, Prince, Reed, Reynolds, Richards, Rich, Rogers, Rose, Ross, Sharpe, Sibley, Sloane, Standefer, Sterling, Stewart, Stoddard, Storrs, Strong, Swan, Tatnall, Taylor, Ten Eyck, Test, Thompson of Kentucky, Tod, Tomlinson, Tracy, Trimble, Tyson, Udree, Vance of Ohio, Van Rensselaer, Van Wyck, Vinton, Wayne, Whipple, Whitman, Whittlesey, White, Wickliffe, James Wilson, Henry Wilson, Wilson of Ohio, and Wright—123.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander of Virginia, Allen of Tennessee, P. P. Barbour, J. S. Stevenson, J. Stephenson, Taliaferro, Tattall, Thompson of Georgia, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Vance of North Carolina, Warfield, Williams of New York, Williams of Virginia, Williams of N. Carolina, and Wilson of South Carolina—59.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Several other amendments, to reduce the proposed duty on scythes, to strike out the duty on fowling pieces, drawing knives, &c., were agreed to.

On the amendment which proposes to strike out the duty of 25 cents each on frying pans, and insert four cents per pound, as the duty, Mr. RANDOLPH said, this also was a tax on the people, and he must call for the yeas and nays upon it. A short discussion took place upon the propriety of this amendment, between Messrs. McDUFFIE, TOD, CAMBRELENG, and SHARPE. The question was then taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander of Virginia, Alexander of Tennessee, Allen of Massachusetts, Allison, Baylies, Barber of Connecticut, P. P. Barbour, J. S. Barbour, Bartlett, Bartley, Blair, Bradley, Breck, Brent, Brown, Buchanan, Buck, Buckner, Burleigh, Burton, Cady, Cambreleng, Campbell of S. NAYS—Messrs. Bassett, Carter, Edwards of North Carolina, Forsyth, Gist, Hall, Hamilton, Herrick, Isacks, McCoy, Mangum, Mercer, Randolph, Ross, Saunders, Arthur Smith, William Smith, Spaight, Spence, A. Stevenson, Taliaferro, Thompson of Georgia, Tucker of Virginia, Williams of South Carolina, and Wilson of South Carolina—25.

So this amendment, also, was concurred in.

The several amendments, proposing to strike out the duty on griddles and gridirons, on indigo, and on Prussian blue, and to increase the duty on Epsom salts from three to four cents per lb., and to insert a duty on rape seed oil, were severally agreed to.

The question being put on concurring in the insertion of the clause, "On molasses ten cents per gallon," was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander of Virginia, Alexander of Tennessee, Allen of Tennessee, Allison, J. S. Barbour, Blair, Brent, Brown, Buckner, Campbell of South Carolina, Carter, Cary, Clark, Cobb, Cocke, Collins, Edwards of North Carolina, Gist, Govan, Hayden, Houston, Isacks, F. So this amendment was rejected.

The next amendment, proposing to strike out the second section of the bill, which provides that "in all cases whatsoever, all articles composed of mixed of various materials, shall pay the highest duty to which articles manufactured from any of such materials are subject," was agreed to.

The amendment proposing to strike out the third section of the bill, which provides that there shall be added to the duty imposed on any article the amount of bounty or premium allowed on that article, in the country from which the same is exported, was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander of Virginia, Alexander of Tennessee, Allen of Tennessee, Archer, Baylies, Barber of Connecticut, P. P. Barbour, J. S. So this amendment was concurred in.

The question was then taken on the amendment, proposing a new section to the bill, to allow a drawback on silk goods, which may have been unpacked for the purpose of dyeing, staining, printing, or cleansing them from stains, &c., the same as if they had not been so unpacked, passed in the affirmative.

The amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole, specifying the different duties on wines, was then taken up. Some remarks were made upon this subject by Messrs. WRIGHT and McKIM.

Mr. McKIM moved to amend the amendment by inserting "Burgundy, Champagne, Rhenish, and Tokay," as subject to the same duty as is imposed on Madeira wine, say 70 cents per gallon. This was agreed to.

The same member moved to exempt from the operation of the amendment such Spanish wines as were not enumerated in it, so as to leave them subject to the duty already imposed; which was agreed to.

The same member, also, moved to reduce the proposed duty on "Fayal and all other wines from the Westera Islands" from 40 to 30 cents per gallon. This was not agreed to.

He then moved to reduce the proposed duty on Malaga wine from 30 to 25 cents per gallon; which was also disagreed to.

He then moved to strike out "50 per cent. ad valorem," as the duty to be imposed on "Claret wines, and all other wines not before enumerated, in bottles," and insert in lieu thereof "30 cents per gallon." This was opposed by Messrs. WEBSTER and MILLER, and supported by Mr. McKIM. It was not adopted.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, moved to strike out the clause imposing a duty on Claret and Malaga wines. The amendment was not adopted.

Mr. FORSYTH then moved to amend the amendment by striking it out, and inserting a new section, imposing a duty of 50 per cent. ad valorem on all wines imported in bottles and cases; and on all wines, imported otherwise than in bottles, 40 per cent.; provided that no duty on any wine shall ever exceed 100 cents per gallon. This was advocated by the mover, and opposed by Messrs. WEBSTER and POINSETT. It was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon concurring in the amendment as agreed to in Committee of the Whole as amended by the House, and was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander of Virginia, Alexander of Tennessee, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Tennessee, Archer, Baylies, Bartlett, Bassett, Blair, Breck, Brent, Burleigh, Burton, Campbell of South Carolina, Carter, Crowninshield, Culpeper, Cushman, Cuthbert, Durfee, Dwight, Eddy, Edwards of North Carolina, Fuller, Garnett, Govan, Hamilton, Hayden, Hayward, Hemphill, Herrick, Houston, F. Mr. TOD then moved to amend the bill by adding to the clause which now reads thus: "On cotton bagging four and a half cents per square yard," the words, "until the 30th day of June next, and six cents per square yard after that time." This amendment was supported by Messrs. TOD, COOK, LETCHER, and WRIGHT, and opposed by Messrs. BRENT, COBB, OWEN, and McDUFFIE.

So the motion of Mr. TOD was rejected.

The House then adjourned to Monday next.

WEDNESDAY, April 12.

The resolution laid on the table by Mr. WHITTLESEY, on Saturday last, was taken up, read, and agreed to by the House.

The two Messages received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, on Saturday, were read, and are as follows:

FIRST.

To the House of Representatives of the United States: I herewith transmit the report of the Secretary of War, with the accompanying documents, containing the information requested by resolution of House of the 10th ultimo, and which communicates the accounts of all the Generals in the Army; likewise of the Inspector General, the Chiefs of the Engineer and Ordnance Corps, and Surgeon General, for the two years preceding the 30th of September last; also, showing the amount of money paid to each, under the different heads of pay, fuel, straw, quarters, transportation, and all other extra and contingent allowances; which report, together with the statements herewith transmitted, furnish all the information required.

JAMES MONROE.

APRIL 9, 1824.

The Message was referred to the committee appointed on the 30th of December last, upon the report of expenditures in the Ordnance Department.

SECOND.

A Message from the President of the United States on the subject of the claim of the State of Virginia to interest on sums advanced by that State for militia services, during the late war; which was referred to the Committee of Claims. [See Senate proceedings of April 12, ante, for this Message.]

Mr. CONNER laid the following resolution on the table, for consideration to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House a detailed account of the manner in which the $9,125 have been disbursed, which was appropriated by the act of the 3d of March, 1819, for purchasing a lot of land, and for constructing pipes for supplying the Executive offices and President's house with water. Also, a detailed account of the manner in which the $10,000 have been expended, which was appropriated by the act of the 30th of April, 1818, for graduating and improving the President's square.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing on the pension roll, all the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army, who entered the service, or enlisted for three years, or during the war, prior to the year 1781, and who served out the time for which they engaged, or were honorably discharged; which was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. MARTINDALE, the Committee on Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of so modifying and amending the "Act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," as to exempt all vessels and boats employed in navigating the canals in the State of New York, from the necessity of being enrolled or licensed, and from the payment of tonnage duties.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to abolish imprisonment for debt," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then passed to the unfinished business of yesterday, which was the consideration of the Tariff bill, when—

Mr. RICH moved to strike out the minimum valuation (of forty cents per yard) on woollens, and to insert, after the words "on all manufactures of wool, or of which wool shall be a component part, a duty of thirty per cent. ad valorem," until June 30th, 1825, and after that time a duty of thirty-three and one-third per cent. ad valorem," the following words: "until June 30th, 1826, and after that time a duty of thirty-seven and a-half per cent. ad valorem."

Mr. McKIM advocated the amendment in a few observations.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: It is not my intention to appeal to theory on this subject. The deep interests of my constituents, whose capital and industry are very equally distributed between agriculture and commerce, (which embrace the pursuits of my life,) and the manufacturers of wool, cotton, cotton gins, muskets, rifles, swords, and pistols, as well for your Army and Navy as for your distinguished officers, which are all in my immediate vicinity, constitute my apology for addressing you; and the declaration of the Chairman of the Committee of Manufactures, that this bill was designed for the encouragement of each of these branches of national industry, in my opinion, makes the duty imperative on me.

The principles which have been advanced by some of the zealous advocates of the bill under consideration, with some of its provisions, which seem to be founded on those principles, in my opinion call loudly on the friends of agriculture, of commerce, and even on the friends of manufactures themselves, to examine its details with a scrutinizing, if not with a jealous eye.

Although the bill itself does not openly and fairly propose, in every instance, a duty which, at first sight, appears to be prohibitory, still, as it is advocated upon that principle by many of its friends, it is fair to infer that such is the object.

A distinguished member, to whom I shall not now allude, for reasons which will be well understood, but whose arguments will not plead privilege, in the Committee of the Whole, has told us, "That the great leading policy of this Government must be changed;" "that a new system must be adopted;" "that we must become a great manufacturing nation;" that the people of these United States must no longer be permitted to pursue the occupations of their own choice, or employ their capital and their industry in those pursuits to which their own good judgment, or their natural advantages, their education, and their skill, are best adapted; but the farmer must leave his plough, and the sailor his ship, and the merchant his counting house, and be immured within the walls of large manufacturing establishments; that your agriculture and your commerce must become tributary to manufactures; that agriculture, the mother, and commerce, the elder sister, must be sacrificed to the ambition of manufactures, the younger sister, the miss in her teens. This is the new, this is the grand system of policy, which you propose to force upon the good people of these United States.

Sir, you will soon find your impotence and your weakness in this attempt. The people are yet your masters, although you may think them your slaves. Before you can effect this great change in the leading policy of the country, you must first make the people slaves. I am well aware, if you could carry your new system of policy into full and complete effect, the people would soon become slaves; the genius and spirit of your Government would be entirely changed; the equal distribution of property, on which alone a free government can long exist, and the independent spirit of our hardy yeomanry, would soon be destroyed; your Government changed into a purse-proud aristocracy, and your population become lords and tenants.

But this you cannot effect. Any attempt to force the people of these States into this silk-worm policy, by the magic power of your tariff bills, will prove abortive. Their habits are too deeply rooted. The great variety and fertility of soil, the immense extent of territory, and the ocean which washes nearly three thousand miles of your coast; the majestic navigable rivers which, like the grand arteries in the human body, flow from the heart of your country to the ocean, speak a language which cannot be misunderstood, and never will be disobeyed; you must, and will, be a great agricultural and commercial nation, in spite of all your legislation.

You may, by your restrictions, embarrass and fetter their enterprise for a short period; you may legislate them into adversity, but it is impossible to legislate a people into prosperity.

The greatest degree of national and individual wealth is obtained by permitting labor, skill, and capital, to find their own employment and investment unshackled, and encourage a free and unrestricted trade. Every attempt of Government to direct or regulate the employment of capital, or enterprise, is mischievous. The only object of a wise Government should be, to remove obstructions to the free use of capital and industry. The politicians of Great Britain have become sensible of the truth of this position, and are receding from the system of arbitrary dictation and restrictions, and shall we now plunge into it? Shall we, at this time, put on the tattered garments of an exploded policy?

The power to regulate commerce was never designed to authorize its destruction, or prescribe its channels. It may be, and often is, necessary to suspend it by embargo, for a time, as the most efficient mode of protection; but the interests of agriculture or manufactures cannot be improved by continued restrictions on commerce.

What will be the effect of imposing heavy duties on the produce and manufactures of other countries, but retaliation, by similar, or perhaps even higher duties on our productions in their ports, which will drive us entirely from their markets, and turn the channel of their trade to other countries, for those supplies which we can furnish in abundance? And, while we are destroying our commerce, in the wretched attempt to foster our manufactures by law, Europe will monoplize the whole trade with the South American States, and we shall find, to our cost, that there is no foreign market for our manufactures, which have been nursed with so much care in this hot-bed system; but we must be compelled to use our own manufactures, and agriculture must pay the increased price, and make up the deficiency in our revenue, while the produce, as well of agriculture as manufactures, will be confined to home consumption. I ask, will this increase your wealth and your independence? Will this furnish a market for your surplus produce? Will this encourage domestic industry?

Commerce has afforded you about $400,000,000 of revenue! Will your manufacturers, without a foreign market, be able to supply the deficit of duty on imports? Can you collect twenty millions of dollars annually from manufactures, even if you could transform all your hardy seamen and farmers into spinners and weavers? Your manufacturing interest generally, even now, is less depressed than your agriculture and commerce, when skilfully and prudently managed. What stronger evidence of this fact can there be, than that manufacturing capital is rapidly increasing? You have already afforded protection to this branch of industry, equal to nearly 40 per cent. on the cost of your fabrics; and if, with this bounty, they cannot compete with foreign manufactures, at home, I think it would puzzle the ingenuity of that gentleman, aided by the whole host of professional gentlemen, to show how our manufactures are to find a fair competition in foreign markets, when you add to the original cost the freight and insurance to a foreign market.

In our country, sir, every branch of lawful industry is entitled to an equal portion of your fostering care, and has a right to demand equal protection from the Government. Your tariff bill, by taxing one interest for the encouragement of another, operates as a bounty, which lays every other interest under contribution for the support of the manufacturer, and is, therefore, unequal and unjust; it taxes the many for the support of a few. As a general principle, the perfect freedom of trade or commerce, which is the interchange of commodities, should never be restricted or burdened, except for the necessary purpose of revenue, in the benefits of which every portion of the community is interested; and by universal consent, every well regulated Government has resorted to it.

The policy of England, which the gentleman has taken as a model for his new American policy, is quoted by the advocates of this bill to prove its utility, and the necessity of adopting this new system of political economy.

Sir, it is much to be regretted that this subject is not better understood. Her wisest statesmen deprecate that policy, to which they have been driven by necessity, in order to meet the enormous expenses incurred in her long protracted continental wars. Her system of bounties, and drawbacks of excise, which some of our knowing ones seem to admire, and to consider as the true philosopher's stone, the magic wand which has produced her great wealth, is nothing but the miserable effect of her otherwise ruinous system of restriction; and the gentleman might have found the table of the British Parliament groaning under the petitions of her suffering subjects, painting in colors equally glowing with his own description of imaginary distress in this happy country, and signed by ten times the number of half-starved victims which have been obtained by hawking petitions about our country for signatures. Her system is a mere opiate to relieve extreme distress—a dose of poisonous or noxious drugs to counteract a raging disease, and the temporary relief, afforded by this violent remedy, has been mistaken by some of our political doctors as evidence of perfect health in the body politic.

I cannot, I will not believe that the zealous admirers of British policy; the warm advocates of this wonderful tariff bill—this patent medicine, which is to cure all diseases, really intended to hazard the operation of this "nostrum" as a mere experiment upon the healthy, youthful, and vigorous Constitution of our infant country, merely to test its effects; that they mean to produce disease merely to show their skill in curing the patient. No, sir; gentlemen, in my humble opinion, have been deceived by the visionary dreams of pamphleteers and political quacks, who have inundated this country with their "specifics" and "nostrums;" who have conjured up imaginary scenes of distress, borrowed, perhaps, from novels, or the effusions of a fervid imagination in painting scenes of distress in other countries to which we are total strangers; or, perhaps, merely for the mercenary purpose of finding a catch-penny market for their books, by the relation of horrid tales, made up to frighten old women or credulous children:—like the story of the "Jersey dancers, who were represented as having danced their feet off to the fiddle of the Arch Deceiver, and were left dancing on the stumps of their legs after the feet were worn off."

I ask any member of this Committee if he has seen any such picture of extreme distress in this country? A gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Brown,) on the subject of iron, indeed, told us, he had seen a sheriff hovering about his iron works, and probably, the iron was hot; but I did not understand him to say that any of the owners or workmen were starving for want of bread; or that there was any insurrection or rebellion against the laws; or that the bloody scenes of Manchester were exhibited in the State founded by the peaceful Penn.

That the golden days of our prosperity have continued unclouded to the present time, no one will claim. The whole civilized world has received a shock by the sudden transition from a state of universal war to universal peace. The best remedy is repose; universal languor and lassitude is the natural effect which is uniformly produced by violent exercise, and unusual excitement in the human body, and rest and quiet repose are indispensable to restore the system. Apply the same principle to the body politic, and its effects will be found equally salutary.

Every interest in our country is gradually recovering from the shock which has affected every class of our citizens; and, if the officious interference of misguided legislation does not prevent it, our agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, will soon find their proper place on a peace establishment. Your tariff of 1816 was intended to afford relief to your manufactures. It did, like the British policy, afford a temporary relief; but its effects are still visible on our commerce, and sensibly affects and injures our agriculture; and, at this moment, and for more than three years past, has depressed our manufactures by restrictions imposed on our commerce. For, let me assure gentlemen, that manufactures can no more exist and flourish without commerce, than animal life can be sustained without air.

Agriculture is the first and noblest employment of man. On this we depend for subsistence. It is the mother of commerce, and all the useful arts. With the increase of population, commerce, or an interchange of commodities of necessity, springs into being, because the variety of soil and climate produces a variety of the fruits of the earth adapted to our conveniences and our wants, and manufactures of different kinds spontaneously grow up to meet the necessary demands of both agriculture and commerce. The mere exchange of commodities with our neighbors—the passing of an article from hand to hand, requires but little aid from manufactures; but the labor of many artists is required to build the ship to carry on commerce with foreign nations; and I believe I may safely say, that ship building, at this moment, employs more native American citizens than all the manufactures of the country.

From this view of the subject, it must be clear, that any attempt to build up manufactures on any other foundation than agriculture and commerce, or upon the ruins of either of these great interests, would be as absurd and preposterous as to attempt to build a house on a soap bubble. What has supported the manufactures of Great Britain—what the manufactures of India, but their commerce with the whole civilized world? The amount of supplies always has been, and always will be, regulated by the demand. Commerce is the great artery through which the blood flows to the extremities, which returns with supplies through the veins again to the heart, and gives life and energy to the whole system. It is truly the vis viva of the system.

The gentleman has told us there are two classes of politicians in this country—the one devoted to foreign policy, who would lay duties on imports only for the purpose of revenue, and has attempted to prove (with what success we shall probably see hereafter) that this policy actually encourages the industry and manufactures of foreign countries to the injury of our own. Sir, it would have been very gratifying to the Committee, I presume, if the gentleman had told us what country had adopted this policy, except our own, previous to the tariff of 1816. The other class, to which he professes to belong, and which he is pleased to style the American policy, would adopt the system of restrictions and prohibitions which Bonaparte attempted to enforce against Great Britain, as the last desperate effort to distress his inveterate enemy, and which he then called the Continental Policy of Europe—a system of entire exclusion and prohibition of British manufactures on the Continent of Europe, while, at the very same time, the boasted "Army of England," as he then styled it, was clad in British manufactures. Spain, poor degraded Spain, has tried this same system of restrictions and prohibitions, until she has sunk from the lofty station which she once held in the scale of nations to her present condition, but a small remove from colonial vassalage. England, in time of war, has resorted to it, for the purpose of extorting from every class a heavy contribution. And now, sir, we are told this is the new discovered, true American policy—lay prohibitory duties on imports from foreign countries; destroy your commerce, which has furnished your whole revenue; prevent the export of any of your produce by prohibiting the import of any thing in return; prohibit any interchange of commodities with foreign nations: and all this to find a market for our surplus produce, and for our domestic manufactures!

The Tariff Bill.

The gentleman highly extols the British policy, (which he will claim as American,) because the enormous amount of taxes paid in England furnishes strong evidence of her prosperity and ability to pay! I strongly suspect the American people are not very ambitious of showing evidence of their prosperity in the same way, by the amount of taxes they can pay. Besides, sir, it will require a long course of instruction, and strong argument, to convince us that the bloody scenes at Manchester among the starving manufacturers, or the famine and distress in Ireland, furnish the best evidences of prosperity and happiness, or induce our people to adopt their policy, or excite a wish to exchange conditions.

But, sir, in the same speech in which the gentleman has recommended the adoption of this system of encouraging manufactures by restrictions on commerce, he has, if I understood him correctly, declared himself "the firm friend of a free commerce, upon the principles of perfect reciprocity." The propositions made by him, in committee, for the benefit of the whiskey trade, of an increased duty on molasses, of 100 per cent. which must entirely destroy the trade with the West Indies, or impose a heavy tax on the laboring poor, I do not feel myself bound to reconcile with his argument.

The gentleman has expressed his extreme mortification, on looking at a book lately published in England, in which the writer states, "that Great Britain enjoys a more profitable trade with the United States, since their independence, than when they were colonies." Sir, this would not be the first time in which particular and detached parts of a work have been quoted, in support of particular tenets, or pre-conceived opinions, if such were the case here; which, however, I will not believe was designed in this instance. But, sir, if the gentleman had read the whole work, in my opinion, he would have found stronger grounds for exultation and national pride, than for "mortification." The writer has endeavored to reconcile the British nation to the loss of the colonies, by proving that she has enjoyed a better trade with us, as an independent nation, than she ever did, or ever could have enjoyed, if these United States had remained British colonies. He contrasts our present condition with that of the colonies; paints, in glowing colors, our prosperity; and recommends the entire abandonment of the colonial policy, and that Canada should become also independent, because she now costs the mother country more than she is worth.

The tariff of 1816, avowedly supported on the same principle, of giving a spring to domestic industry, and encouraging our infant manufactures, as the present tariff bill, has been in full operation for seven years; and if the picture of distress so ably drawn by the gentleman, be a fair representation, we should suppose that gentlemen would be more disposed to abandon it, than to increase the evils, by extending this system of American policy. One petition, from Delaware, contains much useful instruction on this subject: "The duties on low priced cottons, amounting nearly to prohibition, have created such competition in the manufacture of this article, it cannot be manufactured to a profit;" and they pray Congress to increase the duty on the finer cottons for the purpose of turning some part of the capital now employed in coarse cottons, to the manufacture of fine cottons, or to some other employment. The only answer I can give this, is, if this has been the effect "in the green tree, what will be done in the dry?" While you still have some commerce remaining, and these coarse cottons find their way to South America, what will be the condition of these, and all other manufactures, when your commerce is destroyed?

Perhaps, sir, this should be called the American policy. It is the policy which has been adopted in our country, in relation to banks, which by this time must be tolerably well understood in some parts of our country. You now propose to adopt the same policy in relation to manufactures. Sir, in my opinion, call it by what name you will, it is a ruinous policy.

The gentleman tells us the present system operates unequally; some portions of the country suffer greater distress than others. And how does he propose to remedy this evil? By making the others suffer as much! Are we to engage in the unprofitable contest which can do the other most harm? Would it not be better to adopt a liberal system of policy, instead of further restrictions, and leave industry, enterprise, and capital, free from any unnecessary restraint? Each portion of the country would then prosper in proportion to their natural advantages, and their industry and economy.

The gentleman has endeavored to prove that our agriculture and commerce are languishing, by a paper calculation, showing that our exports have not increased in proportion to our population. Such a calculation is as deceptive as the estimates of the "balance of trade against us;" because we sold our produce in a foreign market, for more than it cost at home, which was much relied on by the friends of a former tariff, but seems now to be abandoned. If the labor of one man is capable of producing sustenance for one hundred, does it follow, that if our population has increased tenfold, that the foreign demand must increase in the same ratio?

But, sir, we have been told that our commerce is already destroyed, and therefore this bill cannot injure it. But does your receipts from imports prove this? From whence do you derive twenty millions of dollars revenue? It is true, your agriculture and your commerce languish, even more than your manufactures; every interest is in some degree depressed; and what is the cause? It is necessary to ascertain the true cause to enable you to apply the proper remedies. Several causes have combined to produce this result. The enjoyment of the whole carrying trade for the belligerents of Europe, during the long Continental war, from the commencement of the French revolution until the jealousy of Great Britain towards our rising commerce, and the inveterate hostility of France against England, produced the famous Orders in Council and French decrees, which almost swept our commerce from the ocean, and which produced on our part the adoption of the restrictive system of embargo and non-intercourse, and finally of war with Great Britain, had induced our citizens to engage deeply in commerce. From the year 1790 to 1805, this country enjoyed uninterrupted prosperity; perhaps no nation on earth ever increased so rapidly in wealth; our commerce literally covered the ocean, and our flag waved over every sea. Our surplus agricultural products found a ready market, and industry received a rich reward; we feasted and fattened on the distresses of others.

In this situation the war of 1812 found us. The immense amount of capital which had been employed in commerce readily found a profitable investment in manufactures, and during the short period of war received a profit fully equal to its previous investment—the enormous price of our own manufactures lured the cupidity of avarice to vest a large amount of capital in large manufacturing establishments. The sudden and unexpected peace of 1815 found many of these establishments just commencing; extensive and very expensive buildings had been erected; and the cost of machinery in many instances had absorbed the whole capital, and the speculator depended on the promised profits, in a very short period, to reimburse the expense and convert this temporary loan into active, solid capital; and in the meantime the farmer found a ready market for his produce. But the peace blasted the fond hopes of the speculator, and destroyed the home market for the produce of the agriculturist.

Under these circumstances, strong appeals were made to Congress for relief; and the tariff of 1816 was the remedy prescribed by the wisdom of Congress; it had its effect in affording a temporary relief; but here, sir, in my humble opinion, commenced the error in our system. I would ask the candid attention of every sound politician to this point: If, at the time of adopting the tariff of 1816, the internal duties had been continued for one year, and the tariff limited to two years, whether many of the present evils would not have been avoided? Your manufactures had been nursed in a hot-bed; they had sprung into existence as if by magic; they were tender plants, and should have been exposed carefully to the open air. But your tariff induced further investments, which the fate of this country and the state of the world would not warrant; but they were built on your tariff alone, and you still hold out further inducements to manufacturing capital, by the continual promise of further legislative aid, while your foreign commerce, and of course your agricultural interests, is languishing under your restrictive system; and with your manufacturing interest, if you pursue this American policy, will constantly become more and more embarrassed, as you increase manufactures, while at the same time you are gradually destroying their market by your restrictions on trade.

Your export trade was much diminished by your tariff; the surplus produce of your agriculture perished on your hands, or sold at one-fourth of its former value; individuals were in debt; your country was in debt; and the general distress increased rather than diminished, under your restrictive system. In this state of adversity, you flew to remedies poorly calculated to afford relief; you incorporated banks, with the delusive hope of increasing your wealth by the issue of a flood of paper money, without reflecting that the mere increase of a circulating medium, instead of increasing your stock of wealth, only increased your distress, by raising the price of your produce in your own market so high as to prevent a fair competition with others in a foreign market; and while you have been engaged in devising ways and means to restore prosperity, your foreign customers have been driven to other sources for the supply of the articles, which have been perishing on our hands, and which would have found a ready market, but for the system of policy to which you have resorted in vain for relief.

During the three years succeeding the treaty of peace, your agriculture and your commerce were at the lowest state of depression, while your manufactures were supported by a contribution levied on these great interests for their support. During the last four years, manufacturers have felt the evils of the system under which agriculture and commerce had suffered for three years, under the accumulated pressure of hard times and the burdens imposed on them to sustain the manufacturing interest, but still more by the influx of foreign goods forced through your auctions. Yes, sir, by the importation of fabrics of a very inferior quality—woollen goods manufactured like sheathing paper, neither spun nor wove, but merely pasted together, the remnants of old garments, picked up and manufactured with as little expense as paper, and through the medium of your auction brought into competition with your manufactures, subject to no charges, except, perhaps, a small ad valorem duty and one fourth of one per cent. commission to the auctioneer. In this way the foreign manufacturer has been enabled to compete with your American manufactures, and almost entirely destroy the manufactures of coarse woollen goods. This evil may easily be remedied by your auction bill now on your table, and by the minimum in the bill now under consideration, without any essential injury to either your agriculture or your commerce.

But, sir, another cause of embarrassment begins to be felt, and is complained of in a petition from the cotton manufacturers in Delaware. Competition in our own country, in the article of coarse cottons, which has distressed the manufacturers; and yet you propose to give the same encouragement to fine cottons and other manufactures, which have produced this evil, and which experience has proved injurious to coarse cottons, under your prohibitory duties. Sir, the only relief which can be afforded in this case, is in a foreign market. But you seem determined to prevent the export to a foreign market, by laying such duties on imports of articles which do not affect your own manufactures, as will inevitably prevent exports; for trade can never exist but in an interchange of commodities. Will you still pursue this ignis fatuus while your experience shows you its baneful effects?

The gentleman has called upon us to look at the petitions from every section of the country, and view the picture of general distress drawn up by the suffering citizens. Sir, I have examined these petitions, and have sought in vain for the picture of extreme distress which his warm imagination has painted. They state coolly and dispassionately, generally, that the great interests of the country are depressed; that industry does not receive the same liberal rewards as in former times; the manufacturers of the various articles of wool, cotton, iron, hemp, glass, &c., have stated the burdens and the pressure upon the particular articles, and appeal to the wisdom of Congress to provide some relief if practicable. But, sir, if gentlemen will examine these petitions, and the sources from which they come, they will find that those sections of our country which have most manufacturing capital make the least complaint. Take, for instance, the six Eastern States, which, by the return of the amount of capital invested, or employed in manufactures in the several States, embraces about one-half of the whole amount employed in the whole country, while the population of these States comprises about one-sixth part of the whole population: from this whole section you do not find one-half as many petitions as from the State of New Jersey, or one-fourth as many as from Pennsylvania. Indeed, you find about as many remonstrating against your tariff bill, as of those who have appealed to your wisdom for relief, and very probably some of the same persons. After seeing the bill—for it does not appear probable that these petitioners ever expected such a remedy from the wisdom of Congress—where do you find a memorial praying Congress to impose additional duty on spirits and molasses? What petition can be found among the whole number, which asks you to change the great "leading policy," by compelling the people to change their occupations? What petition calls on Congress to sacrifice either agriculture or commerce for the support of manufactures? Where is the petition from the farmers, which asks you to impose additional duty on wheat? On hemp? On flax? Or even on wool? I believe there is one which asks for a duty on potatoes. But, sir, I understand the people of that State (Maine) are not much in favor of your tariff, nor are their Representatives among the strong supporters of this bill.

I ask the attention of the House to the bill itself. Let us examine its provisions, and see whether it is calculated to produce the effects contemplated by its advocates. It proposes a gradual increase of duty on manufactures of wool; but, in the next place, it proposes a higher rate of duty on the raw material—on the wool itself. This would operate as a bounty on the foreign manufacture, but for the minimum value of low-priced cloths; in fact, it will operate against the manufacture of fine cloth. But this duty on wool is for the benefit of agriculture and the consumer. I will not take up the time of the House in enumerating the many articles specified in the bill.

The next article I shall notice is lead. On this raw material you impose a tax of two cents per pound, for the benefit of the lead mines; and then on red and white lead manufactured from this raw material, four cents per pound, for the benefit of the manufacturer.

On hemp and flax, and on iron, you impose a duty in favor of agriculture; and on the manufacture of these articles a high duty, to protect the manufacturers. But here you seem to have forgotten the consumer—the ship, which is compelled to bear the burden of these double taxes, without any possible relief.

On mill cranks and mill irons, four cents per pound! I would ask whether this tax is for the benefit of the farmer, or the miller, or the man who eats the bread?

On almost every tool, by name, used by the mechanics, and on every implement used by the farmer—ploughs, hoes, scythes, spades, &c.—you impose heavy duties. Are these for the encouragement of agriculture or the mechanic arts? You propose even to tax heavily the cooking utensils used by the poor—the frying pans—but you have, in your great wisdom, struck out gridirons and griddles; whether because these are more generally in use among the rich, we have not been told.

On tallow, four cents per pound! This is to make fat beef and a good market for all the whale oil which can ever be collected. But, as it bears rather heavily on the tallow chandler and soap boiler, you allow a drawback on soap for his relief.

On indigo, alum, vitriol, copperas, and other articles used in manufacture, you propose a tax. We are bound to believe these are designed for the protection and encouragement of these manufactures.

In Committee, you laid on molasses 100 per cent. on the present rate of duty. Thus, you proposed a heavy tax on an important article of subsistence among the poor, either for the benefit of that small part of our country where molasses is produced, or to encourage the use of whiskey. But the House has rejected it. You proposed to prevent the export of grain, and convert it into whiskey! You prefer whiskey, which pays no duty, to rum, on which a heavy duty is levied—even when a small portion of molasses is distilled. Strange as it may appear, there is no branch of industry so well protected, or so much encouraged by your tariff, as the manufacture of whiskey—perhaps for the benefit of the morals of the people!—for you have, by increasing the duty on imported spirits, laid a large bounty on whiskey, at the hazard of at least one-half of the most profitable commerce of the country—I mean the trade with France, Holland, and the West Indies—which afford a better market for the surplus produce of agriculture, than all the rest of the world.

Sir, in my opinion, your bill, like the Indian's description of punch, is made up of contradictions. The principles contained in it are at war with each other. You tax the implements of husbandry, and all the mechanic arts, to promote industry! You tax necessities, instead of luxuries! You tax the raw material and the dyestuffs of your manufactures! You tax one man to support another, and then you tax the other to support him! You tax industry! You tax yourselves to support yourselves! You seem determined to bear your own burdens, and will not consent that others, who are willing, should assist you! In this way, you expect to grow rich and become independent!

But, Mr. Speaker, there is one article in this bill, to which my attention has been called, particularly, by a letter lately received, and to which I beg leave to call the attention of the House. I will not require the chairman of the committee, who has compared himself "to the man in the almanac—stuck full of sticks"—to answer this question; for, I do really think, he has had a hard time of it. But I will ask the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) who, some time since, in committee, declared: "If this bill would not encourage household manufactures, and find employment for our wives and daughters, he would not give his vote in its favor." I ask him to show the House what encouragement is provided, in this bill, for a very considerable domestic household manufacture, and which, in my opinion, will not be much encouraged by building up large manufacturing establishments, and the employment of foreigners and labor-saving machinery. I ask the indulgence of the House while I read a part of this letter, which is from a gentleman of high respectability in the State which gave birth to the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from New York, to seven Senators and about twenty members of the present Congress. Notwithstanding her interests have been so much neglected in the present bill, perhaps on account of the small space she occupies on the map of the United States; and, notwithstanding she lays before you an incorporated manufacturing capital of $7,440,000, about one-ninth part of the amount in the whole Union, while her population comprises but one-twenty-sixth part; and her territory bears a still less proportion.

Mr. F. here read from the letter—

"That previous to the tariff of 1816, 100,000 yards of tow cloth were annually manufactured, in their families, by the industrious females in the vicinity, for market, at from twenty to twenty-five cents per yard. That this cloth was made by the industrious poor. That, in the same extent of country, the last year, not fifteen thousand yards were made; that these females are now out of employ; that the writer has had applications, within the last two years, for employ, by these females, in spinning flax, or any other employment, for from fifty to eighty cents per week. This manufacture gave employ to many industrious females, who, by their own labor, were well fed and clothed, and contributed much to support their families."

What, sir, let me ask, does this bill propose, in relation to this subject? A duty of three cents per pound on flax, to encourage the raising of the article! to aid the agriculturist! while the use of the article is almost entirely superseded by the manufacture of cotton. Sir, your three cent duty on the importation of flax, is very much like prohibiting the importation of coal to Newcastle, and it is much to be feared that the country will find its fond hopes and expectations of relief from your tariff as much disappointed as was the philosopher who attempted to extract sunbeams from cucumbers.

Mr. Speaker, these are my views of the proposed tariff, and of the system of policy which is proposed for our adoption. I stated, on a former occasion, that our present tariff needed revision; my opinion is not changed, that such a judicious revision might be made as to afford suitable aid to manufactures without materially injuring any other interest.

You have built up some manufacturing establishments by your laws; they call on you for aid and for protection. It is your duty to prevent any unfair or unequal competition of foreign manufactures with our domestic manufactures in our own market. This may be effectually done by laying a heavy duty on sales at auction of foreign manufactures, and by the present minimum in the bill. Some of our present manufacturing establishments require a further temporary encouragement to put them in successful operation. This may be effected by a moderate increase of duty on the articles which directly compete with them in our own market, and which are imported from those countries with which our trade has been least profitable; but their ultimate success must depend on their own industry and economy, and the facilities which may be afforded for a foreign market by means of a free and active commerce, to the prosperity of which they will essentially contribute, with suitable encouragement.

I cannot believe that sound policy would dictate such a degree of encouragement to manufactures in this country, as to invite capital from other pursuits, at the present time. Our country is in its infancy; our territory too extensive; our population not sufficiently dense; nor the raw materials of the various manufactures sufficiently plenty; nor labor sufficiently cheap; nor are the habits of our people, nor the genius of our Government, calculated for a large and extensive manufacturing people.

But, sir, my firm belief is that by reducing the present rate of duties on the importation of foreign articles, which do not, and will not, compete with our own manufactures, so as sensibly to affect any of our existing establishments, a foreign market might now be found for all our surplus produce, and more life and vigor restored to our industry, than by all the legislative aid which we can afford. Reduce the duty on Madeira wine, on ardent spirits, on sugar and coffee, the products of those countries in which your agriculture finds the best market, so as not to prevent their importation from the certainty of loss to the importer, and you will find every cent which you take from the imported article added with interest and a handsome profit to the produce of your farms, and the export of your surplus produce. Your commerce will flourish, your agriculture revive, your manufactures receive a powerful stimulus, your revenue increase, and the "golden days of commercial prosperity" will soon be restored; not, indeed, to the full extent which you enjoyed when you monopolized the trade of the whole civilized world. Commerce is a common inheritance of all nations, and in times of general peace, we must be contented with our full share, which the industry and enterprise of our citizens will always command, unless they are prevented, by the restrictions of our own laws. Gentlemen mistake, if they think there is no foreign market for our produce. I believe, at this time, the price of our produce in the West Indies is nearly the same as in the days of our greatest prosperity; but they cannot purchase of us, unless we can receive their produce in return, and this we cannot do without incurring an immense loss, in consequence of our heavy duties on imports; and thus, the only market for our agricultural products is transferred to others, who understand their interests better. You give to Canada all the West India trade, and the rum, on which you charge a duty of forty-six cents a gallon, when imported by your own citizens, is smuggled into the United States, and you not only lose the trade, but you lose the duty; you encourage smuggling, and you do not much improve the whiskey manufacture, for the rum will compete with it. A gentleman from Pennsylvania stated that rum in Quebec, I think, costs only about five cents more than your present duty.

Sir, I must be allowed to say, that your tariff needs a judicious revision, and that such a revision might be made; but, I cannot say the present bill provides such a judicious revision.

When Mr. Foot had concluded—

Mr. BARBOUR suggested to the mover of this amendment to modify his proposition, by moving first to strike out the minimum, and then to increase the ad valorem duty, in order that those who were opposed to the minimum, might have an opportunity of voting so as to express that opinion without, at the same time, voting to raise the duty.

Mr. RICH declined thus to modify his amendment.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. KREMER, FOOT, and McDUFFIE. Mr. BARBOUR then declared that, as the gentlemen from Vermont had refused the modification requested, he should vote against the amendment to strike out and insert, and if the question on that amendment should be decided in the negative, a motion would then be in order simply to strike out the minimum.

After some observations by Mr. MERCER, the question was then taken on Mr. RICH's motion, by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 103, nays 97, as follows.

amend the said bill, by striking out the following paragraph of the first section thereof, viz:

"First. On all manufacturers of wool, or of which wool shall be a component part, a duty of thirty per centum ad valorem, until the 30th day of June, 1825; and after that time, a duty of thirty-three and one-third per centum ad valorem, until the 30th day of June, 1826; and after that time, a duty of thirty-seven and a half per centum ad valorem."

Mr. BARBOUR explained.

And, on the question to agree to this amendment, it was determined in the negative—yeas 75, nays 124, as follows:

Mr. CONNER moved further to amend the said bill, by striking therefrom the following item: "On iron in bars or bolts, not manufactured in whole, or in part, by rolling, ninety cents per hundred and twelve pounds weight."

And, on the question to agree to this amendment, it was decided in the negative—yeas 81, nays 114, as follows:

In the second paragraph of the first section of the said bill, is the following proviso:

"Provided, That all cotton cloths, whatsoever, or cloths of which cotton shall be a component material, excepting nankeens imported directly from China, the original cost of which at the place whence imported, with the addition of twenty per centum if imported from the Cape of Good Hope, or any place beyond it; and of ten per centum if imported from any other place, shall be less than thirty-five cents per square yard, shall, with such addition, be taken and deemed to have cost thirty-five cents per square yard, and shall be charged with duty accordingly."

Mr. ISACKS moved to amend this proviso, by striking out the words "thirty-five," and inserting "twenty-five."

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD then moved further to amend the said bill, by erasing therefrom the following clause:

"Third.—On wool, unmanufactured, a duty of 20 per centum ad valorem, until the 1st day of June, 1825; afterwards, a duty of 25 per centum ad valorem, until the 1st of June, 1826; afterwards, a duty of 30 per centum, until 1st of June, 1827; afterwards, a duty of 35 per centum ad valorem, until the 1st of June, 1828; afterwards, a duty of 40 per centum ad valorem, until the 1st June, 1829; afterwards, a duty of 45 per centum ad valorem, until 1st June, 1830; and, after that time, a duty of 50 per centum ad valorem: Provided, That all wool, the actual value of which, at the place whence imported, shall not exceed ten cents per pound, shall be charged with a duty of fifteen per centum ad valorem, and no more."

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, moved to insert, after the 180th line, the following: "On brown sugar two cents per pound, and on white or clayed sugar three cents per pound."

A debate took place, in which Messrs. ALLEN, BRENT, ROSS, WICKLIFFE, COOK, LIVINGSTON, McLANE of Delaware, and RANDOLPH, took part.

Mr. RANDOLPH said that if the House would lend him its attention for five minutes, he thought he could demonstrate that the argument of the gentleman from Delaware, in favor of the increased duty on brown sugar, was one of the most suicidal arguments that ever reared its spectral front in a deliberative assembly.

The gentleman objects to reducing the duty on sugar, because it will diminish the revenue, which he says we cannot dispense with—and yet he wishes to continue it as a bounty of three dollars per one hundred pounds, (not the long hundred of 112 lbs.) until the sugar planting and sugar manufacture should be extended, so as to supply the whole demand of our consumption. Then, what becomes of the revenue from sugar that we cannot dispense with? This is what I call a suicidal argument—it destroys itself.

But, we must not reduce the duty to what it stood at, only eight years ago, because it will injure the sale of the public lands. Yes, sir, the public lands! for which, sold or unsold, we never get paid. The gentleman would persuade us that we are under obligation to such purchasers as bought the sugar lands under the existing duty—and how many sugar estates have been established on lands bought of the public—and since the year 1816, too? Sir, this argument of obligation to tax ourselves, for the profit of these overgrown sugar planters, will not hold water. It will not even hold cotton.—[Mr. TON's reiterated motions to enhance the tax on cotton bagging, had just succeeded by the Speaker's casting vote.] We are not to reduce the duty on sugar for fear of injuring the sale of the public lands, for which, although we may obtain nominal payment, we shall never receive one penny.

[Mr. McLANE, at the commencement of his reply, appearing to be much irritated, Mr. RANDOLPH rose and assured him that he intended not the slightest personal disrespect or offence—but Mr. McLANE went on to say that the gentleman from Virginia had displayed a good head—but he would not accept that gentleman's head, to be obliged to have his heart along with it.]

Mr. RANDOLPH replied.

It costs me nothing, sir, to say that I very much regret that the zeal which I have not only felt but cherished, on the subject of laying taxes in a manner which, in my judgment, is inconsistent, not merely with the spirit, but the very letter of the Constitution—should have given to my remarks, on this subject, a pungency which has rendered them disagreeable, and even offensive to the gentleman from Delaware. For that gentleman I have never expressed any other sentiment but respect—I have never uttered, or entertained, an unkind feeling towards that gentleman, either in this House or elsewhere—nor do I now feel any such sentiment towards him—I never pressed my regard upon him—I press it upon no man. He appears to have considered my remarks as having a personal application to himself. I certainly did not intend to give them that direction, and I think that my prompt disclaimer of any such intention ought to have disarmed his resentment, however justly it may have been excited. He has been pleased, sir, to say something which, no doubt, he thinks very severe, about my head and my heart.

How easy, sir, would it be for me to reverse the gentleman's proposition, and to retort upon him, that I would not, in return, take that gentleman's heart, however good it may be, if obliged to take such a head into the bargain.

But, sir, I do not think this—I never thought it—and, therefore, I cannot be so ungenerous as to say it: for, Mr. Speaker, who made me a searcher of hearts?—of the heart of a fellow man, a fellow sinner? Sir, this is an awful subject! better suited to Friday or Sunday next, (Good Friday and Easter Sunday,) two of the most solemn days in the Christian calendar—when I hope we shall all consider it, and lay it to heart as we ought to do.

But, sir, I must still maintain that the argument of the gentleman is suicidal—he has fairly worked the equation, and one half of his argument is a complete and conclusive answer to the other. And, sir, if I should ever be so unfortunate as, through inadvertence, or the heat of debate, to fall into such an error, I should, so far from being offended, feel myself under obligation to any gentleman who would expose its fallacy, even by ridicule—as fair a weapon as any in the whole Parliamentary armory. I shall not go so far as to maintain, with my Lord Shaftesbury, that it is the unerring test of truth, whatever it may be of temper—but if it be proscribed as a weapon as unfair as it is confessedly powerful, what shall we say (I put it, sir, to you, and to the House) to the poisoned arrow?—to the tomahawk and the scalping knife? Could the most unsparing use of ridicule justify a resort to these weapons? Was this a reason that the gentleman should sit in judgment on my heart?—yes, sir, my heart—which the gentleman, (whatever he may say,) in his heart, believes to be a frank heart, as I trust it is a brave heart. Sir, I dismiss the gentleman to his self-complacency—let him go—yes, sir, let him go—and thank his God that he is not as this Publican.

A motion to adjourn was now made, and decided in the negative—ayes 89, noes 99.

And then the question on Mr. ALLEN's motion was taken by yeas and nays, and decided as follows: Yeas 89, nays 102.

So, the motion was rejected.

Mr. LONG then moved to amend the bill, by reducing the duty on bolting cloths, from fifteen per cent. ad valorem to ten per cent. ad valorem. And the question thereon being stated, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 13.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred bills from the Senate, of the following titles, viz:

1st. An act to provide for the security of public money in the hands of clerks of courts, attorneys, and marshals, and their deputies;

2d. An act to abolish imprisonment for debt;

3d. An act supplementary to the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt';"

4th. An act to change the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States in the State of Ohio, and one of the terms of the circuit court in Kentucky;

5th. An act to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Benjamin Lincoln, and others; reported the said bills, severally, without amendment. When it was Ordered, That the first and second of the said bills be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow; that the third and fourth of the said bills be read a third time to-morrow; and that the fifth be laid on the table.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to enable the holders of French, British, and Spanish titles to lands within that part of the State of Louisiana, situated to the east of the river Mississippi, and Island of New Orleans, which have not been recognised as valid by the Government of the United States, to institute proceedings to try the validity thereof," reported the same with amendments; and the bill was committed to the Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill of this House, granting pre-emption rights to certain settlers in the district of Jackson Courthouse.

The Committee of Claims to which was referred, yesterday, a message from the President of the United States, relating to a claim of the State of Virginia, for interest on money advanced for militia service, during the war with Great Britain, were discharged from the further consideration thereof, and it was laid on the table.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Expenditures on the Public Buildings, made a report in relation to the application and expenditure of moneys appropriated for the public buildings; which was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting three statements in relation to the amount and disposition of the two and three per cent. funds, arising from the sale of public lands; prepared in obedience to a resolution of this House; which communication was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COCKE laid the following resolution on the table, for consideration to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House what amount of money has been refunded to the Government by the several prize agents, since the 1st day of March, 1823, designating the amount paid by each agent, and when paid; what legal proceedings have been instituted against each delinquent agent, when instituted, and the present state of said proceedings; and whether the provisions of the joint resolution of Congress, approved March 3, 1823, have been enforced in all cases.

On motion of Mr. JOHN S. BARBOUR, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making further provision, by law, for the relief of Nimrod Farrow and Richard Harris, and their securities.

The resolution yesterday laid on the table by Mr. CONNER, calling for information of the expenditure of certain appropriations for improving the President's Square, &c., was taken up, and agreed to.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then passed to the unfinished business of yesterday, which was the motion of Mr. LONG, to reduce the duty on bolting cloths from fifteen to ten per cent. ad valorem. The question being taken, the proposed amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, then moved the previous question on the bill. (which precludes all further amendment as well as debate.) The call was not sustained by the requisite number of members.

Mr. TON proposed, as an amendment, to add to the clause laying a duty on cotton bagging, the following words: "until the 30th day of June, 1825, and, afterwards, a duty of five and a half cents per square yard," the object being to lay on this article a duty of four and a half cents per yard until the 30th June, 1825, and, after that date, of five and a half cents per square yard.

Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, then moved the indefinite postponement of the bill.

At the request of Mr. LETCHER, of Kentucky, a call of the House was ordered—ayes 127.

The call having been ordered, and the Clerk proceeding to call the absentees, the further proceedings in the call were suspended.

The question recurring on indefinite postponement,

Mr. GOVAN, of South Carolina said, that, after the very able view which had been taken by the opponents of this measure, who had preceded him in the discussion, he should not attempt a detailed exposition of the grounds which would influence his vote; because, in so doing, said he, I am well convinced I shall be compelled to use many of the arguments of my friends, which have been expressed in a much more forcible manner than I should be capable of expressing them. I hope, sir, the magnitude of the subject, the great interest which our country must feel in the discussion, is a sufficient excuse for me to trespass, but a few moments, on the patience of the House. The tendency of the measure now before us, and which, I hope to God, will not be adopted by the Committee, I view as one of the most dangerous schemes to the interest of this happy and prosperous nation that ever could have been conjured up by the imagination of man. But, sir, the tendency of it will be lamentable in the extreme to the great interest of that section of country from which I come.

I look upon this question, sir, as pregnant with the most dangerous consequences of any that has been agitated on this floor since the establishment of our Constitution. I regret, sir, to see any measure introduced here, which is, in any way, calculated to excite sectional feeling and create dangerous jealousies. I shall regret much to see one section of the Union arrayed against the other, but such, I fear, will be the effect of the bill now before the Committee. Gentlemen are certainly not aware that they are about to introduce into our country a system which strikes at the very root of civil society, and is calculated to change the character and feelings of our population. No one will deny but that the character of a population depends, in a great measure, on the pursuits and occupations of civilized man. The effects of this measure will be to introduce into our country a system which is calculated to change this nation from an agricultural to a manufacturing people. Instead of breathing that pure and wholesome atmosphere which nature intended us to enjoy, in the delightful cultivation of our fields, and in pursuit of those avocations which are the delight and boast of every American, we are to shut our population up in a miserable factory, as it were in prison, entailing upon this nation one of the most pernicious evils that could be inflicted on human society. Can there be any comparison, sir, of a population reared in the confined apartments of a factory, where they are doomed to waste their free spirits on looms and shuttles, to that which is reared in the delightful pursuits of agriculture, which gives strength to the arm, elevation to the soul, and independence to the profession? The effect of the bill now before us will, I fear, be quite different from that which is anticipated by the advocates of it. It will introduce among this sober, happy, and industrious people, a spirit of division, disunion, and discontent, will diminish the patriotism of our citizens, and corrupt the morals of our people. No one who is acquainted with the progress of manufactures will deny but that the labor in them is calculated to diminish the strength and resources of a nation. Small children are generally employed in these factories, entirely under the control and influence of their parents, who are driven frequently by necessity and the prospect of gain, without taking into consideration the serious evils they are about to inflict on their families. The employment of persons of such a tender age, in these continued and sedentary habits, prevents population from attaining that size which they would were they employed in agricultural pursuits. Many melancholy instances may be cited of the dreadful effects of the influence of this system in Europe, but more particularly in England. We are told by Mr. Peel, one of the most distinguished men of the House of Commons, that the effects of this system on the population of one of the most healthy and flourishing towns in England, has been truly lamentable. He says, that the town of Manchester, which is now one of the most manufacturing towns in England, which used to furnish numerous and healthy recruits for the Army, by the dreadful effects of this system, was rendered wholly unproductive in that respect. In the manufactures of a new and unsettled country, it appears to me, above all others, to be the most uncertain place to invest capital, if the capitalist anticipates an immense profit in the commencement of his business. It requires great skill, and persevering industry, before they can give profit. The habits of the people must undergo a complete change before they can attain any degree of perfection. It is impossible, in the very nature of things, to suppose they can be speedily successful in a country like ours, abounding in extensive forests and untamed lands; and when recourse is had to prohibitions, premiums, and such like forced systems of monopoly, to encourage the prosperity of a country, there is always great reason to fear a mistake has been committed.

No nation in the world has advanced more rapidly to prosperity and wealth than the United States, unassisted by the advantages of conquest, but by the development and natural growth of her own resources. There is no nation under the sun where capital increases more rapidly, and the advantages of industry greater; and we shall still continue to grow and prosper, unless a check is given to us by improper and imprudent legislation. To be sure we have experienced a momentary check to our prosperity, but which has grown out of a state of things partly beyond our control, and partly by our own imprudence in legislation. The nominal price of property may change, our currency may depreciate, but a country possessing so many natural advantages, of soil and climate, with a population doubling every twenty-three years, and the productions of the earth increasing in a still greater proportion, furnish incontestable evidence of its rapid growth and rise to greatness. One of the best evidences of the prosperity of a country is, the price of labor; and I venture to assert, without the fear of contradiction, that in no country in the world is labor so high as in the United States, and it arises from the habits and feelings of our population, growing out of the nature of our Government, and character of our institutions. In no country in the world is there so many inducements for men to cultivate the earth, and become proprietors of the soil. Any man can, in this country, with the fruits of two days labor, purchase an acre of land, which, if well cultivated, will subsist a small family. Can it be possible, with all these inducements to cultivate the soil, and with all the advantages which accompany pursuits of this kind, that an attempt will be made by legislative enactments to force capital from its natural course? Gentlemen say the nation is in debt and distress, and their object is to legislate it into a happy and prosperous condition, and that too by encouraging a particular branch of industry. If, by legislation, we foster and encourage any one particular branch of industry, it must be at the expense of another. It must be by taking from the pocket of A and putting it into that of B. Capital, without the aid of Government, will always seek that kind of employment which is most profitable. And when any attempt is made to divert it from its accustomed channel, it must be at the expense of the other, and perhaps sacrificing the interest of the greater part for the advantage of the few. Mr. Hamilton had said, that "as often as a duty upon a foreign article makes an addition to its price, it causes an extra expense to the community for the benefit of the domestic manufacturer." There is no fact more clear and conclusive, than that, if the manufacturer cannot succeed, with the present high rate of duty, he cannot succeed without imposing an additional tax on the community. The article which it is the object of the consumer to purchase cheap, will rise in proportion to the duty laid on that article. By laying this high duty, which amounts to a complete prohibition, you deprive the Government of the income which arises from importations, and you make the article higher to the consumer, which is all for the benefit and advantage of the manufacturer. If we are to adopt this complicated system, let it be gradual, not speedy. This is the opinion of Adam Smith, to whom, after all that has been said on this subject, we owe more than to any other man. He says, all changes of this kind should be gradual and slow. In this country particularly, this change should be gradual and progressive, inasmuch as Governments like ours, are subject to violent changes of parties, often accompanied with a change of measures. Extensive investments have no security in any particular branch of industry, which are to be encouraged by sudden changes in legislation, and which depend on the whim and caprice of every session of Congress. No nation in the world in proportion to her income, pays so large a bounty for the support of manufacturing industry as the United States. Much has been said on this subject, about establishing what gentlemen have termed an American policy. I am afraid there is a delusion in the sound. It is a popular term which gentlemen have made use of to effect their purpose, when they say, we should build up for ourselves an American policy, and, say they, it is high time we should begin to encourage home industry. The merchant who invests his capital in a ship, and by his enterprise, skill, and industry, brings an article of English manufacture into market, is as much the producer of that article as he who invests his capital in a factory of looms and shuttles, and manufactures the article at home. The process by which the article is acquired may be different, while the effect on the capital and industry of the country may be the same.

This House, sir, has been inundated with petitions and memorials from the noisy and clamorous manufacturers of our country, ambitious of their own personal aggrandizement, and with a view to the accumulation of wealth. They ought to be aware, and, no doubt, are, that experience, skill, and the knowledge of machinery, are necessary to their success. They will have first to rear a population in their factories, persons who must have all the advantages of a well regulated life, to their business, before they can either labor with ease to themselves, or with profit to their employers. It is a fact too notorious, and the history of events will bear me out in the assertion, that, when once we commence this kind of business, there will be no getting out of it. We rear a population in the factory, totally unfit for any other kind of business, or any of the common or ordinary purposes of life, and must, in the very nature of things, continue in the same kind of employment. They become mere machines themselves. Could the advocates of this system be but reasonable in their desires, and await the progress of time, they would soon acknowledge that the present duties were sufficiently high, and that the time is not far distant when we shall see the greater portion of the capital of our country going into the hands of the manufacturer. What has been the course of things already? Have not all the great and well-conducted factories in the United States increased their capital every year? Has this not been the case with the factories at Boston, Providence, and Philadelphia, and others? We are willing to let them decide the question at issue. They are in favor of an increase of duty. This noise and clamor come from a few clamorous sets of manufacturers, who, I venture to say, could not prosper under any state of things, even with an entire prohibition. But, I would ask, is it just or reasonable that we should be called on to protect the improvident and unskilful manufacturer, who has his factory in a section of country possessing few or no natural advantages?—I mean such advantages as water power, and convenience to the seaboard. The time is not far distant when those very men who are now crying out most loudly to protect them against foreign industry, will be equally clamorous for protection against the well-conducted factories of the Eastern States. We may go on passing tariff upon tariff, and, sir, we never can benefit the Western grower of hemp, or manufacturer of cotton bagging. From the very best of information which I have been enabled to obtain on the subject, some of the well-conducted factories of the North have divided this year twenty-five per cent. per annum. One of the arguments which has been urged by the advocates of this system, is, that, if we do not do something to counteract the effect of this difference between our exports and imports, that the country, in a short time, will be drained of a very precious metal. That this difference must be paid in specie, and with this drain is connected all those horrid ideas of national bankruptcy and political ruin. Gentlemen appear not disposed to let the commercial part of the country—I say, gentlemen are not disposed to let them have any thing to do with the regulation of commerce. They will take it under their own protection. They appear to be ready and willing at “one fell swoop” to sweep all our foreign commerce from the ocean, and dry up those sources from which are derived almost every thing which is great and glorious in this Republic. It is presumed that no intelligent merchant would either import or export any article but that on which he expected to realize something more than an equivalent for. No man would continue that trade which, sooner or later, would lead to bankruptcy. To be sure, accidents sometimes happen from various circumstances; from any business being overdone; from the common accidents to which all long and dangerous voyages are liable. But, I venture to assert that every judicious investment of a capital, whether it be in specie or any thing else, returns with an increased value added to our capital by the energy and activity of our countrymen. It is somewhat strange that these instances of what they call balances against us, will be cited to prove a proposition, the converse of which has been established by the best writers on the subject for the last twenty years. We will only refer, for a moment, to the most prosperous period of our history, from 1795 to 1801, a period which must be recollected with pleasure and delight by all the commercial men of the nation; a time when we enjoyed more uninterrupted commercial prosperity than any other nation in the world. And, I ask, was there not then what some gentlemen have called a balance against us, and which has always been the case at every period of our prosperity, and which always must be the case so long as England—“that England, hedged in with the main—that water-walled bulwark”—that emporium of the commerce of the world—enjoys any thing like her present commercial ascendancy over every quarter of the world? In the supposition that the specie of England formed the tenth part of the specie of Europe, it is very certain that the other nations of Europe must, and are compelled to, exercise great activity and persevering industry to procure for themselves the other nine-tenths of specie which is necessary for their commerce; and, when they fail to procure that portion which is necessary, the English will soon take to them that part of the precious balance which is wanting. This is very reasonable and obvious, because the exportation of specie gives more profit to the enterprise of the merchant than any other article of commerce.

There must always be what has been termed a balance of trade in favor of England, so long as she maintains her present extensive credit, and carries on so much commerce with the other nations of the world. The inflexibility of her laws with regard to creditors, the undoubted value of her paper money, which governs every thing, go to place her far above all other nations which have neglected, or whose situation cannot procure for them the same advantages. She regards specie in the light which her best interests dictate to her. Nearly all the moneyed transactions of the country are effected by paper money more quick and agreeable than it can be done in any other way. Specie, by all nations, is considered as much an article of commerce as any thing else—as much so as we consider our flour or tobacco. No merchant sends a single dollar abroad but what he receives in return something which he considers more than an equivalent, for every exchange is a quid pro quo.

One of the greatest arguments against this bill is that it strikes at the total annihilation and destruction of our foreign commerce—that commerce which has built up, and beautified our most flourishing towns and cities, and given an impetus to that American industry, activity and enterprise, to which we owe the present happy and flourishing condition of our country. Capital will naturally seek that kind of employment which is most profitable; and hence it is, that most of our capital, which is but the accumulation of thirty years, has been directed to commerce. It is true our navigating interest, from a peculiar state of things, has been much depressed, and this, sir, is to be the final blow it is to receive; this is to be our shipwreck. A great portion of the capital of our country is commercial, accumulated by the active enterprise of our citizens, and which, we were told at the last session, by a gentleman who delivered one of the most able speeches on the subject I have ever heard, employed upwards of seventy thousand seamen, for the maintenance of which somewhere about ten millions of dollars were annually paid, to which, if we add the five millions which is necessary to keep this tonnage in repair, we shall find the enormous sum of fifteen millions of dollars annually disbursed to that class of our community. The effect of this measure on the cotton, rice, and tobacco-growing States will be pernicious in the extreme. It will exclude them from those markets where they depended almost entirely for a sale of those articles, and force Great Britain to encourage the cottons (Brazil, Rio Janeiro, and Buenos Ayres,) which, in a short time, can be brought in competition with us. Nothing but the consumption of British goods in this country, received in exchange, can support a command of the cotton market to the Southern planter. It is one thing very certain, she will not come here with her gold and silver to trade with us. And should Great Britain, pursuing the principles of her reciprocal duty act, of last June, lay three or four cents on our cotton; where would, I ask, be our surplus of cotton? It is well known that the United States cannot manufacture one-fourth of the cotton that is in it; and should we, by our imprudent legislative enactments, in pursuing to such an extent this restrictive system, force Great Britain to shut her ports against us, it will paralyze the whole trade of the Southern country. This export trade, which composes five-sixths of the exports of the United States, will be swept entirely from the ocean, and leave but a melancholy wreck behind. I am well convinced the agricultural interest of this country, but more particularly that of the South, is doomed to great distress. Already are our storehouses crowded with bales of cotton, which no sale can be got for, and our granaries filled with grain, rotting on our hands. And yet, gentlemen say, we have protection for our cotton, and they will give us one for our grain. I could not have anticipated such arguments as these. No legislation, on our part, can avert the common distress which the agricultural interest of our country is doomed to suffer. We must look to a change of things on the other side of the Atlantic. An alarming fact has already presented itself. The exports of cotton this last year, from the Levant or from Egypt, into England, has been 143,000 bales; and it arises from the short-sighted policy of the people of the Eastern and Middle States. They have, by their petitions and memorials, together with acts of remonstrance, induced this Government to commence that system of restriction which has forced Great Britain to begin to look somewhere else for a market for her manufactured goods, and that raw material which she will only receive by way of exchange.

The people of the Eastern States should be the last in the Union to give their support to a measure of this kind, which aims a death-blow at the commercial and navigating interest of that portion of country, which has been clearly demonstrated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER.) Have they not been the carriers of our exports, and the venders of our imports, which they have brought in in return? Have they not speculated in England on the capital of our raw material? The growers of wheat, the manufacturers of hardware, cotton, or woollen goods here, can have no trade with the growers of wheat, the manufacturers of hardware, cotton, or woollen goods in England. There must be difference of productions, difference of climate, and difference of wants, to create, barter and exchange. The debt of the North to England has been paid by the cotton and rice of the South. Paralyze the South, and you strike from the ocean at once, as I said before, five-sixths of the export trade of the United States. Various causes have induced the Governments of Europe, but more particularly England, to adopt this complicated system of monopoly and prohibitions—a system which she has established, to the serious regret of the wise men of that country—a policy which was once considered sound, but now, as theories, universally exploded. It is the interest of every consumer to buy where he can get cheapest; and we are all, to a certain extent, consumers, and the more markets we have, the cheaper can we buy, and the better can we sell. As long as we trade with Great Britain, so long will she trade with us. But the moment we pass this bill, now before us, which is equal, and, I may say, intended, as a prohibition, that moment will the markets of Great Britain be closed against us. No commerce can be beneficial to both nations, unless it be founded and conducted on the perfect principle of reciprocity. Not only should the article be brought into the market as cheap as possible, but the less labor employed in the making, so much is a gain to the consumer. I should be glad to know if any gentleman from the South, on this floor, was willing to say he was prepared to give his vote for the passage of a bill for a direct tax; that he was ready to send the tax-gatherer among his constituents. I hope not. We shall have neither the means of paying a direct tax, nor of purchasing the manufactured article from the manufacturer. We shall all be driven, in our small way, at great expense and loss of labor, to manufacture for ourselves. For not only does this article, which it is the object of the consumer to purchase cheap, rise in value, but it cuts off the means which the consumer might have in paying for it.

Mr. Speaker has drawn a most unfavorable picture of the distress of our country, but he has dwelt with more than ordinary feeling on that portion of the country west of the Alleghany mountains, and the object of this bill is to relieve them of that distress. If such are the fond anticipations of gentlemen from that quarter, I fear they will be disappointed. I am really disposed very much to question, whether there be any thing like distress in that section of country of which most is complained—I mean the West. There may have been a great depreciation of property, and individuals may not have got rich as fast as they might have wished, or might have anticipated, forming their conclusions from an unnatural state of things, which existed some eight or ten years ago there. I, sir, at various periods, have travelled through that portion of the Union, and I assure you, sir, if there was any thing like distress in the country, it retired from public view altogether. I never, in the whole course of my life, saw a people more happy and contented, in the full fruition of the best of every thing which a rich and luxuriant soil could afford. The cause of the depreciation of property in that country has not been owing to a want of protection to what has been termed American industry. It is owing, sir, to other causes—to a want of a sound currency. It is to be traced in their over issues of paper money, and the regulation of the land office system, which offers such great inducement for emigration, and by that means has drained the country of its moneyed resources. The unparalleled prosperity of that country during our late war, gave a stimulus to industry, and a value to property, which no one who reasoned on the subject could have supposed would continue in time of peace. While the war threatened the Southern and Eastern States with distress and ruin, the Western country were enjoying a height of prosperity never before experienced in any country. And, sir, this measure, if adopted, will be worse than war upon the Southern country, without any of those advantages to the West which grew out of the late war with Great Britain. We, sir, who suffered in war, should at least be allowed some of the advantages incident to a peace. This bill will bear particularly hard, and be extremely onerous and burdensome on the poor and laboring classes of our community; even the spade of the ditcher, the axe of the timber-cutter, the gun of the hunter, and all the common implements of agriculture, are proposed to be taxed to an entire prohibition. Instead, sir, of taxing the rich man's banquet, and those articles which the interest of the country demands we should not encourage, we find those articles taxed highest which enter into the domestic concerns of every man's household. I, sir, should not object to this bill, could it be founded on a great national principle; but, I protest, most solemnly, against any measure so unequal in its operation, and the tendency of which will be to oppress one section of country for the advantage and benefit of another, and which must precede, but a little while, the necessity of an excise, which is inconsistent with the genius and spirit of our Government, and character of our institutions. I should not object to this measure, if the operation could be confined to that portion of the Union which has been so loud and clamorous for it. But, sir, it involves us also. We are ready and willing to make any sacrifice for the good of the nation. Any thing for revenue, but not a cent for monopoly.

When Mr. GOVAN had concluded—

Mr. HAMILTON, withdrew his motion for indefinite postponement.

The question on Mr. TOLSON's motion, before stated, was then taken, and stood—yeas 101, nays 101, as follows:

The House being equally divided, the SPEAKER voted with the yeas, and the question was thereby carried in the affirmative.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, then moved further to amend the said bill, by striking out the following item:

"On all foreign distilled spirits, fifteen per centum upon the duties now imposed by law, and in addition thereto."

And on the question to agree to this amendment, it was determined in the negative—yeas 80, nays 123, as follows:

Mr. BRADLEY renewed the motion made by him in Committee of the Whole, for laying a duty on certain imported books.

Mr. B. supported the amendment, by submitting at length his views in relation to it.

Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina, opposed the views expressed by Mr. BRADLEY, and moved to postpone the bill to the 1st day of December.

The previous question was then again called for, by Mr. WRIGHT. There were in favor of taking it 70 votes, and against it 94. So the call was not sustained by the House.

The question then recurring on the postponement, as moved by Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina—

Mr. MERCER opposed the motion in a short speech; to which Mr. TUCKER replied in a few words.

Mr. RANDOLPH requested the gentleman from South Carolina to withdraw his motion, as a personal favor to him, that the question might be taken on the motion of Mr. BRADLEY.

Mr. TUCKER complied; but with notice that, as soon as the present amendment should be disposed of, he should renew his motion for postponement.

Mr. ALLEN made a few remarks introductory to the reading of a memorial drawn up by Mr. Jefferson, (to whose liberal sentiments and philosophical and literary character he bore ample testimony,) on the subject embraced by the amendment now under consideration.

Mr. BRADLEY modified his amendment so as to read to the following effect:

"On all books which the importer shall make it satisfactorily appear to the Collector of the port were printed previously to the year 1775, four cents per volume; and on all books printed in other than the English language, four cents per volume; on all other books, if bound, 37 cents—if in sheets, 33 cents per pound."

Mr. WEBSTER stated several facts on the subject.

Mr. POINSETT supported the amendment by a few remarks.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to amend the amendment, by striking out its last clause, viz: "on all other books, when bound, 37 cents per pound, and when in boards or sheets, 33 cents per pound."

Mr. BRADLEY opposed this alteration, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. CONDUCT suggested, as a modification, to insert "or parts of" books, which was accepted by the mover.

Mr. MCARTHUR called for a division of the question, and it was accordingly taken, first, on the first clause of the amendment, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows—yeas 184, nays 12:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander of Virginia, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Tennessee, Archer, Baylies, P. P. Barbour, Bassett, Blair, Bradley, Breck, Brent, Buchanan, Buck, Burleigh, Burton, Cady, Cambreleng, Campbell of South Carolina, Campbell of Ohio, Carter, Cary, Cassedy, Cobb, Cocke, Collins, Condict, Conner, Cook, Crafts, Craig, Crowninshield, Culpeper, Cushman, Cuthbert, Day, Durfee, Dwinell, Dwight, Eaton, Eddy, Edwards of North Carolina, Ellis, Farrelly, Findlay, Floyd, Foot of Connecticut, Forsyth, Forward, Frost, Fuller, Garrison, Garnett, Gatlin, Gazlay, Gist, Govan, Gurley, NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander of Tennessee, Allison, Barber of Connecticut, Bartley, Brown, Buckner, Kremer, Little, Patterson of Pennsylvania, Plumer of Pennsylvania, and Reynolds—12.

The question then recurring on the second part of the amendment, the yeas and nays upon it were dispensed with, and that part of the amendment was adopted, without a division.

Mr. RANDOLPH then moved to amend the bill so as to reduce the duty on brown sugar to two and a half cents per pound.

Mr. RANDOLPH spoke as follows: I rise, sir, for the purpose of offering to the consideration of this House an amendment to the bill before them, which nothing but an imperious sense of duty could have induced me, rebus existentibus, to propose. It will be recollected that, in the year 1816, an additional duty was laid on brown sugar. My present object is to reduce the duty to what it then was. I shall not take up the time of the House—I never have done it—in discussing the general principles of any bill on the consideration of its details. We all know the depreciation of money which has taken place since 1816; that revulsion in the pecuniary concerns of this country, many of us, in our own persons, and all of us in the persons of our friends, yet live to deplore. Sir, what was the comparative value of money then and at present? Do we not all know that at that time a duty of six cents per pound on sugar would not have been as much felt as a duty of three cents is felt now? Sir, there was not a man, with the exception, perhaps, of a few miserable usurers and muckworms, who could not then get six dollars easier than he now can get three. For myself, I could more easily have paid three dollars at that time than I can pay one dollar today. Sir, the demon of speculation had taken possession of the public mind—the bubble, not, sir, of the South Sea or the Mississippi, but one every whit as mischievous—was then fully blown to its utmost expansion, and was near bursting. Yet the duty on this article—an article we are all obliged to consume; in its necessity next to the articles of salt and iron, in universal demand; and entering into the food of the poorest man in the community, would not have been as great, in proportion to the value of money—at six dollars then, as it is now at three dollars. Sir, I want to know on what principle it is that the sugar planter, who gets his mules, his stave timber, the provisions for his slaves, at the first hand and on the cheapest possible terms, cannot be satisfied with a protection—(the word is not mine; I disclaim every thing of the kind, but I use it in gentlemen's own sense of the term,) yes, sir, a protection of two and a half cents a pound on their sugar? Sir, we have had a practical commentary in the success of the last amendment, (Mr. Ton's, on cotton bagging,) on the effects of perseverance—I hope we shall profit by it; I hope it will animate, especially, every opponent of the bill to keep the faith; to fight the good fight, and to hold out to the end. [Here Mr. BRENT interposed.]

Sir, I have not yet done. My proposition, sir, is not to lay a tax, but to take one off. But, from the effect it seems to produce, I could really think that by some necromantic process, I had been suddenly transferred to a Chamber of Deputies, or to a British House of Commons, to the deliberative hall of some one of the older—I will not say the more corrupt—I disclaim the imputation; but one of the older and more astute Governments of Europe. Sir, I am wrong. I rather could wish I was thus transferred; for, in the British Parliament, I should see duties reduced to less than one-half of their former amount; not, indeed, from choice, sir, for power is sweet, and so is money; but the British ministry have been driven to the reduction, and on the necessary article of salt, seven-eighths of the duty has been taken off, and they are pledged to repeal the remainder. But here, sir, by some strange conjunction of the planets—for evidently it cannot have been by any constellation being in opposition—a most extraordinary effect has been produced. In this most popular branch of the most popular Government in the world, we, who come immediately from the people, whose arteries may be expected to pulsate and keep measure with their own, instantly become extremely fastidious, so soon as any proposal is made, the object of which is to lessen the burdens of the country. Sir, were it not as plain as the noonday sun, I would quote high authority in this House, to prove what I have said of the distresses of the country. Sir, the very stamp act itself could hardly throw us into a greater flame than a proposal to diminish any of the taxes—ay, sir, or our own emolument, seems to excite in this House. But as it is a feeling in which I do not participate, as my feelings run in quite another direction, I find myself quite cool—never more unmoved in my life; for if, as I have some reason to fear, the tax shall not be reduced, I, sir, shall pay as little of it as any man.

Mr. CONDUCT opposed the motion, and referred to the facts which existed when the present duty was laid.

Mr. RANDOLPH replied.

Mr. BRENT said a few words; and

Mr. FLOYD argued at some length in favor of the reduction.

Mr. COOK took the same side of the question, and was opposed by Mr. GURLEY; when

Mr. WICKLIFFE called for the previous question. The House refused to take it—ayes 81, noes 99.

Mr. FARRELLY opposed the reduction.

Mr. WARFIELD avowed a change of sentiment on the subject, and argued in favor of the reduction, and in answer to Mr. FARRELLY.

Mr. COOK spoke in vindication of the course he had pursued, and in answer to a charge of inconsistency.

Mr. LIVINGSTON explained some facts in relation to the consumption and raising of sugar, and urged arguments against the proposed amendment.

Mr. MALLARY inquired into the state of the sugar-growing interest, and the prospects of its increase.

Mr. LIVINGSTON replied, and stated details in explanation.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, moved an adjournment.

The House refused to adjourn—ayes 87, noes 100.

Mr. FORSYTH gave the history of the imposition of the tax on sugar, to show that it was raised for revenue only, and advocated the reduction.

Mr. MALLARY spoke in opposition to it.

The question was then taken on Mr. RANDOLPH's motion, by yeas and nays—yeas 96, nays 99, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander of Virginia, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Tennessee, Archer, P. P. So the motion was negatived.

A motion was made by Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, to amend the bill, by inserting the following, viz: On salt, twelve and a half cents per bushel of fifty-six pounds, instead of twenty cents, 'as now imposed by law.'

And then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 14.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of the 26th of February, directing an inquiry into the expediency of granting the right of pre-emption to certain actual settlers in the district of St. Helena Courthouse, in the State of Louisiana, made a report thereon, which was read, and referred to the Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill granting the right of pre-emption to certain actual settlers in that part of the former Province of West Florida included in the district of Jackson Courthouse.

Mr. HAMILTON moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before Congress, on the first day of the next session, a detailed revision of the existing tariff; a revision which shall have for its object the production of revenue equal to the exigencies of Government, and which shall be beneficially accommodated to the various and existing branches of the productive industry of the country.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. FLOYD submitted the following resolution for consideration to-morrow:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House any information he may possess showing the kind and quantity of provisions, stores, or supplies, of any kind, which have been sent from the United States to any of the ports of South America, on the Pacific ocean, for the use of the vessels of war of the United States; designating the ports from whence such supplies were sent, the name of the ship or vessels so employed; the time when, and the amount paid for such, and for transportation thereof; likewise, the name of the owner or owners of such ship or vessels; how and when paid; also, the amount paid in said ports by any agent of this Government for supplies of any kind for the vessels of war of the United States, stating the name and office of the person, the time when, the place where, and the mode of payment; whether in bills, notes, or money; if in bills or notes, whether at par value, if not, at what discount or advance.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. COCKE, calling for information respecting payments of arrears by navy agents, &c., was taken up and agreed to.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act regulating the transportation of gold and silver bullion, specie, and jewels, and carrying of passengers, and to prohibit the receipt of merchandise in the public vessels of the United States," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The petition of William Eaton, presented to the House on the 16th day of February last, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Message of the President of the United States, upon the subject of the claim of the State of Massachusetts, for the services of the militia of said State during the late war with Great Britain, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Bills from the Senate, of the following titles, to wit: "An act, supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt,'" "An act to change the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States, in the State of Ohio, and one of the terms of the circuit court in Kentucky;" were, severally, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIM OF DANIEL D. TOMPKINS.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States upon the subject of the claim of Daniel D. Tompkins, late Governor of the State of New York, made a report thereon; which was read, and is as follows:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States of the 25th of March, 1824, relative to the accounts of Daniel D. Tompkins, report:

That the accounts of Mr. Tompkins underwent a full investigation by a committee of the House, appointed at the second session of the last Congress, who made a detailed report thereon, and in the views of the committee then expressed, as to the services of Governor Tompkins, and his claims to the justice and liberality of his country, this committee fully concur.

On a consideration of the claims and accounts of Governor Tompkins, the committee, at the last session, reported in favor of, and recommended—

1. An allowance of interest on all moneys advanced by him, on account of the public, from the time of making such advances to the time of his being reimbursed.
2. An allowance of a reasonable commission on all moneys disbursed by him during the late war.
3. An indemnity for losses sustained by him, in consequence of any failure on the part of the Government to fulfil its engagements to send him money and Treasury notes, within the time specified, to be deposited in certain banks as collateral security for loans procured by him at the request and on account of the Government.

4. An irresponsibility for losses incurred by any frauds or failures of sub-agents to whom moneys were advanced through his hands.

In conformity with this report, a bill was passed authorizing "the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust and settle the accounts and claims of Daniel D. Tompkins, late Governor of the State of New York, on principles of equity and justice, subject to the revision and final decision of the President of the United States."

The committee have no doubt that Governor Tompkins has been and yet is a creditor of the Government to a large amount, and that every principle of justice would recommend a prompt and liberal settlement of his accounts, upon the basis of the foregoing report; but they are of opinion also that the act of Congress before recited gives sufficient authority for this purpose.

So far as the committee have been informed, it appears that the aforesaid act has been liberally interpreted by the President and the accounting officers, and that, under the provisions of that law, the President of the United States now possesses the power, and ought, in the opinion of the committee, to exercise it, of doing full and liberal justice to Governor Tompkins.

The committee do not perceive any good reason, therefore, for making any change in the existing law, and recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that it be again referred to the President of the United States for his final decision.

Some conversation arose between Mr. McLANE and Mr. COCKE, on the subject, when Mr. COCKE moved to lay the report on the table. The motion was agreed to—ayes 76, noes 60.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House having resumed the consideration of the bill for a revision of the Tariff—

Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina, renewed the motion he had yesterday made for a postponement of the Tariff bill to the first day of December next; on which question the yeas and nays were required.

Mr. TRIMBLE moved for a call of the House; the motion was agreed to—ayes 87, noes 78. A call of the House was accordingly ordered. The names of the absentees were called and the doors closed.

Mr. LITTLE then moved to dispense with all further proceedings in the call. The motion was negatived. Ayes 78, noes 103.

Excuses were then offered for several absentees, and accepted.

Mr. WEBSTER moved that all further proceedings on the call be dispensed with.

Mr. TRIMBLE opposed the motion.

The question was taken and decided in the affirmative. Ayes 110.

Mr. MERCER protested against either an indefinite postponement, or taking the previous question on this bill, whilst amendments were pending, and others ready to be offered.

Mr. TRIMBLE then required the previous question. The House refused to sustain the call—ayes 94, noes 97.

Mr. WEBSTER stated his reasons for voting against the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. RANDOLPH expressed nearly the same views.

Mr. TUCKER said, on making his motion to postpone the Tariff bill to the 1st of December next, he did not rise to make a speech, because other gentlemen had already expressed his views of the subject under discussion much better than he was capable of doing, and much more to his satisfaction. But I am of opinion, said Mr. T., that this discussion, and the course that has been pursued, are sufficient evidence of the impropriety, at least, of laying duties for any purpose except revenue. And if we can place any confidence in the opinion of the President of the United States, and Secretary of the Treasury, there is no necessity for increasing the revenue, except it should be thought necessary to carry into operation a system of internal improvement—a project, he believed, equally as unconstitutional as the proposed tariff, and which will be equally as partial in its operation, and oppressive in its effect; both of which I consider a violation of the spirit of the Constitution, unwise, and impolitic—measures which I protest against. Some gentlemen contend that, if the bill should pass, it will increase the revenue, and encourage domestic industry; and that, by increasing the duty, the articles will come cheaper to the consumer, &c. I cannot believe such doctrine. To say that the manufacturers cannot go on without increasing the present duties, to enable them to compete with foreign manufactures, and thereby place it in the power of the manufacturers to charge more for their articles, and yet that they will come cheaper to the consumer, seems to me absurd.

Our Constitution was formed to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence and general welfare of this Union. But, if these projects are carried into operation, they must and will have a contrary effect. From some sections of this Union, petitions have been presented from many manufacturers, praying for protection; which, if they succeed, must operate against the interest of every other class, except themselves, and be particularly oppressive to the people in the Southern States.

This subject has been too long discussed, and I have no doubt every gentleman's mind is made up on it, and that the vote now would be the same, that it would be a month hence. I think the bill worse now, than when it was reported by the Committee of the Whole, and as I am opposed to the bill with any amendments that could be made; and, for the purpose of putting an end to further discussion and amendment, I shall move for the postponement of it. I think it time for the present session to come to a close; I, for one, wish to go home; but, if gentlemen think we should stay longer, I am of opinion our time can be much bet-

So the motion of Mr. WILLIAMS was negatived. Mr. CONDUCT moved to amend the bill by adding to the clause, fixing the duty on bar iron, at 90 cents per cwt., the following words: "Until the 1st day of June, 1825; and, from that time, a duty of one dollar per cwt."

I did not rise, said Mr. CONDUCT, to discuss, at length, the principles of the bill. It was my intention to submit my views of its general policy, and of the effects which probably would result from its adoption; but, being precluded an opportunity, when in Committee of the Whole House, where the debate has been protracted to a great length, knowing how precious the time of the House is, and how impatient gentlemen are to vote upon the final question, I will content myself with a very few remarks connected with the amendment I have the honor to submit.

I will, first, ask the attention of the House to the condition of the iron works in the district where I reside. In the county of Morris there are about forty establishments for the manufacture of bar iron—in all, about ninety forge fires; most of them are located upon one stream, a branch of the

The question then recurred on the amendment previously offered by Mr. WILLIAMS, reducing the duty on salt to 10 cents per bushel.

Mr. ROSS called for the previous question.

The House refused to sustain the call—ayes 93, noes 95.

Mr. SANDFORD made some general remarks in opposition to the bill.

Mr. REED stated facts, and quoted memorials in opposition to the amendment proposed.

Mr. FLOYD advocated the reduction, which was also supported by Messrs. RANDOLPH and MOORE, of Alabama; when the question was taken by yeas and nays—yeas 81, nays 122, as follows:

Passaic river. During the restrictive system, and whilst the war continued, these works were in a flourishing condition; the iron found a ready sale, and commanded a good price. At the close of the war, the large importations from Europe reduced the price below the actual cost of making it, and these works ceased. The owners petitioned Congress for relief, by additional duties on foreign iron. In the hope that aid would be granted, they struggled for existence, endeavoring to employ their workmen, rather than discharge them, although every ton of iron made was sold at a loss. In 1815 or 1816, Mr. Dallas, then Secretary of the Treasury, recommended an increase of the duty on foreign iron, to $15 per ton. But, such was the hostility to this important branch of industry, so strong was the joint influence of the merchants and planters, that, instead of advancing the duty, as Mr. Dallas had advised, they reduced it to forty-five cents per cwt. or nine dollars per ton. The consequence was, irretrievable ruin to the great body of iron-masters in every section of our country. Of the forty establishments before referred to, with the exception, perhaps, of four or five, the works have either been abandoned, or have changed owners. The few who withstood the shock, were men who had accumulated property whilst the business was profitable, and who, during the time of depressed prices, merely converted the surplus produce of their farms into cash, by the operations of their forges, following the iron business as a secondary employment; whilst every man who made it his principal concern, who sold his iron and purchased his provisions and stock, was ruined. His forge, his lands, his goods and chattles, were all struck off under the sheriff's hammer, at public auction. He himself was driven to jail; his workmen were unemployed; some of them followed their employer to the jail; some emigrated to new countries; their families were reduced to abject want, and compelled to ask relief from the town, or resort to beggary. The sound of the axe and the forge hammer was no longer heard from the mountains, where, but a few years before, all was life, and action, and gladness.

Such, Mr. Speaker, was the actual condition of these unfortunate people; a condition, not the result of their idleness or prodigality, but of the neglect of their own Government, which had looked on as an unconcerned spectator, upon the ruin of our own citizens, accomplished by the policy of foreign Governments.

About the year 1819, a duty of seventy-five cents per cwt. or $15 per ton, was imposed, under which act many of those works gradually revived, and, with the most rigid economy, their owners were enabled for a time to pursue the business. The general peace of Europe, the disbanding of about 600,000 men, so long employed in arms, had the effect of reducing the price of labor to so low a degree, as to enable the manufacturers in Sweden and Russia and England to undersell us. The importations of iron in 1821, 1822, and 1823, have been so enormous, as to drive American iron from our market. Our average import had been about 20,000 tons annually, but, in 1823, we imported 31,000 tons. Not a bar of American iron can now be sold in our cities, except at a dead loss to the manufacturer. Our citizens, employed in this business, have loaded your table with their memorials, stating their difficulties, and imploring relief. Will you turn a deaf ear to their distresses? Will you suffer these establishments to fall into utter decay? Will the Government be dependent on foreign nations for an article so essential to our national defence—so necessary for every purpose of agriculture? Will you look to Europe for your cannon and muskets, your swords and your ploughshares, your spears and pruning hooks? With your hills and mountains abounding with the richest iron ore on the globe, competent, not merely to supply your own wants, but amply adequate to supply the whole world, with fuel and water power in the vicinity of every mine, sufficient to prepare it for use, will you still look to England and Sweden and Russia, for this indispensable article? Will you transport it three and four thousand miles, merely to give employment to your surplus tonnage? To give your merchants the benefit of the freight, and a profit upon the purchase?

What is the objection to raising the duty on this article? It is said it will enhance the price to the consumer. I admit, Mr. Speaker, it may produce that effect for a limited period; but, in the end, the domestic competition will insure an abundant supply, and at a reasonable price. There is no greater fallacy, than the assertion, so often repeated, that increased duties always enhance the price of the article. On the contrary, I maintain that, when the Government has afforded a duty amounting to a protection from foreign importation, a reduction of price has followed. I would instance coarse cottons as a most conclusive and triumphant proof. In 1816, when the protective duty of twenty-five per cent. was enacted, with a minimum valuation of twenty-five cents per square yard, all the arguments which sophistry and mercantile cupidity could invent, were urged against the measure. All the gloomy predictions, now enforced against this bill, were arrayed. Commerce was to be destroyed; the Navy would be annihilated; the whole nation was to be taxed for the benefit of a few cotton spinners; the poor of the land would be compelled to pay double prices for the coarse garments they wore. The law, however, went into operation, and the coarse cottons of India were excluded. The trade in that article was cut off, and this is the only prediction in the whole catalogue which has been fulfilled. The wants of the country, in respect to coarse cottons, are most abundantly supplied; we produce, from the skill and industry of our own people, an article most essential to our comfort, of a quality vastly superior to any ever imported, and at a price greatly reduced. Sir, if this fact stood alone, it would speak volumes in favor of the policy of this bill. Gentlemen may tax their ingenuity as they please, to account for the success of this measure of national policy, and for the failure of their own predictions; they cannot mislead the public mind. The facts are apparent to the capacity of every man. But, sir, this is only one instance which goes to show the fallacy of the assertion, that increased duties augment the price to the consumer. I might enumerate the various articles manufactured from leather—as boots, shoes, harness, saddles, bridles—cabinet furniture, as chairs and tables—carriages, hats, nails, shovels, and spades, and various other articles, as furnishing conclusive evidence that, where Government has granted an adequate protective duty, to articles of prime necessity, the raw material of which is produced at home, domestic competition invariably produces an adequate supply, at prices generally not exceeding those of the imported articles, and frequently much lower, taking into calculation the quality of the goods.

Taking, then, experience as our guide, may we not expect the same results, in regard to iron? New mines of this valuable treasure are daily discovered, producing, in the greatest abundance, the best iron in the world. Protect your manufactures from being ruined by foreign importation; give them the supply of the home market, which will insure them a regular demand and a ready sale for the fruits of their industry. Let them progress gradually in perfecting their machinery, and in acquiring skill, which experience alone can give. The resources of our country, the enterprise and energy of our citizens, with our experience in relation to other subjects, all justify the conclusion that domestic competition will insure us a full supply, at reasonable prices, of an article so intimately connected with our national defence in war, and so essential to our agricultural, our manufacturing, and our commercial pursuits in peace.

Mr. BAYLIES opposed the amendment in a short speech.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved to amend the amendment, by striking out one dollar and inserting eighty cents, as the duty per cwt., and supported his motion by a speech, in which he delivered at length his sentiments on the iron duty.

Mr. ARCHER followed, on the same side, in a speech of considerable extent.

Mr. WEBSTER spoke at length in favor of the duty of eighty cents.

Mr. TOD rose in reply, and, having spoken for some time, after he concluded,

Mr. KREMER called for the previous question.

The House, this time, sustained the call—ayes 98, noes 86.

The question, "Shall the main question be now put?" was taken by yeas and nays—yeas 111, nays 93, as follows:

The said main question was then put, to wit: "Shall the bill be engrossed, and read a third time?" and passed in the affirmative—yeas 105, nays 102, as follows:

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question being then stated, as to the day on which the bill should receive its third reading—

Mr. TOD moved that it have its third reading to-morrow.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that it have its third reading on Monday next, and supported the motion by a few remarks.

On this question a warm debate arose, in which Messrs. LIVINGSTON, MERCER, and WARFIELD, advocated, and Messrs. TOD, KREMER, METCALFE, and STORRS opposed the postponement.

Mr. SAUNDERS moved for the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The Chair pronounced this motion out of order.

Mr. SAUNDERS then, at the suggestion of Mr. RANDOLPH, moved that the third reading take place on the 4th of July next.

Mr. WRIGHT made some observations in explanation of the actual state of the question, in regard to the bill.

An unsuccessful motion was made to adjourn.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, moved that the bill be laid on the table.

The Chair pronounced this motion to be out of order, as the bill itself was not, at the present moment, before the House, and the only question before the House being the fixing of the day for a third reading.

The question was then taken on the 4th day of July next, as the day for the third reading, by yeas and nays—yeas 68, nays 131, as follows:

Mr. RANDOLPH withdrew his motion for Monday, and the bill was then ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 15.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made a report on the petition of Dean Weymouth, accompanied with a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, accompanied with a report of the number of non-commissioned officers and privates of the marine corps in the service of the United States, and where stationed or performing duty; also, a report of the amount paid to the Lieutenant Colonel of the marine corps the past year, for his monthly pay and emoluments of office, prepared in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 12th April instant.—Laid on the table.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. FLOYD, respecting transportation of private property in national vessels, purchases of naval stores abroad, &c., was taken up and agreed to, nem. con.

On motion of Mr. CALL, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing a compensation to Joseph M. White and William Davidson, of Florida, for services rendered the United States, in the capacity of district attorney and marshal of the district of West Florida.

On motion of Mr. FRANCIS JOHNSON, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing Joseph Kingry, late a private in the service of the United States, on the pension roll.

The resolution laid upon the table yesterday, by Mr. HAMILTON, was taken up, read, and again laid upon the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act for the relief of Thaddeus Mayhew;" "An act for the relief of Ichabod Lord Skinner;" "An act to alter the times of holding the district court in the district of Missouri;" "An act for the relief of Hezekiah Langley and Benjamin M. Belt;" and "An act for the relief of Thomas Hewes; in which bills the Senate ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, called for the consideration of the resolution proposed by him for fixing a day for the adjournment of Congress; and, on his motion, the question of consideration of this proposition was taken by yeas and nays.—The vote stood as follows: For considering it, 100; against considering it, 100.

The House being equally divided on the question, the SPEAKER voted thereupon in the negative.

So the House refused now to consider the said resolution.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved—and there was no occasion, he presumed, for him to indicate the grounds of that motion—that when the House adjourns, it shall adjourn to meet on Saturday next. On this question Mr. TOD asked for the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them. The question was then taken on Mr. RANDOLPH's motion, and decided in the negative, without a division.

OCCUPATION OF COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. FLOYD, from the committee appointed on the 29th of December last, to inquire into the expediency of occupying the mouth of the Oregon or Columbia river; made a report thereon, which was read, and laid on the table. The report is as follows:

The committee to which was referred the resolution of the 29th day of December last, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of occupying the mouth of the Oregon or Columbia river, have had the same under consideration, and ask leave further to report: That they have considered the subject referred to them, and are persuaded, that, both in a military and commercial point of view, the occupation of that Territory is of great importance to the Republic; but, as much has been submitted to the House on these points, by former committees, they have now deemed it necessary only to present a view of the difficulties which would probably present themselves in accomplishing that object, and the manner in which they can be overcome.

To obtain information, a letter to this end was addressed to an officer of the Army, whose integrity in the public service is well known to the House, and whose military knowledge is entitled to the highest respect; that officer, Brigadier General Thomas S. Jesup, answered so satisfactorily to the committee, that they have presented the answer, in its entire form, to the House, and adopt it as a part of this report.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 26, 1824.

SIR: In reply to your letter, dated the 30th ultimo, requesting me to communicate "any facts, views, or opinions, which may have presented themselves to me, relative to the probable difficulty of making an establishment at the mouth of Columbia river, and the military advantages of that establishment," I have the honor to remark, that, ever since my attention was first directed to the subject, I have considered the possession and military command of the Columbia necessary not only to the protection of the trade, but to the security of our Western frontier. That flank of our country, extending from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, is every where in contact with numerous, powerful, and warlike Indian nations; who, altogether, might be able to bring into the field, from twenty to thirty thousand warriors. Most of those nations communicate, either with the British to the North and West, or the Spaniards to the South. In the event of war, that force, with a few hundred foreign troops, or under the influence of foreign companies, might be made more formidable to us than any force which Europe combined could oppose to us. On the other hand, if such measures be adopted as to secure a proper influence over them, and, in the event of war, to command their co-operation, they, with the aid of a few small garrisons, would not only afford ample protection for that entire line, but would become the scourge of our enemies.

The dangers to be apprehended, can only be averted by proper military establishments; and whether the post at the mouth of Columbia be intended to secure our territory, protect our traders, or to cut off all communication between the Indians and foreigners, I should consider a line of posts extending from the Council Bluffs entirely across the continent necessary. Those posts should be situated, as well with a view to command the avenues through which the Indians pass from the north to the south, as to keep open communication with the establishment at the mouth of the Columbia.

A post should be established at the Mandan villages, because, there the Missouri approaches within a short distance of the British territory, and it would have the effect of holding in check the Hudson's Bay and Northwest Companies, and controlling the Rickarees, Mandans, Minnatarees, Assiniboin, and other Indians, who either reside or range on the territory east, north, and west of that point.

A post at, or near, the head of navigation on the Missouri, would control the Blackfoot Indians, protect our traders, enable us to remove those of the British companies from our territory, and serve as a depot, at which detachments moved towards the Columbia might either be supplied, or leave such stores as they should find it difficult to carry with them through the mountains. It might also be made a depot of trade, and of the Indian Department.

To keep open the communication through the mountains, there should be at least one small post at some convenient point between the Missouri and the Columbia, and on the latter river and its tributaries, there should be at least three posts. They would afford present protection to our traders, and, on the expiration of the privilege granted to British subjects to trade on the waters of the Columbia, would enable us to remove them from our territory, and to secure the whole to our own citizens. They would also enable us to preserve peace among the Indians, and, in the event of foreign war, to command their neutrality or their assistance, as we might think most advisable.

The posts designated, might be established and maintained, at an additional annual expense not exceeding forty thousand dollars.

By extending to those posts the system of cultivation, now in operation at the Council Bluffs, the expense of supplying them would, in a few years, be greatly diminished. Mills might be erected at all the posts at a trifling expense, and, the whole country abounding in grass, all the domestic animals necessary, either for labor or subsistence, might be supported. This would render the establishment more secure, and, consequently, more formidable to the Indian nations in their vicinity.

As to the proposed posts on the Columbia, it is believed they might be supplied immediately at a low rate. Wheat may be obtained at New California, at about twenty-five cents per bushel, and beef cattle at three or four dollars each. Salt, in any quantity required, may be had at an island near the Peninsula of California. Should transportation not be readily obtained for those articles, vessels might be constructed by the troops.

To obtain the desired advantages, it is important, not only that we occupy the posts designated, but that we commence our operations without delay. The British companies are wealthy and powerful; their establishments extend from Hudson's Bay and Lake Superior to the Pacific; many of them within our territory. It is not to be supposed they would surrender those advantages without a struggle, and, though they should not engage in hostilities themselves, they might render all the Indians, in that extensive region, hostile.

The detachment intended to occupy the mouth of Columbia might leave the Council Bluffs in June, and one hundred and fifty men proceed with the boats and stores; and, as the country is open, and abounds with grass, the remaining fifty might proceed by land, with the horses intended for the transportation across the mountains, and might drive three or four hundred beaves to the Mandan villages or to the falls of Missouri; at one of those places the parties should unite and spend the winter. The latter would be preferable, because there they might be able to establish a friendly intercourse with the Blackfoot Indians, or, at all events, by impressing them with an idea of the power of the nation, restrain their depredations upon the neighboring tribes, and deter them from acts of outrage upon our traders. They might, also, during the winter, reconnoitre the several passes through the mountains, prepare provisions necessary to support them on the march, and down the Columbia; and, if authorized to do so, remove from our territories all British traders on the waters of the Missouri. They would necessarily remain at, or in the vicinity of, their wintering ground, until June, but might be occupied during the months of April and May, in opening a road to the mountains, and constructing bridges over the numerous streams on the route. This work performed, they might, in about twenty days, reach the navigable waters of Clark's river, a branch of the Columbia, and, in ten days more, prepare transportation to descend to their destination, where, after every necessary allowance for accidents and delays, they would certainly arrive by the month of August.

The vessels employed to transport the stores by sea, might leave the United States in the month of November, and would arrive at the mouth of Columbia in April, at least four months before the detachment from the Council Bluffs could reach that point; and, unless the ships should be detained during that time, which could not be expected, the stores would be exposed to damage and depredation, and perhaps, by the time the troops should arrive, would be entirely destroyed. It would, therefore, seem to me a measure of prudence, that at least one company of artillery be transported with the stores. That description of force would be found necessary at the post, and the ships would afford them ample accommodation.

That the route from the Council Bluffs to the mouth of Columbia is practicable, has been proved by the enterprise of more than one of our citizens. It, no doubt, presents difficulties; but difficulties are not impossibilities. We have only to refer to the pages of our history to learn that many operations, infinitely more arduous, have been accomplished by Americans. The march of Arnold to Quebec, or of General Clark to Vincennes, during the Revolutionary war, exceeded greatly in fatigue, privation, difficulty, and danger, the proposed operation; and I believe I may say, without fear of contradiction, that the detachment might be supplied, during the whole route, with less difficulty than in the war of 1756 was experienced in supplying the forces operating under General Washington, and General Braddock, against the French and Indians, on the Ohio.

A post at the mouth of Columbia is important, not only in relation to the interior trade, and the military defence of the western section of the Union, but, also, in relation to the naval power of the nation. Naval power consists, not in ships, but in seamen; and, to be efficient, the force must always be available. The northwest coast of America is an admirable nursery for seamen—many of our best sailors are formed there; without a naval station, however, on the Pacific, the force employed in the whale fishery, as well as in sealing, and the northwest trade, would, in the event of war, with a great maritime Power, be, in some measure, lost to the nation. But, that establishment made, it would afford a secure retreat to all our ships and seamen in that section of the globe; and the force, thus concentrated, might be used with effect against the trade, if not the fleets or possessions of the enemy, in place of being driven to the Atlantic, or perhaps captured on their way.

The establishment might be considered as a great bastion, commanding the whole line of coast to the North and South; and it would have the same influence on that line which the bastions of a work have on its curtains; for the principles of defence are the same, whether applied to a small fortress, or to a line of frontier, or even an entire section of the globe. In the one case, the missiles used are bullets and cannon shot; in the other, ships and fleets.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

TH. S. JESUP.

Hon. J. FLOYD, House of Representatives.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS IN GEORGIA.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the select committee to which was referred the President's Message of the 30th of March, 1824, relating to the execution of so much of the compact of 1802 between the United States and the State of Georgia, as relates to the extinguishment of the Indian title to lands within that State; also, a memorial of the Legislature of the said State; made a report thereon; which was read, as follows:

The select committee, to whom was referred the President's Message, of the 30th of March, with the documents accompanying it, relating to the compact of 1802, between the United States and the State of Georgia, submit to the House, on that Message, and on the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, also referred to them, the following report:

The State of Georgia claimed, on the establishment of the independence of the United States, all the lands now forming the States of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, with the exception of those portions of the two last States which formed a part of Florida and Louisiana.

This claim was founded upon the charter of incorporation of the proprietary government; on the Royal commissions issued to the Governors of the State, after the proprietors had surrendered their charter to the Crown. The claim was disputed by South Carolina and by the United States. The conflicting claims of South Carolina and Georgia were adjusted by a convention between them, in 1787. The United States recognised, by the treaty with Spain of the year 1795, the claim of Georgia, having refused, in 1788, a cession from the State, on account of the remoteness of the lands, and of the terms proposed by Georgia.

In April, 1798, Congress passed a law in relation to the western part of the territory of Georgia, with a reservation of the rights of Georgia to the jurisdiction and soil.

In May, 1800, another act was passed, containing a similar reservation.

In December, 1800, Georgia remonstrated against these acts, as a violation of her right of sovereignty and soil. The compact of 1802 put an end to the disputes which were likely to arise out of this collision between the General and State Governments. By this compact, the United States obtained a surrender of the right of Georgia to the sovereignty and soil of two States, containing, by estimate, eighty-six millions of acres of land, for the paltry consideration of the payment of $1,280,000 out of the proceeds of that land, and of a promise to extinguish the Indian title to the land within the territorial limits not ceded to the United States, as soon as it could be done peaceably, and on reasonable terms. The execution of this compact produced no change in the right of Georgia to the sovereignty and soil of the land within her newly defined boundaries. Its only effect was to throw upon the United States the expense which might attend the extinguishment of the Indian title, an expense which, but for this compact, must have been borne by the State. Nor did this compact, in the slightest circumstance, add to the title of the Indians; it recognised only the claim which they, as Indians, were allowed to have, according to the usages of the States, and the liberal policy adopted towards them by the General Government.

In relation to the Cherokees, the principal topic of the President's Message, it would appear that new doctrines are permitted to be entertained of them, in the opinion of the committee neither consistent with the opinions heretofore entertained, with the practices of the Government, nor with the interests of the Union. The Cherokees claim to be an independent tribe. The President avows the belief that the articles of cession of 1802 is a full proof that the Indians had a right to the territory, in the disposal of which they were to be regarded as free agents.

The acts of the General Government, in 1814, in relation to the Creeks; the language of the President of the United States, in 1817; the language of the Secretary of War, in 1818; of the agent of the Government in that year, in treating with the Cherokees; of the agent treating with them in 1823, does not correspond with the opinions now expressed.

In 1814, General Jackson, acting under the authority of the Government, took from the Creek Indians, for an equivalent named by himself, all the land the United States chose to require, to effect a great object of national policy in regard to the Indian tribes. It cannot be alleged that this was done by virtue of conquest. The letter of the late Indian agent, Colonel Hawkins, of the 11th of August, 1815, laid before the House of Representatives on the 5th of April, 1824, shows that nearly eight millions of acres were taken from the friendly Indians, (our allies in the war,) over and above all the hunting grounds of the upper friendly Creeks, for what was called an equivalent, but which the Indians did not deem such.

In 1817, in his Message at the opening of Congress, the President says, "the hunter state can exist only in the vast uncultivated desert. It yields to the more dense and compact form, and greater force of civilized population; and, of right, it ought to yield, for the earth was given to mankind to support the greatest number of which it was capable, and no tribe or people have a right to withhold, from the wants of others, more than is necessary for their own support and comfort."

In a letter of the 29th July, 1818, the Secretary of War says to Mr. McMinn, speaking of the attempts to prevent the Cherokees from going to Arkansas, "the United States will not permit the treaty to be defeated by such means. Those who choose to remain are permitted to do so in quiet—those who choose to emigrate, must be equally free." And further: "It is vain for the Cherokees to hold the high tone which they do, as to their independence as a nation, for daily proof is exhibited that, were it not for the protecting arm of the United States, they would become the victims of fraud and violence." Mr. McMinn tells the Cherokees, in conformity with this declaration, in his talk to the chiefs, of the 23d of November, 1818, "It must surely be, my brothers, that you view me as an impostor, acting upon my own authority, with a view to deceive the nation, or that you flatter yourselves with the empty expectation that the United States cannot execute a measure of general defence for the safety of her citizens, which shall, in the slightest degree, affect your interest or your wishes." The agents of 1823 assert an unqualified right in the United States to take from the Indians any of their lands for public use. It is asserted, however, by the Secretary of War, that there were treaties existing with the Cherokees, in 1802, which guaranteed their lands. These guarantees were only of the Indian title, as understood by all at the date of the execution of these treaties—a title of mere occupancy, for the purposes of hunting.

The idea of title to the soil was, until lately, unknown to the Indians. Their lands were overrun by them, not inhabited; their rights not transferred, but extinguished, dependent upon the will of the power to whom the sovereignty over them belongs. This sovereign power was Georgia, prior to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. That Constitution gave to the United States the authority to manage the affairs of the Indians, for the peace of the Union, and the eventual benefit of Georgia. The Indians had mere occupation; the United States were the agents of Georgia for the extinguishment of this allowed possession. The compact of 1802, required this to be effected out of the general fund. No act of the United States, nor of the Indians, nor of both, could, without her consent, impair the rights of Georgia to the jurisdiction and soil of the territory in question, whenever the Indians should be removed from it, by accident, by contract, or by force. This doctrine is confirmed by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which has declared sales made by States, of Indian territory, valid, prior to the extinguishment of Indian title: That there is a species of seizin in fee, which enables a State to grant to individuals. In fact, the compact of 1802 is the acknowledgment of the United States of this doctrine, as their only title to the soil of Alabama and Mississippi is founded upon it. The Secretary of War, in his attention to the treaties guarantying the Indian title, has entirely omitted to notice the first and most important document in relation to this subject, the Treaty of Hopewell, of 1785—a document sustaining the opinion of the committee, and giving to it, what is now deemed important, the sanction of Indian acquiescence. The fourth article of the Treaty of Hopewell, is, "the boundary allotted to the Cherokees for their hunting grounds, is, and shall be, the following:" The Indians acknowledge, by that treaty, the United States as their sovereign; and, by the 9th article, Congress assumes, for the interest and comfort of the Indians, the power to regulate their trade, and manage all their affairs as they may deem proper. This treaty existed at the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and Georgia, as a member of the Union, was vested with the sovereignty and soil of the Cherokee lands, subject only to the Indian right of hunting within the allotted limits, which right, the General Government was bound to extinguish as early as the general convenience would permit.

The duty of the General Government was to do all acts which would accelerate this event; to refrain from all acts which would retard it. Over the territories of the United States, the General Government could rightfully exercise unlimited power, in relation to the Indian tribes. Within a particular State, the sole power was that of agency, for the preservation of peace, the regulation of trade, and the extinguishment of title. To this general obligation, imposed by the Constitution on all the States, a special promise was added in favor of Georgia, in 1802; partially executed; but, to the complete execution of which, difficulties are alleged to exist, which require the interposition of the power of Congress.

How far this promise has been complied with, is attempted to be shown, by two documents, marked A and B, sent to Congress by the President. By the document A, it appears that the Indian title to 15,744,000 acres has been extinguished; and that there remains 10,240,000 acres yet in their possession, as hunting grounds. The first quantity is alleged to be all that could be peaceably obtained on reasonable terms.

The document No. 1, accompanying this report, will show that, since 1802, the United States have been able to obtain, for their own use, more than 30,000,000 of acres in Alabama and Mississippi, in addition to 7,633,400 obtained in 1801; to 5,006,880 obtained for Tennessee, by treaty, from the Chickasaw Indians, subsequently confirmed by a treaty with the Cherokees; 700,000 for North Carolina; and a quantity, an estimate of which is not in the hands of the committee, for South Carolina. No satisfactory explanation is afforded to show how this difference in the quantity of lands procured by the United States, for their own account, and in compliance with their promise to Georgia, has occurred.

The document B is intended to show the expense incurred in the execution of the compact of 1802. It is defective and delusive. It contains no credit for the money received at the treasury of Georgia, viz: the Yazoo fund, $184,515 94. It is omitted to be stated that the $1,250,000 was paid out of the proceeds of the property acquired. It charges the Yazoo compromise as a benefit to Georgia, who had no interest in the settlement but a common interest with the other States. The land procured for the Cherokees, on the Arkansas, is charged at the minimum value of lands surveyed and offered for sale by the United States, and not at its trifling actual cost, about twenty-five thousand dollars.

The committee are at a loss to know what bearing this defective document has on the question of the Cherokee lands. As, however, they presume it has a relation not well understood, they conceive it proper to show, by the statement No. 2, what pecuniary advantages have accrued, and will accrue, to the United States, under the compact with Georgia. By this statement, it appears that $4,512,850 23, exclusive of Mississippi stock, have been received into the public Treasury; that $6,444,821 51 are due from sales made; that the land ceded by the Indians, and not yet sold, is 27,588 800 acres, which, at the minimum price, is $34,486,000. That there remains yet, as hunting grounds for the Indians, 22,977,576 acres.

The balance of profit is sufficiently with the United States to justify contracts for the extinguishment of Indian title for the benefit of Georgia, without great scrutiny as to the amount of expense incurred. The committee agree with the Secretary of War, "that no opportunity of extinguishing the Indian title, on reasonable terms, has been neglected by the General Government," for its own use; but they do not perceive that the same zeal has been successfully exerted for the State of Georgia. The treaty of 1814, with the Creeks, was dictated by General Jackson to the Creeks, by order of the Department of War. As has been already seen, a large territory was taken from the Creeks.

The policy of the United States, as explained by the Secretary, required a separation of the tribes of Indians from each other, and from the ocean. To this policy a compliance with the promise to Georgia was sacrificed. It is alleged that the obligation to Georgia extends only to the purchase of lands, &c. The term purchase is an interpolation; it is not found in the articles of cession of 1802. It is alleged, also, that this land was obtained by conquest, and therefore the nation was at liberty, laying the contract with Georgia out of view, to pursue its plan of policy. Without entering into any considerations to show that the United States, having obtained, by force not used for that purpose, but defensively, the opportunity to extinguish the Indian title within the limits of Georgia, was bound, in good faith, to use it, it is deemed sufficient to refer the House to the facts, disclosed by the extract from Colonel Hawkins's letter, already quoted, that this acquisition by conquest was an acquisition of lands from friends and allies, for an equivalent named by the United States.

The propriety of accommodating the State of Georgia was suggested to the commissioner of the United States by the Indian agent; but the answer was, that the instructions of the Government would not permit a compliance with this suggestion. The committee are of opinion that an acquisition of land to Georgia, to any extent, could have been obtained from the Creeks in 1814. The attention of Congress has been called to the arrangements made with the Cherokees in 1817 and 1819. The arrangement of 1817 was for the purpose of carrying into effect the wishes of the Cherokees, as declared to Mr. Jefferson in 1808, by a deputation from the upper and lower towns. According to the preamble of the arrangement of 1817, the upper towns desired to remain fixed above the Hiwassee river, to contract their society within narrow limits, and begin the establishment of fixed laws and a regular government. The lower towns desired to continue the hunter life, and for that purpose wished to remove across the Mississippi. The wishes of the upper and lower towns were granted, and arrangements made for the removal of the latter across the Mississippi. No line was drawn between the upper and lower towns, although a request was made of the Indians that it should be done by the United States. The arrangement of 1817 provides for the fulfilment of the wishes expressed in 1808, and the promises of the Government of 1809. The wishes of the lower towns was a removal beyond the Mississippi, of the upper, a contraction of their society within narrower limits. By the 3d and 4th articles, it was agreed that a census should be taken of the population beyond the Mississippi, and of those who chose to emigrate thither; and a census of those who chose to remain in their present location. The territory occupied by them on this side of the Mississippi was to be divided according to the relative numbers of those who had migrated, and would migrate, to the remainder; and that portion which fell to the migrators was to be received by the United States in place of the lands furnished to the Cherokees beyond the Mississippi. From this plan, the extinguishment of the title of the Cherokee Indians was anticipated, and would have taken place had it been executed in its spirit by the General Government. It appears, however, that the census was never taken, and that, in 1819, a deputation of Cherokees was permitted to come to Washington to adjust, finally, the difficulties arising out of the treaty of 1817. The lower Cherokee towns, in the limits of Georgia, did not remove beyond the Mississippi. Most of the removals took place from the upper towns, out of the limits of Georgia. In place of the proportion of lands to be abandoned, according to the treaty of 1817, a fixed quantity was accepted, a very small and worthless part of which is in Georgia.

It is alleged by the Secretary of War that the desire of Government was, to have a cession in such form as would separate the Creeks and Cherokees; but that it was found impossible to induce the Cherokees to yield to that proposition, or to any other more favorable to Georgia, than that which was adopted. He does not, however, state that any other was made, with a view to comply with the compact of 1802. The proposition made for the separation of the Creeks and Cherokees, was not for the benefit of Georgia, had it been acceded to, although the interests of the State would have been more advanced than by the actual arrangement; yet, even in that case, the United States would have sacrificed the obligations of the compact to the policy of separating the Indian tribes, and to the consequent acquisition of lands for their own use in the State of Alabama. The committee cannot understand why a cession of the whole quantity of land in Georgia could not have been obtained. The obligation of the Indians was simple—a line, a boundary—and the United States had only to insist upon fixing that boundary, according to the preamble of the arrangement of 1817. The Secretary of War, however, states that the Indians will not yield, and it seems that the United States did yield. It is obvious to the committee that the interest of Georgia was considered a mere secondary object, from the terms of the arrangement of 1819. The preamble to that arrangement is a satisfactory evidence of the entire forgetfulness of the obligations of the compact of 1802.

The treaty is made in consequence of the earnest desire of a great part of the Cherokee nation to remain on this side of the Mississippi, to commence the measures necessary to the civilization and preservation of the nation. The committee are surprised that the occasion was not taken to satisfy the Indians that their continuance in Georgia was impossible, unless Georgia consented to it, and still more so, that the Indians should be encouraged, by this preamble of a treaty, made at the Seat of Government, under the eyes of the President, to entertain that expectation. The treaty of 1817, and that of 1819, show a strange forgetfulness of the limited extent of the power of the United States over the land in question. The Secretary of War, acting under the direction of the Executive Magistrate, and pursuing the example set in 1817, seems to have imagined that the United States and the Indians could do, lawfully, whatever suited their mutual convenience, without regard to the State of Georgia; an error which had been previously committed in treaties with the Creeks. No difference was made between Indian lands within the limits of the State claiming the eventual jurisdiction and soil, and the Indian lands where the soil is the property of the United States. Provisions are made, in both treaties, for vesting individuals with fee simple titles to land, and to convert them, by a short process, into citizens. The right of the United States to do either is absolutely denied by the committee. The General Government can take the property of individuals for public use, but the Constitution withholds the power even to prejudice the claims of any State. Congress can establish a uniform rule of naturalization; the Executive Magistrate cannot make, by an Indian treaty, special exceptions to the established rule. The effect of such acts on the part of the General Government was to be anticipated. The Indians were taught the value of separate property, and the advantages to be obtained by a continuance in their present position. The General Government authorized, also, the establishment of missionaries among the Cherokees, to instruct their children, and to give them a taste for the cultivation of the soil. The committee are not informed that the influence acquired by these missionaries has been exerted to induce the Indians to seek a residence beyond the Mississippi, nor are they informed that the Government has ever thought it necessary to impose upon them such a task. The committee are not to be understood as expressing any disapprobation of the policy of the United States for the civilization of the Indian tribes; they confine themselves to the policy, as it has affected the performance of the promises of the United States, under the compact of 1802. As it relates to that compact, they express their decided conviction that the attempts which have been made to civilize, and permanently fix, the Cherokees in Georgia, is in direct violation of the promise to extinguish their title, as soon as it could be done peaceably, and on reasonable terms; nor do the committee perceive the necessity of holding out the idea of permanent settlement in Georgia, as a prelude to the establishment of a regular government for the Indians. As it regards expense, it would certainly be, for the United States, the cheapest mode of effecting this object, as the cost would be paid by Georgia, and the United States would be saved from the onerous obligation of removing the Indians for the benefit of that State; a saving of expense which, however, the United States will not desire, as it involves a breach of their faith.

From the circumstances thus detailed, the House will not be surprised at the present pretensions of the Cherokees, to be regarded as independent, or their declarations, that they will neither sell nor quit the lands occupied by them. Some surprise cannot but be felt at the acquiescence of the United States in the substitution of diplomatic correspondence for Indian talks, and at the manner in which the subject of the Cherokees is presented to Congress. The Legislature of Georgia, at their last session, sent to the Chief Magistrate a memorial on the subject of the compact of 1802. The President of the United States has not laid that memorial before Congress, but has preferred to present to the Legislative body a correspondence of the Secretary of War with certain Cherokee chiefs, which begins, on their part, by a declaration that they would sell no more land; contains a request that no more appropriations should be made for that purpose; and a suggestion that the United States should, in some other way, satisfy Georgia, as, by a cession in Florida. To the formal answer of the Secretary of War, a rejoinder is given, and, on this rejoinder, Congress are informed that its power must be exerted, as it is obvious that the Executive can do nothing further without the intervention of Congress. The President has given his opinion, that the use of force would be unjust, and that without force nothing can be done. What should be done by Congress, is a subject of the most serious and important concern. The parties to the compact of 1802 anticipated the extinguishment of the Indian title to all the lands in Georgia. The United States agreed to extinguish it, as soon as it could be done peaceably, and on reasonable terms. The compact imposed upon the General Government the obligation to use all the means necessary to accomplish the end in view. It was especially their duty to refrain from doing any thing calculated even to retard, much less to render impracticable, the attainment of that end. If the committee have not deceived themselves, it must be apparent, that the United States have omitted to embrace two occasions, when a fuller performance of the conditions of the compact was in their power. It is equally apparent that the United States have not only omitted to express constantly, and with firmness, to the Cherokees, the necessity of their ultimate removal from Georgia, but have held out to them the idea of a permanent residence, as citizens, in that State; have taught them the value of their position, and intimated, that it depended upon themselves, to remain or to remove; have attempted to vest, in individuals, a permanent property in the soil. From these causes, every day increasing in their effect upon the inclination of the Cherokees, have arisen the determination of the Cherokees, as made known to the President. It is the policy of the United States which has created the difficulties; if peaceable acquisition is impossible, that impossibility is the work of the General Government.

In this state of things, encountering contradictory obligations, the course for the Government is plain and obvious. Justice should be done to Georgia. The Indian claim should be extinguished, even should force be required for that purpose; or the consent of the State must be obtained to some arrangement, which will free the United States from the embarrassments arising from its regard to the unhappy condition of the Indians, from a respect to the expectations they have erroneously permitted this tribe to entertain, and from their formal and solemn obligation to a member of the Union.

The committee do not, however, believe that any serious difficulty now exists, to the peaceable extinguishment of the Indian title, on reasonable terms. An order from the General Government for their removal, would be cheerfully acquiesced in, if accompanied by the necessary preparation for the prosperity of the tribe, and a just equivalent for the temporary inconveniences they might suffer. The committee agree with the President, that it would promote essentially the security and happiness of the tribes of Indians, if they could be prevailed on to retire beyond the limits of the States; but, they cannot see the injustice of any measure, short of actual hostility, which would essentially promote the security and happiness of the Cherokees. There is another consideration which should be brought into view; the only plausible objections to the proposed order, is its injustice, and inhumanity, to the Indians. That it is just to promote their essential security and happiness, even by means not agreeable to their wishes, cannot be denied; that it is humane to preserve them from dangers, to which they will be exposed, by an obstinate adherence to their own opinions, is equally true. Their present position is incompatible with the claims of the State of Georgia; the knowledge of the fact, that the United States will not, in consequence of the perverseness of the Cherokees, comply with the obligations of the compact of 1802, will necessarily produce irritations and resentments, the consequences of which may be easily foreseen. The United States may be under the fatal necessity of seeing the Cherokees annihilated, or of defending them against their own citizens. The committee offer to the House the following resolutions, under a full conviction that the adoption of them will not be followed by any consequences injurious to the Cherokee tribe, or to the character of the General Government for justice and humanity.

Resolved, That the United States are bound, by their obligations to Georgia, to take, immediately, the necessary measures for the removal of the Cherokee Indians beyond the limits of that State.

Resolved, That such an arrangement with the State of Georgia should be made, as may lead to the final adjustment of the claims of that State, under the compact of 1802, with the least possible inconvenience to the Cherokee and Creek Indians, within the boundary of the State.

Resolved, That the sum of — dollars should be appropriated for the purposes expressed in the above resolutions.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to refer the report to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

To this reference, Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, objected, as giving to this subject an undue preference over other business earlier introduced into the House.

In reply to this objection, Mr. FORSYTH said, among other things, that, if gentlemen had examined the documents connected with this report, they would have seen, that a state of irritation exists, which requires to be allayed, or it would require something stronger than resolutions of this House to allay it.

Mr. LITTLE supported the reference to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as being most proper for a subject which might be considered as of national magnitude, &c.

Mr. ALLEN said his reason for objecting to this reference was, that he was unwilling that the claims of individuals, which have been long pending in this House, and were now in an advanced stage, should be postponed in order to take up a claim which has been but recently introduced into the House, and on which, until this morning, a report had not been made. The present session, he thought, was now too far advanced to go into an investigation of this new matter.

The question was then taken on Mr. FORSYTH's motion for a reference, and decided in the affirmative—52 votes to 75.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The engrossed bill to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports and tonnage, was then read a third time; and the question being stated, "Shall this bill pass?"

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, addressed the Chair. I am, said he, practising no deception upon myself, much less upon the House, when I say that, if I had consulted my own feelings and inclinations, I should not have troubled the House, exhausted as it is, and as I am, with any further remarks upon this subject. I come to the discharge of this task, not merely with reluctance, but with disgust; jaded, worn down, abraded, I may say, as I am by long attendance upon this body, and continued stretch of the attention upon this subject. I come to it, however, at the suggestion, and in pursuance of the wishes of those whose wishes are for me in all matters touching my public duty, paramount law; I speak with those reservations, of course, which every moral agent must be supposed to make to himself.

It was not more to his surprise than to his disappointment, Mr. R. said, that, on his return to the House, after a necessary absence of a few days, on indispensable business, he found it engaged in discussing the general principle of the bill, when its details were under consideration. If he had expected such a turn in the debate he would, at any private sacrifice, however great, have remained a spectator and auditor of that discussion. With the exception of the speech, already published, of his worthy colleague on his right, (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR,) Mr. R. said, he was nearly deprived of the benefit of the discussion which had taken place. Many weeks had been occupied with this bill (he hoped the House would pardon him for saying so) before he took the slightest part in the deliberations on the details, and he now sincerely regretted that he had not had firmness enough to adhere to the resolution which he had laid down to himself in the early stage of the debate, not to take any part in the discussion of the details of the measure.* But, as he trusted, what he now had to say upon this subject, although more and better things had been said by others, might not be the same that they had said, or might not be said in the same manner, he here borrowed the language of a man who had heretofore been conspicuous in the councils of the country; of one who was unrivalled for readiness and dexterity in debate; who was long without an equal on the floor of this body; who had contributed as much to the revolution of 1801 as any man in this nation,† and had derived as little benefit from it; as, to use the words of that celebrated man, what he had to say was not that which had been said by others, and would not be said in their manner, the House would, he trusted, have patience with him during the short time that his strength would allow him to occupy their attention. And he begged them to understand, that the notes which he held in his hands were not notes on which he meant to speak, but of what others had spoken, and from which he would make the smallest selection in his power.

Here permit me to say, observed Mr. R., that I am obliged, and with great reluctance, to differ from my worthy colleague, who has taken so conspicuous a part in this debate, about one fact, which I will call to his recollection, for I am sure it was in his memory, though sleeping. He has undertaken to state the causes by which the difference in the relative condition of various parts of the Union has been produced; but my worthy colleague has omitted to state the primum mobile of the commerce and manufactures to which a portion of the country I need not name owes its present prosperity and wealth. That primum mobile was Southern capital. I speak now not of transactions quorum pars minima fui, but of things of which, nevertheless, I have a contemporaneous recollection. I say, without the fear of contradiction, then, that, in consequence of the enormous depreciation of the evidences of the public debt of this country—the debt proper of the United States (to which must be added an item of not less than twenty millions of dollars, for the State debts assumed by the United States) being bought up and almost engrossed by the people of what were then called the Northern States—a measure which nobody dreamt any thing about, or which nobody had the slightest suspicion—I mean the assumption of the State debts by the Federal Government; these debts being bought up for a mere song, a capital of eighty millions of dollars, or, in other words, a credit to that amount, bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, (with the exception of nineteen millions, the interest of that debt, which bore an interest of three per cent.,) (see note 2, Appendix)—a capital of eighty millions of dollars was poured, in a single day, into the coffers of the North; and to that cause we may mainly ascribe the difference so disastrous to the South, between that country and the other portion of this Union, to which I have alluded. When we, said Mr. R., roused by the sufferings of our brethren of Boston, entered into the contest with the mother country, and when we came out of it—when this Constitution was adopted, we were comparatively rich—they were positively poor. What is now our relative situation? They are flourishing and rich; we are tributary to them, not only through the medium of the public debt of which I have spoken, but also through the medium of the pension list, nearly the whole amount of which is disbursed in the Eastern States; and to this creation of a day is to be ascribed the difference of our relative situation, (I hope my worthy colleague will not consider any thing that I say as conflicting with his general principles, to which I heartily subscribe.) (Note 3, of Appendix.) Yes, sir, and the price paid for the creation of all that portion of this capital, which consisted of the assumed debts of the States, was the immense boon of fixing the Seat of Government where it now is. And I advert to this bargain, because I wish to show to every member of this House, and, if it were possible, to every individual of this nation, the most tremendous and calamitous results of political bargaining.

*By so doing, many of Mr. R.'s strongest objections to the bill were in a manner dissipated, there being no report of these skirmishes. Some of them, with which he thought it indecent again to trouble the House, will be found (substantially) appended to this speech. †See note 1, Appendix.

Sir, when are we to have enough of this Tariff question? In 1816 it was supposed to be settled. Only three years thereafter, another proposition for increasing it was sent from this House to the Senate, baited with a tax of four cents per pound on brown sugar. It was, fortunately, rejected in that body. In what manner this bill is baited it does not become me to say; but I have too distinct a recollection of the vote in Committee of the Whole, on the duty upon molasses, and afterwards of the vote in the House on the same question; of the votes of more than one of the States on that question, not to mark it well. I do not say that the change of the vote on that question was effected by any man's voting against his own motion, but I do not hesitate to say that it was effected by one man's electioneering against his own motion. I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, that old Massachusetts Bay, and the Province of Maine and Sagadahock, by whom we stood in the days of the Revolution, now stand by the South, and will not aid in fixing on us this system of taxation, compared with which the taxation of Mr. Grenville and Lord North was as nothing. I speak with knowledge of what I say, when I declare, that this bill is an attempt to reduce the country South of Mason and Dixon's line, and East of the Allegany mountains, to a state of worse than colonial bondage; a state to which the domination of Great Britain was, in my judgment, far preferable; and I trust I shall always have the fearless integrity to utter any political sentiment which the head sanctions and the heart ratifies; for the British Parliament never would have dared to lay such duties on our imports, or their exports to us, either "at home" or here, as is now proposed to be laid upon the imports from abroad. At that time we had the command of the market of the vast dominions then subject, and we should have had those which have since been subjected to the British empire; we enjoyed a free trade, eminently superior to any thing we can enjoy if this bill shall go into operation. It is a sacrifice of the interests of a part of this nation to the ideal benefit of the rest. It marks us out as the victims of a worse than Egyptian bondage. It is a barter of so much of our rights, of so much of the fruits of our labor, for political power to be transferred to other hands. It ought to be met, and I trust it will be met, in the southern country, as was the Stamp act, and by all those measures, which I will not detain the House by recapitulating, which succeeded the Stamp act, and produced the final breach with the mother country, which it took about ten years to bring about; as I trust in my conscience, it will not take as long to bring about similar results from this measure, should it become a law.

All policy is very suspicious, says an eminent statesman, that sacrifices the interest of any part of the community to the ideal good of the whole; and those governments only are tolerable where, by the necessary construction of the political machine, the interest of all the parts are obliged to be protected by it. Here is a district of country extending from the Patapsco to the Gulf of Mexico, from the Allegany to the Atlantic, a district which, taking in all that part of Maryland lying south of the Patapsco and east of Elk river, raises five-sixths of all the exports of this country that are of home growth—I have in my hand the official statements, which prove it, but which I will not weary the House by reading, (see Appendix, note 4,)—in all this country. Yes, sir, and I bless God for it; for, with all the fantastic and preposterous theories about the rights of man, (the theories, not the rights themselves, I speak of,) there is nothing but power that can restrain power—I bless God that, in this insulted, oppressed, and outraged region, we are, as to our counsels in regard to this measure, but as one man; that there exists on the subject but one feeling and one interest. We are proscribed, and put to the ban; and if we do not feel, and feeling do not act, we are bastards to those fathers who achieved the Revolution; then shall we deserve to make our bricks without straw. There is no case on record in which a proposition like this, suddenly changing the whole frame of a country's polity, tearing asunder every ligature of the body politic, was ever carried by a lean majority of two or three votes, unless it be the usurpation of the Septennial act, which passed the British Parliament by, I think, a majority of one vote, the same that laid the tax on cotton bagging. I do not stop here, sir, to argue about the constitutionality of this bill; I consider the Constitution a dead letter; I consider it to consist, at this time, of the power of the General Government and the power of the States—that is the Constitution. You may intrench yourself in parchment to the teeth, says Lord Chatham, the sword will find its way to the vitals of the Constitution. I have no faith in parchment, sir; I have no faith in the abracadabra of the Constitution; I have no faith in it. I have faith in the power of that Commonwealth, of which I am an unworthy son; in the power of those Carolinas, and of that Georgia, in her ancient and utmost extent, to the Mississippi, which went with us through the valley of the shadow of death, in the war of our independence. I have said that I shall not stop to discuss the constitutionality of this question, for that reason, and for a better; that there never was a constitution under the sun, in which, by an unwise exercise of the powers of the government, the people may not be driven to the extremity of resistance by force. "For it is not, perhaps, so much by the assumption of unlawful powers, as by the 'unwise or unwarrantable use of those which are most legal, that governments oppose their true end and object; for there is such a thing as tyranny as well as usurpation.'" If, under a power to regulate trade, you prevent exportation; if, with the most approved spring lancets, you draw the last drop of blood from our veins; if, secundum artem, you draw the last shilling from our pockets, what are the checks of the Constitution to us? A fig for the Constitution! When the scorpion's sting is probing us to the quick, shall we stop to chop logic? Shall we get some learned and cunning clerk to say whether the power to do this is to be found in the Constitution, and then, if he, from whatever motive, shall maintain the affirmative, like the animal whose fleece forms so material a portion of this bill, quietly lie down and be shorn?

Sir, events now passing elsewhere, which plant a thorn in my pillow and a dagger in my heart, admonish me of the difficulty of governing with sobriety any people who are over head and ears in debt. That state of things begets a temper which sets at naught every thing like reason and common sense. This country is unquestionably laboring under great distress, but we cannot legislate it out of that distress. We may, by your legislation, reduce all the country south and east of Mason and Dixon's line, the whites as well as the blacks, to the condition of Helots—you can do no more. We have had placed before us, in the course of this discussion, foreign examples and authorities; and among other things, we have been told, as an argument in favor of this measure, of the prosperity of Great Britain. Have gentlemen taken into consideration the peculiar advantages of Great Britain? Have they taken into consideration that, not excepting Mexico, and that fine country which lies between the Orinoco and the Caribbean sea, England is decidedly superior in point of physical advantages to every country under the sun? This is unquestionably true. I will enumerate some of those advantages. First, there is her climate. In England, such is the temperature of the air, that a man can there do more days' work in the year, and more hours' work in the day, than in any other climate in the world; of course I include Scotland and Ireland in this description. It is in such a climate only, that the human animal can bear without extirpation the corrupted air, the noisome exhalations, the incessant labor of these accursed manufactories. Yes, sir, accursed; for I say it is an accursed thing, which I will neither taste, nor touch, nor handle. If we were to act here on the English system, we should have the yellow fever at Philadelphia, New York, &c., not in August merely, but from June to January, and from January to June. The climate of this country alone, were there no other natural obstacle to it, says aloud, you shall not manufacture! Even our tobacco factories, admitted to be the most wholesome of any sort of factories, are known to be, where extensive, the very nidus (if I may use the expression,) of yellow fever and other fevers of similar type. In another of the advantages of Great Britain, so important to her prosperity, we are almost on a par with her if we knew how properly to use it. Fortunatos nimium sua si bona norint—for, as regards defence, we are, to all intents and purposes, almost as much an island as England herself. But one of her insular advantages we can never acquire. Every part of that country is accessible from the sea. There, as you recede from the sea, you do not get further from the sea. I know that a great deal will be said of our majestic rivers, about the father of floods, and his tributary streams; but with the Ohio frozen up all the Winter, and dry all the Summer, with a long, tortuous, difficult, and dangerous navigation thence to the ocean, the gentlemen of the West may rest assured that they will never derive one particle of advantage, from even a total prohibition of foreign manufactures. You may succeed in reducing us to your own level of misery; but, if we were to agree to become your slaves, you never can derive one farthing of advantage from this bill. What parts of this country can derive any advantage from it? Those parts only, where there is a water power in immediate contact with navigation, such as the vicinities of Boston, Providence, Baltimore, Richmond, &c. Petersburg is the last of these as you travel south* You take a bag of cotton up the river to Pittsburg, or to Zanesville, to have it manufactured and sent down to New Orleans for a market, and before your bag of cotton has got to the place of manufacture, the manufacturer of Providence has received his returns for the goods made from his bag of cotton purchased at the same time that you purchased yours. No, sir; gentlemen may as well insist that because the Chesapeake bay, mare nostrum, our Mediterranean sea, gives us every advantage of navigation, we shall exclude from it every thing but steamboats and those boats called kat' exochen, per emphasin, par excellence, Kentucky boats—a sort of huge, square, clumsy wooden box. And why not insist upon it? Hav'nt you "the power to regulate commerce?" Would not that, too, be a "regulation of commerce?" It would, indeed, and a pretty regulation it is; and so is this bill. And, sir, I marvel that the representation from the great commercial State of New York should be in favor of this bill. If operative—and if inoperative why talk of it?—if operative, it must, like the embargo of 1807, '8, '9, transfer no small portion of the wealth of the London of America, as New York has been called, to Quebec and Montreal. She will receive the most of her imports from abroad, down the river. I do not know any bill that could be better calculated for Vermont than this bill; because, through Vermont, from Quebec, Montreal, and other positions on the St. Lawrence, we are, if it passes, unquestionably to receive our supplies of foreign goods. It will, no doubt, also, suit the Niagara frontier.

But, sir, I must not suffer myself to be led too far astray from the topic of the peculiar advantages of England as a manufacturing country. Her vast beds of coal are inexhaustible; there are daily discoveries of quantities of it, greater than ages past have yet consumed; to which beds of coal her manufacturing establishments have been transferred, as any man may see who will compare the present population of her towns with what it was formerly. It is to these beds of coal that Birmingham, Manchester, Wolverhampton, Sheffield, Leeds, and other manufacturing towns, owe their growth. If you could destroy her coal in one day, you would cut at once the sinews of her power. Then there are her metals, and particularly tin, of which she has the exclusive monopoly. Tin, I know, is to be found in Japan, and perhaps elsewhere, but, in practice, England has now the monopoly of that article. I might go further, said Mr. R., and I might say that England possesses an advantage, quo ad hoc, in her institutions; for there men are compelled to pay their debts. But, here, men are not only not compelled to pay their debts, but they are protected in the refusal to pay them, in the scandalous evasion of their legal obligations; and, after being convicted of embezzling the public money, and the money of others, of which they were the appointed guardians and trustees, they have the impudence to obtrude their unblushing fronts into society, and elbow honest men out of their way! There, though all men are on a footing of equality on the highway, and in the courts of law, at mill and at market, yet the castes in Hindostan are not more distinctly separated one from the other than the different classes of society are in England. It is true, that it is practicable for a wealthy merchant or a manufacturer, or his descendants, after having, through two or three generations, washed out what is considered the stain of their original occupation, to emerge, by slow degrees, into the higher ranks of society; but this rarely happens. Can you find men of vast fortune, in this country, content to move in the lower circles—content as the ox under the daily drudgery of the yoke? It is true that, in England, some of these wealthy people take it into their heads to buy seats in Parliament; but, when they get there, unless they possess great talents, they are mere nonentities; their existence is only to be found in the Red Book, which contains a list of the members of Parliament. Now, sir, I wish to know, if, in the Western country, where any man may get beastly drunk for three pence sterling—in England, you cannot get a small wineglass of spirits under twenty-five cents; one such drink of grog as I have seen swallowed in this country would there cost a dollar;—in the Western country, where every man can get as much meat and bread as he can consume, and yet spend the best part of his days, and nights too, perhaps, on the tavern benches, or loitering at the cross-roads asking the news,—can you expect the people of such a country, with countless millions of wild land and wild animals besides, can be cooped up in manufacturing establishments, and made to work sixteen hours a day, under the superintendence of a driver—yes, a driver, compared with whom a Southern overseer is a gentleman and man of refinement; for, if they do not work, (these work people in the manufactories,) they cannot eat; and, among all the punishments that can be devised, (put death, even, among the number,) I defy you to get as much work out of a man by any of them, as when he knows that he must work before he can eat.

But, sir, if we follow the example of England, in one respect, as we are invited to do, we must also follow it in another. If we adopt her policy, we must adopt her institutions also. Her policy is the result of her institutions, and our institutions must be, as the result of our policy, assimilated to her's. We cannot adopt such an exterior system as that of England, without adopting also her interior policy. We have heard of her wealth, her greatness, her glory; but her eulogist is silent about the poverty, wretchedness, misery, of the lowest orders. Show me the country, say gentlemen, which has risen to glory without this system of bounties and protection on manufactures! Sir, show me any country, beyond our own, which has risen to glory or to greatness without an established church, or without a powerful aristocracy, if not an hereditary nobility. I know no country in Europe, except Turkey, without hereditary nobles. Must we, too, have these Corinthian ornaments of society, because those countries of greatness and glory have given in to them? But, after we shall have destroyed all our foreign trade; after we shall have, by the prevention of imports, cut off exports—thus keeping the promise of the Constitution to the ear, and breaking it to the hope—paltering with the people in a double sense,—after we shall have done this, we are told, "we shall only have to resort to an excise; we have only to change the mode of collection of taxes from the people; both modes of taxation are voluntary." Very voluntary! The exciseman comes into my house; searches my premises; respects not even the privacy of female apartments; measures, gauges, and weighs every thing; levies a tax upon every thing; and then tells me the tax is a voluntary one on my part, and that I am or ought to be content. "Yes, voluntary," as Portia said to Shylock, when she played the judge so rarely—"Art thou content, Jew? Art thou content?"

These taxes, however, it seems, are voluntary, "as being altogether upon consumption." By a recent speech on this subject, the greater part of which, said Mr. R., I was so fortunate as to hear, I learn that there have been only two hundred capital prosecutions in England, within a given time, for violations of the revenue laws. Are we ready, if one of us, too poor to own a saddle-horse, should borrow a saddle and clap it on his plough-horse, to ride to church or court or mill or market, to be taxed for a surplus saddle-horse, and surcharged for having failed to list him as such? Are gentlemen aware of the inquisitorial, dispensing, arbitrary, and almost Papal power, of the Commissioners of Excise? I shall not stop to go into a detail of them; but I never did expect to hear it said, on this floor, and by a gentleman from Kentucky, too, that the excise system was a mere scarecrow—a bugbear—that the sound of the words constituted all the difference between a system of excise and a system of customs; that both meant the same thing. "Write them together; your's is as fair a name. Sound them; it doth become the mouth as well." Here, sir, I must beg leave to differ; I do not think it does. "Weigh them; it is as heavy." That I grant. "Conjure with them"—excise "will start a spirit as soon as customs."

This I verily believe, sir, and I wish, with all my heart, if this bill is to pass—if new and unnecessary burdens are to be wantonly imposed upon the people—that we were to return home with the blessed news of a tax or excise, not less by way of "minimum," than fifty cents per gallon upon whiskey. And here, if I did not consider an exciseman to bear, according to the language of the old law books, caput lupinum, and that it was almost as meritorious to shoot such a hell-hound of tyranny, as to shoot a wolf or a mad dog—and, if I did not know that any thing like an excise in this country is in effect utterly impracticable, I myself, feeling, seeing, blushing for my country, would gladly vote to lay an excise on this abominable liquor, the lavish consumption of which renders this the most drunken nation under the sun; and yet, we have refused to take the duties from wines, from cheap French wines particularly, that might lure the dog from his vomit, and lay the foundation of a reformation of the public manners. Sir, an excise system can never be maintained in this country. I had as lief be a tythe-proctor in Ireland, and met on a dark night in a narrow road by a dozen white-boys, or peep-of-day boys, or hearts of oak, or hearts of steel, as an exciseman in the Alleghany mountains, met, in a lonely road, or by-place, by a backwoodsman, with a rifle in his hand. With regard to Ireland, the British chancellor of the exchequer has been obliged to reduce the excise in Ireland on distilled spirits, to comparatively nothing to what it was formerly, in consequence of the impossibility of collecting it in that country. Ireland is, not to speak with statistical accuracy, about the size of Pennsylvania, containing something like twenty-five thousand square miles of territory, with a population of six millions of inhabitants, nearly as great a number as the whole of the white population of the United States; with a standing army of 20,000 men; with another standing army, composed of all those classes in civil life, who, through the instrumentality of that army, keep the wretched people in subjection—under all these circumstances, even in Ireland, the excise cannot be collected. I venture to say, that no army that the earth has ever seen—not such an one as that of Bonaparte, which marched to the invasion of Russia—would be capable of collecting an excise in this country—not such an one as that described, if you will allow me to give some delightful poetry in exchange for very wretched prose, as Milton has described:

"Such forces met not, nor so wide a camp,
When Agrican, with all his northern powers,
Besieged Albracca, as romances tell,
The city of Calliphron, from whence to win
The fairest of her sex, Angelica,
His daughter, sought by many prowrest knights,
Both Paynim and the Peers of Charlemagne."

Not such a force, nor even the troops with which he compares them, which were no less than "the legion fiends of hell," could collect an excise here. If any officer of our Government were to take the field a still-hunting, as they call it in Ireland, among our Southern or Western forests and mountains, I should like to see the throwing off the hounds. I have still enough of the sportsman about me, that I should like to see the breaking cover; and, above all, I should like to be in at the death.

And what, said Mr. R., are we now about to do? For what was the Constitution formed? To drive the people of any part of this Union from the plough to the distaff? Sir, the Constitution of the United States never would have been formed, and if formed, would have been scouted, una voce, by the people, if viewed as a means for effecting purposes like this. The Constitution was formed for external purposes, to raise armies and navies, and to lay uniform duties on imports, to raise a revenue to defray the expenditure for such objects. What are you going to do now? To turn the Constitution wrong side out; to abandon foreign commerce and exterior relations—I am sorry to use this Frenchified word—the foreign affairs, which it was established to regulate, and convert it into a municipal agent, to carry a system of espionage and excise into every log house in the United States. We went to war with Great Britain for free-trade and sailors' rights; we made a treaty of peace in which I never could, with the aid of my glasses, see a word about either the one or the other of these objects of contention; we are now determined never to be engaged in another for such purposes; for we are, ourselves, putting an end to them. And, by the way of comfort in this state of things, we have been told, by the doctor as well as by the apothecary, that much cannot be immediately expected from this new scheme; that years will pass away before its beneficial effects will be fully realized. And to whom is this told? To the consumptive patient it is said—here is the remedy; persevere in it for a few years, and it will infallibly cure your disorder; and this infallible remedy is prescribed for pulmonary consumption, which is an opprobrium of physicians, and has reached a stage that, in a few months, not to say days, must inevitably terminate the existence of the patient. This is to be done, too, on the plea that the people who call for this measure are already ruined. I will do any thing, sir, in reason, to relieve these persons; but I can never agree, because they are ruined, and we are half ruined only, that we shall be entirely ruined, for the contingent possibility of their relief. We have no belief in this new theory—new, for it came in with the French revolution, and that is of modern date—of the transfusion of blood from a healthy animal to a sick one: and, if there is to be such a transfusion for the benefit of these ruined persons now, we refer the gentlemen to bulls and goats for supplies of blood, for we should be the veriest asses to permit them to draw our own.

We are told, however, that we have nothing to do but to postpone the payment of the public debt for a few years, and wait for an accumulation of wealth, for a new run of luck—

"Rusticus expectat dum defluet omnis et ille Labitur et labitur in omne volubilis ævum."

This postponement of the public debt is no novelty. All debts are, now-a-days, as old Lilly bath it, in the future in rus, "about to be" paid. We have gone on postponing paying the national debt, and our own debts, until individual credit is at an end; until property, low as it is reduced in price by our fantastic legislation, can no longer be bought but for ready money. Here is one, and there the other. I am describing a state of society which I know to exist in a part of the country, and which I hear, with concern, does exist in a greater degree, in a much larger portion of the country, than I pretend to be personally acquainted with.

In all beneficial changes in the natural world—and the sentiment is illustrated by one of the most beautiful effusions of imagination and genius that I ever read—in all those changes, which are the work of an all-wise, all-seeing, and superintending providence, as in the insensible gradation by which the infant bud expands into manhood, and from manhood to senility; or, if you will, to caducity itself—you find nature never working but by gradual and imperceptible changes; you cannot see the object move, but take your eye from it for a while, and like the index of that clock, you can see that it has moved. The old proverb says, God works good, and always by degrees. The devil, on the other hand, is bent on mischief, and always in a hurry. He cannot stay: his object is mischief, which can best be effected suddenly, and he must be gone to work elsewhere. But we have the comfort, under the pressure of this measure, that at least no force is exercised upon us; we are not obliged to buy goods of foreign manufacture. It is true, sir, that gentlemen have not said you shall not send your tobacco or cotton abroad; but they have said the same thing, in other words; by preventing the importation of the returns which we used to receive, and without which, the sale or exchange of our produce is impracticable, they say to us, you shall sell only to us, and we will give you what we please; you shall buy only of us, but at what price we please to ask. But no force is used! You are at full liberty not to buy or to sell. Sir, when an English Judge once told a certain curate at Brentford, that the court of chancery was open equally to the rich and the poor, Horne Tooke replied, "so, my lord, is the London Tavern." You show a blanket or a warm rug to a wretch that is shivering with cold, and tell him you shall get one no where else, but you are at liberty not to buy mine.

No Jew, who ever tampered with the necessities of a profligate young heir, lending him money at an usury of cent. per cent., ever acted more paternally than the advocates of this bill, to those upon whom it is to operate. I advise you, young man, for your good, says the usurer. I do these things very reluctantly, says Moses—these courses will lead you to ruin. But, no force—no sir, no force short of Russian despotism, shall induce me to purchase, or, knowing it, to use any article from the region of country which attempts to cram this bill down our throats. On this, we of the South are resolved, as were our fathers about the tea, which they refused to drink; for this is the same old question of the stamp act in a new shape, viz: whether they, who have no common feeling with us, shall impose on us, not merely a burdensome but a ruinous tax, and that, by way of experiment and sport. And I say again, if we are to submit to such usurpations, give me George Grenville, give me Lord North for a master. It is in this point of view that I most deprecate the bill. If, said Mr. R., from the language I have used, any gentleman shall believe I am not as much attached to this Union as any one on this floor, he will labor under great mistake. But there is no magic in this word union. I value it as the means of preserving the liberty and happiness of the people. Marriage itself is a good thing, but the marriages of Mezentius were not so esteemed. The marriage of Sinbad, the sailor, with the corpse of his deceased wife, was an union, and just such an union will this be, if, by a bare majority in both Houses, this bill shall become a law. And, I ask, sir, whether it will redound to the honor of this House, if this bill should pass, that the people should owe their escape to the act of any others rather than to us? Shall we, when even the British Parliament are taking off taxes by wholesale—when all the assessed taxes are diminished fifty per cent.—when the tax on salt is reduced seven-eighths, with a pledge that the remainder shall come off, and the whole would have been repealed, but that it was kept on as a salvo for the wounded pride of Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer,* who, when asked—why keep on this odious tax, which brings but a paltry hundred and fifty thousand per annum? answered, by subterfuge and evasion, as I have heard done in this House, and drew back upon his resources, his majority—how will it answer for the people to look up for their escape from oppression, not to their immediate Representatives, but to the Representatives of the States, or, possibly, to the Executive? And, permit me here to say, and I say it freely, because it is true, that I join as heartily as any man, in reprehending "the cold, ambiguous support of the Executive Government to this bill." I do not use my own words; I deprecate as much as any member of this House can do, that the Executive of this country should lend to this bill, or to any other bill, a cold and ambiguous support, or support of any sort, until it come before him in the shape of a law, unless it be a measure which he, in his Constitutional capacity, may have invited Congress to pass. I may be permitted to say, and I will say, that, in case this bill should be unhappily presented to him for his signature, and as an allusion has been made to him in debate, I presume I may repeat it,—I hope he will recollect how much the country that gave him birth has done for him, and the little, not to say worse than nothing, that, during his administration he has done for her. I hope, sir, he will scout the bill as contrary to the genius of our Government, to the whole spirit and letter of our confederation—I say of our confederation—Blessed be God, it is a confederation, and that it contains within itself the redeeming power which has more than once been exercised—and that it contains within itself the seeds of preservation, if not of this Union, at least of the individual Commonwealths of which it is composed.

But, sir, not satisfied with an appeal to the example of Great Britain, whom we have been content hitherto very sedulously to censure and to imitate—as I once heard a person say that it was absolutely necessary for persons of a peculiar character to be extremely vehement of censure of the very vice of which they are themselves guilty—the example of Russia has been introduced, the very last, I should suppose, that would be brought into this House on this or any other question. A gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. POINSETT,) whose intelligence and information I very much

* It is a subject of much regret to me, that, at this time, I had not had the benefit of the very able speech of his successor in office, (Mr. Robinson,) which reached the United States a few days after. It ought to be reprinted in every leading paper in the Union. With the good sense, liberality, manliness, and good faith, which characterize the whole speech, he states that Government is pledged to the abolition of the small remnant of the salt tax; and, if insisted on by the Opposition, the pledge shall be redeemed. He suggests, however, the policy of substituting some other reduction in lieu of the small tax now payable on salt, which he conceives to be as little burdensome, at its present reduced rate, as any other, and more easy of collection.

respect, but the feebleness of whose voice does not permit him to be heard as distinctly as could be wished, remarked the other day, and, having it on my notes, I will, with his leave, repeat it—Russia is cursed with a paper money, which, in point of depreciation and its consequent embarrassment to her, can boast of no advantage, I believe, even over that of that of Kentucky—so cursed, that it is impossible, until her circulation is restored to a heathful state, she can ever take her station as a commercial or manufacturing nation, to any extent. Nay, more, Russia, with the exception of a few of her provinces, consists, like the interior of America, of a vast inland continent, desolated and deformed by prairies, or steppes, as they are there called, inhabited by a sparse population; and, as an appeal has been made to experience, said Mr. R., I ask any gentleman to show me an instance of any country under the sun that has, under these circumstances, taken a stand as a manufacturing or great commercial nation. These great rivers and inland seas cut a mighty figure on the map, but, when you come to consider of capacities for foreign commerce, how unlike the insular situation of Great Britain, or the peninsular situation of almost the whole continent of Europe—surrounded or penetrated as it is by inland seas and gulfs! May I be pardoned for adverting to the fact—I know that comparisons are extremely odious—that, when we look to Salem and Boston, to parts of the country where skill, and capital, and industry, notoriously exist, we find opposition to this bill; and that, when we look to countries which could sooner build one hundred pyramids, such as that of Cheops, than manufacture one cambric needle, or a paper of White Chapel pins, or a watch-spring, we hear a clamor about this system for the protection of manufactures. The merchants and manufacturers of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, the Province of Maine, and Sagadahock repel this bill, whilst men in hunting shirts, with deer-skin leggings and moccasins on their feet, want protection for manufactures—men with rifles on their shoulders, and long knives in their belts, seeking in the forests to lay in their next Winter's supply of bear-meat. But it is not there alone the cry is heard. It is at Baltimore—decayed, deserted Baltimore, whose exports have more than one-half decreased, whilst those of Boston have four times increased—it is decayed and deserted Baltimore that comes here and asks us for the protection of those interests which have grown up during the late war—privateering among the number, I presume. Philadelphia, too, in a state of atrophy, asks for the measure—Philadelphia, who never can, pass what bill you please, have a foreign trade to any great amount, or become a great manufacturing town, for which she wants all the elements of climate, coal, and capital—this city, now over built, swoln to the utmost extent of the integument, and utterly destitute of force or weight in the Union, wants this bill for the protection of the domestic industry of her free blacks, I presume. New York, too, is now willing to build up Montreal and Quebec at her expense—to convert the Hudson into a theatre for rival disputants about steamboats in the courts below stairs, and for them, and such as them, with a coasting license, to ply upon. The true remedy, and the only one, for the iron manufacturer of Pennsylvania, who has nothing but iron to sell, and that, they tell us, is worth nothing, would be to lay on the table of this House a declaration of war in blank, and then go into a Committee of the Whole, to see what nation in the world it would be most convenient to go to war with—for, fill the blank with the name of what Power you please, it must be a sovereign State, and, though it have not a seaman or a vessel in the world, its commissions are as good and valid in an admiralty court, as those of the Lord High Admiral of Great Britain. In this way you will put our furnaces in blast, and your paper mills into full operation; and many, very many, who, during the last war, transported flour on horseback for the supply of your army, at the cost of an hundred dollars per barrel, and who have since transported provisions in steamboats up and down the Missouri river—very many such individuals would thus be taken out of the very jaws of bankruptcy and lifted up to opulence, at the expense of that people, at whose expense, also, you are now about to enable these iron manufacturers to fill their pockets. New England does not want this bill. Connecticut, indeed, molasses having been thrown overboard to lighten the ship, votes for this bill. A word in the ear of the land of steady habits—I voted against that tax, on the principle, which has always directed my public life, not to compromise my opinions—not to do evil that good may come of it—let me tell the land of steady habits, that, after this bill shall be fairly off the shore; after we shall have cleared decks and made ready for action again; after she shall have imposed on me the onerous burden of this bill, she shall have the benefit of my vote to put on again this duty on molasses—not at this day—this is not the last tariff measure; for, in less than five years, I would, if I were a betting man, wager any odds that we have another tariff proposition, worse by far than that, amendments to which gentlemen had strangled yesterday by the bow-string of the previous question. Fair dealing leads to safe counsels and safe issues. There is a certain left-handed wisdom, that often overreaches its own objects, which grasps at the shadow and lets go the substance. We shall not only have this duty on molasses, I can tell the gentlemen from Connecticut, but we shall have, moreover, an additional bounty on intoxication by whiskey, in the shape of an additional duty on foreign distilled spirits.

The ancient Commonwealth of Virginia, one of whose unworthy sons, and more unworthy representatives, I am, said Mr. R., must now begin to open her eyes to the fatal policy which she has pursued for the last forty years. I have not a doubt, that they who were the agents for transferring her vast, and boundless, and fertile country to the United States, with an express stipulation, in effect, that not an acre of it should ever inure to the benefit of any man from Virginia, were as respectable, and kind hearted, and hospitable, and polished, and guileless Virginia gentlemen, as ever were cheated out of their estates by their overseers; men who, so long as they could command the means, by sale of their last acre, or last negro, would have a good dinner, and give a hearty welcome to whomsoever chose to drop in, to eat, friend or stranger, bidden or unbidden. What will be the effect of this bill on the Southern States? The effect of this policy is, what I shudder to look at; the more, because the next census is held up in terrorem over us. We are told, you had better consent to this—we are not threatened exactly with General Gage and the Boston Port bill—but we are told by gentlemen, we shall, after the next census, so saddle, and bridle, and martingale you, that you will be easily regulated by any bit, or whip, however severe, or spurs, however rank, of domestic manufacture, that we choose to use. But this argument, sir, has no weight in it with me. I do not choose to be robbed now, because, after I am once robbed, it will become easier to rob me again. Obsta principiis, is my maxim—because every act of extension of the system operates in a two-fold way, decreasing the strength and means of the robber, and increasing those of the robber. This is as true as any proposition in mathematics. Gentlemen need not tell us, we had better give in at once. No, sir, we shall not give in; no, we shall hold out—we shall not give in. We do not mean to be threatened out of our rights by the menace of another census. We are aware of our folly, and it is our business to provide against the consequences of it, but not in this way. When I recollect, that the tariff of 1816 was followed by that of 1819-'20, and that by this measure of 1823-'24, I cannot believe that we are, at any time hereafter, long to be exempt from the demands of those sturdy beggars, who will take no denial. Every concession does but render every fresh demand and new concession more easy. It is like those dastard nations who vainly think to buy peace. When I look back to what the country of which I am a representative was, and when I see what it is—when I recollect the expression of Lord Cornwallis, applied to Virginia, "that great and unterrified colony," which he was about to enter, not without some misgivings of his mind as to the result of the invasion—when I compare what she was when this House of Representatives first assembled in the city of New York, and what she now is, I know, by the disastrous contrast, that her councils have not been governed by statesmen. They might be admirable professors of a university, powerful dialecticians ex cathedra, but no sound counsels of wise statesmen could ever lead to such practical ill results as are exhibited by a comparison of the past and present condition of the ancient colony and dominion of Virginia.

In the course of this discussion, said Mr. R., I have heard, I will not say with surprise, because nil admirari is my motto—no doctrine that can be broached on this floor can ever, hereafter, excite surprise in my mind—I have heard the names of Say, Ganilh, Adam Smith, and Ricardo, pronounced, not only in terms, but in a tone, of sneering contempt, as visionary theorists, destitute of practical wisdom, and the whole clan of Scotch and Quarterly reviewers lugged in to boot. This, sir, is a sweeping clause of proscription. With the names of Say, Smith, and Ganilh, I profess to be acquainted, for I too, am versed in tulle pages, but I did not expect to hear, in this House, a name, with which I am a little further acquainted, treated with so little ceremony, and by whom? I leave Adam Smith to the simplicity, and majesty, and strength of his own native genius which has canonized his name—a name which will be pronounced with veneration, when not one name in this House will be remembered. But, one word as to Ricardo, the last mentioned of those writers—a new authority, though the grave has already closed upon him, and set its seal upon his reputation. I shall speak of him in the language of a man of as great a genius as this, or perhaps any, age has ever produced—a man remarkable for the depth of his reflections and the acumen of his penetration. "I had been led," says this man, "to look into loads of books—my understanding had for too many years been intimate with severe thinkers, with logic, and the great masters of knowledge, not to be aware of the utter feebleness of the herd of modern economists. I sometimes read chapters from more recent works, or part of Parliamentary debates. I saw that these [ominous words!] were generally the very dregs and rinsings of the human intellect." [I am very glad, sir, he did not read our debates. What would he have said of ours?] "At length a friend sent me Mr. Ricardo's book, and recurring to my own prophetic anticipation of the advent of some legislator on this science, I said, 'Thou art the man. Wonder and curiosity had long been dead in me; yet I wondered once more. Had this profound work been really written in England during the 19th century? Could it be that an Englishman, and he not in academic bowers, but oppressed by mercantile and senatorial cares, had accomplished what all the universities and a century of thought had failed to advance by one hair's breadth? All other writers had been crushed and overlaid by the enormous weight of facts and documents; Mr. Ricardo had deduced, a priori, from the understanding itself, laws which first gave a ray of light into the unwieldy chaos of materials, and had constructed what had been but a collection of tentative discussions, into a science of regular proportions, now first standing on an eternal basis."

I pronounce no opinion of my own, said Mr. R., on Ricardo; I recur rather to the opinion of a man, inferior in point of original and native genius, and that highly cultivated, too, to none of the moderns, and few of the ancients. Upon this subject, what shall we say to the following fact? Butler, who is known to gentlemen of the profession of the law, as the annotator, with Hargrave, on Lord Coke, speaking with Fox as to political economy—that most extraordinary man, unrivalled for his powers of debate, excelled by no man that ever lived, or probably ever will live, as a public debater, and of the deepest of political erudition, fairly confessed that he had never read

Adam Smith. Butler said to Mr. Fox "that he had never read Adam Smith's work on the 'Wealth of Nations.'" "To tell you the truth," replied Mr. Fox, "nor I neither. There is something in all these subjects that passes my comprehension—something so wide that I could never embrace them myself, or find any one who did." And yet we see how we, with our little dividers, undertake to lay off the scale, and with our pack-thread to take the soundings, and speak with a confidence peculiar to quacks (in which the regular bred professor never indulges) on this abstruse and perplexing subject. Confidence is one thing, knowledge another; of the want of which, overweening confidence is notoriously the indication. What of that? Let Ganilh, Say, Ricardo, Smith—all Greek and Roman fame be against us—we appeal to Dionysius in support of our doctrines; and to him not on the throne of Syracuse but at Corinth—not in absolute possession of that most wonderful and enigmatical city, as difficult to comprehend as the abstrusest problem of political economy, which furnished not only the means but the men for supporting the greatest wars—a kingdom within itself, under whose ascendant the genius of Athens, in her most high and palmy state, quailed, and stood rebuked. No; we follow the pedagogue to the schools—dictating in the classic shades of Longwood—(lucus a non lucendo)—to his disciples.

We have been told that the economists are right in theory and wrong in practice; which is as much as to say, that two bodies occupy at the same time the same space; for it is equally impracticable to be right in theory and wrong in practice. It is easy to be wrong in practice; but if our practice corresponds with our theory, it is a solecism to say that we can be right in the one and wrong in the other. As for Alexander and Cæsar, said Mr. R., I have as little respect for their memory as is consistent with that involuntary homage which all must pay to men of their prowess and abilities; and if Alexander had suffered himself to be led by the nose out of Babylon and banished to Sinope, or if Cæsar had suffered himself to be deprived of his imperial sway, not by the dagger of the assassin, but by his own slavish fears, I should have as little respect for their memory as for that of him whose example has on this occasion been held up to us for admiration. Speaking of that man who has kept me awake night after night, and has been to me an incubus by day, for fear of the vastness of his designs, I cannot conceive of a spectacle so pitiful, so despicable, as that man, under those circumstances; and if the work dictated by him at St. Helena be read with the slightest attention, no forsworn witness at the Old Bailey was ever detected in so many contradictions as he has been guilty of. No, sir, the Jupiter from whose reluctant hand the thunderbolt is wrung, is not the one at whose shrine I worship—not that I think that the true Amphitryon is always him with whom we dine—he is not the political economist who is to take place of Smith and Ricardo. Will any man make me believe that he understood the theory or the practice of political economy better than these men, or than Charles Fox? Impossible. When I recollect what that man might have done for liberty, and what he did; when I recollect that to him we owe this Holy Alliance—this fearful power of Russia—of Russia, where I should advise persons to go who desired to be instructed in petty treason by the murder of a husband, or in parricide by the murder of a father, but from whom I should never think of taking a lesson in political economy—to whom I would say, rather, pay your debts, not in depreciated paper; do not commit daily acts of bankruptcy; restore your currency; practise on the principles of liberality and justice, and then I will listen to you. No, sir, Russia may, if she pleases, not only lay heavy duties on imports; she may prohibit them if she pleases; she has nothing to export but what some other inland countries have, political power—physical, to be sure, as well as intellectual power—but she does not even dare to attack the Turk; she cannot stir; she is something like some of our interior people of the South, who have plenty of land, plenty of serfs, smoke-houses filled with meat, and very fine horses to ride, but who, when they go abroad, have not one shilling to bless themselves with; and so long as she is at peace, and does not trouble the rest of the world, so long she may be suffered to remain; but, if she should continue to act hereafter as she has done heretofore, it will be the interest of the civilized world to procure her dismemberment, per fas aut nefas.

But it is said a measure of this sort is necessary to create employment for the people. Why, sir, where are the handles of the plough? Are they unfit for young gentlemen to touch? Or will they rather choose to enter your military academies, where the sons of the rich are educated at the expense of the poor, and where so many political Janissaries are every year turned out, always ready for war, and to support the powers that be—equal to the Strelitzes of Moscow or St. Petersburg? I do not speak now of individuals, of course, but of the tendency of the system—the hounds follow the huntsman because he feeds them, and bears the whip. I speak of the system. I concur most heartily, sir, in the censure which has been passed upon the greediness of office, which stands a stigma on the present generation. Men from whom we might expect, and from whom I did expect better things, crowd the ante-chamber of the palace, for every vacant office; nay, even before men are dead, their shoes are wanted for some barefooted office-seeker. How mistaken was the old Roman, the old Consul, who, whilst he held the plough by one hand, and death held the other, exclaimed, "Diis immortalibus sero!"

Our fathers, how did they acquire their property? By straightforward industry, rectitude, and frugality. How did they become dispossessed of their property? By indulging in speculative hopes and designs, seeking the shadow whilst they lost the substance; and now, instead of being, as they were, men of respectability, men of substance, men capable and willing to live independently and honestly, and hospitably too—for who so par-simonious as the prodigal who has nothing to give? What have we become? A nation of sharks, preying on one another through the instrumentality of this paper system, which, if Lycurgus had known of it, he would unquestionably have adopted, in preference to his iron money, if his object had been to make the Spartans the most accomplished knaves, as well as to keep them poor.

We are told that this is a curious Constitution of ours: it is made for foreigners and not for ourselves—for the protection of foreign, and not of American industry. Sir, this is a curious Constitution of ours, said Mr. R.; and if I were disposed to deny it, I could not succeed. It is an anomaly in itself. It is that supposed impossibility of all writers, from Aristotle to the present day, an imperium in imperio. Nothing like it ever did exist, or possibly ever will, under similar circumstances. It is a Constitution consisting of confederated bodies, for certain exterior purposes, and, also, for some interior purposes, but leaving to the State authorities, among a great many powers, the very one which we now propose to exercise: for, if we were now passing a revenue bill—a bill, the object of which were to raise revenue—however much I should deny the policy, and however I could demonstrate the futility of the plan, I still should deem it to be a Constitutional bill—a bill passed to carry, bona fide, into effect, a provision of the Constitution, but a bill passed with short-sighted views. But this is no such bill. It is a bill, under pretence of regulating commerce, to take money from the pockets of a very large, and, I thank God, contiguous territory, and to put it into other pockets. One word, sir, on that point; I can assure the gentlemen whose appetites are so keenly whetted for our money—I trust, at least, that if this bill passes, there will be a meeting of the members opposed to it, and a general and consentaneous resistance to its operation throughout the whole Southern country—and we shall make it by lawful means; quant à nous, the law will be a dead letter. It shall be to me, at least, as innocuous as the pill of the empyric, which I am determined not to swallow. The manufacturer of the East may carry his woollens, or his cottons, or his coffins, to what market he pleases—I do not buy of him. Self defence is the first law of nature. You drive us into it. You create heats and animosities amongst this great family, who ought to live like brothers; and, after you have got this temper of mind roused among the Southern people, do you expect to come among us to trade, and expect us to buy your wares? Sir, not only shall we not buy them, but we shall take such measures (I will not enter into the detail of them now,) as shall render it impossible for you to sell them. Whatever may be said here, of the "misguided counsels," as they have been termed, "of the theorists of Virginia," they have, so far as regards this question, the confidence of united Virginia. We are asked—does the South lose any thing by this bill—why do you cry out? I put it, sir, to any man, from any part of the country, from the Gulf of Mexico, from the Balize, to the Eastern shore of Maryland—which, I thank heaven, is not yet under the government of Baltimore, and will not be, unless certain theories should come into play in that State, which we have lately heard of, and a majority of men, told by the head, should govern—whether the whole country, between the points I have named, is not unanimous in opposition to this bill? Would it not be unexampled, that we should thus complain, protest, resist, and that all the while nothing should be the matter? Are our understandings (however low mine may be rated, much sounder than mine are engaged in this resistance,) to be rated so low as that we are to be made to believe that we are children affrighted by a bugbear? We are asked, however, why do you cry out?—it is all for your good. Sir, this reminds me of the mistresses of George II. who, when they were insulted by the populace on arriving in London, (as all such creatures deserve to be, by every mob,) put their heads out of the window, and said to them, in their broken English, "Goot people, we be come for your goots;" to which one of the mob rejoined "Yes, and for our chattels too, I fancy." Just so it is with the oppressive exactions proposed and advocated by the supporters of this bill, on the plea of the good of those who are its victims.

There is not a member of this House, said Mr. R., more deeply penetrated than the one who is endeavoring to address you, with the inadequate manner in which he has discharged the task imposed upon him—in this instance, he will say, on his part, most reluctantly. But, as I have been all my life a smatterer in history, I cannot fail to be struck with the fitness of the comparison instituted by a historian of this country with the Roman republic, just as it was in a state of preparation for a master.

"Sed, post quam luxu, atque desidia civitas corrupta est; rursus respublica, magnitudine sua, imperatorum atque magistratum vitia sustentabat; ac veluti effoeta parentum, multis tempestatibus, haud sane quisquam Romæ virtute magnus fuit."

Of this quotation, I will, as they sometimes say in the Parliament, for the benefit of the country gentlemen, attempt a translation. "But, after the State had become corrupted by luxury and sloth"—in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments, we are told of one who laid by his sequins in good money, and when he afterwards came to use them, he found them to be bits of paper, not worth more than old continental (or Kentucky) money—"by luxury and sloth, again the republic,"—and here I press the comparison—"by dint of its own magnitude, its own greatness, its own vastness, bore up under the faults, the vices, of its generals, magistrates, and that, too, as if effete—(past bearing) since, for a long while"—I hope the comparison will not hold here—"for a long time scarcely any man had become great at Rome by his merit." So, sir, it is with this republic. It does not sustain, by its greatness and growing magnitude, the follies and vices of its magistracy. Had this Government been stationary like any of the old Governments of Europe, of the second class, Prussia, for instance, or Holland, by the political evolutions of the last thirty years—I might say the last twelve years—it would have sunk into insignificance and debility: and it is only upon this resource, the increasing greatness of this republic, that the blunderers who plunge blindfold into schemes like this, can rely for any possibility of salvation from the effect of their own rash, undigested measures. It is true, that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong; and elsewhere than in the republic of Rome and of other times, than the days of Catiline, it may be said, "Haud sane quisque virtute magnus est."

"Tis not in mortals to command success!—

But do you more Sempronius—don't deserve it, And take my word you won't have any less;

Be wary, watch the time, and always serve it:

Give gentle way when there's too great a press;

And for your conscience only learn to nerve it—

For, like a racer, or a boxer, training,

'Twill make, if proved, vast efforts without paining."

I had more to say, Mr. Speaker, could I have said it, on this subject. But I cannot sit down without asking those who were once my brethren of the church, the elders in the young family of this good old republic of the thirteen States, if they can consent to rivet upon us this system, from which no benefit can possibly result to themselves. I put it to them as descendants of the renowned colony of Virginia—as children sprung from her loins—if, for the sake of all the benefits with which this bill is pretended to be freighted to them—granting such to be the fact, for argument's sake—they could consent to do such an act of violence to the unanimous opinion, feelings, prejudices, if you will, of the whole Southern States, as to pass it? I go farther. I ask of them what is there in the condition of the nation, at this time, that calls for the immediate adoption of this measure? Are the Gauls at the gate of the Capitol? If they are, the cacklings of the Capitoline geese will hardly save it. What is there to induce us to plunge into the vortex of those evils so severely felt in Europe from this very manufacturing and paper-policy? For, it is evident that, if we go into this system of policy, we must adopt the European institutions also. We have very good materials to work with. We have only to make our elective King, President for life, in the first place, and then to make the succession hereditary in the family of the first that shall happen to have a promising son. For a King we can be at no loss—ex quo vis ligno—any block will do for him. The Senate may, perhaps, be transmuted into a House of Peers, although we should meet with more difficulty than in the other case: for, Bonaparte himself was not more hardly put to it, to recruit the ranks of his mushroom-nobility, than we should be to furnish a House of Peers. As for us, we are the faithful Commons, ready made to hand; but with all our loyalty, I congratulate the House—I congratulate the nation—that, although this body is daily degraded by the sight of members of Congress manufactured into placemen, we have not yet reached such a point of degradation as to submit to suffer Executive minions to be manufactured into members of Congress. We have shut that door; I wish we could shut the other also. I wish we could have a perpetual call of the House in this view, and suffer no one to go out from its closed doors. The time, Mr. R. said, was peculiarly inauspicious for the change in our policy which is proposed by this bill. We are on the eve of an election that promises to be the most distracted that this nation has ever yet undergone. It may turn out to be a Polish election. At such a time, ought any measure to be brought forward which is supposed to be capable of being demonstrated to be extremely injurious to one great portion of this country, and beneficial in proportion to another? Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. There are firebrands enough in the land, without this apple of discord being cast into this assembly. Suppose this measure is not what it is represented to be; that the fears of the South are altogether illusory and visionary; that it will produce all the good predicted of it—an honorable gentleman from Kentucky said, yesterday, and I was sorry to hear it, for I have great respect for that gentleman, and for other gentlemen from that State, that the question was not whether the majority or minority should rule. The gentleman is wrong, and if he will consider the matter rightly, he will see it. Is there no difference between the patient and the actor? We are passive: we do not call upon them to act or to suffer, but we call upon them not so to act as that we must necessarily suffer: and I venture to say that, in any government properly constituted, this very consideration would operate conclusively, that, if this burden is to be laid on 102, it ought not to be laid by 105. We are the eel that is being flayed, while the cook-maid pats us on the head, and cries, with the clown in King Lear, "down, wantons, down!" There is but one portion of the country which can profit by this bill, and from that portion of the country comes this bare majority in favor of it. I bless God that Massachusetts and old Virginia are once again rallying under the same banner, against oppressive and unconstitutional taxation: for, if all the blood be drawn from out the body, I care not whether it be by the British Parliament or the American Congress—by an Emperor or a King abroad, or by a President at home. Under these views, and with feelings of mortification and shame at the very weak opposition I have been able to make to this bill, I entreat gentlemen to consent that it may lie over, at least, until the next session of Congress. We have other business to attend to, and our families and affairs need our attention at home—and indeed I, sir, would not give one farthing for any man who prefers being here to being at home—who is a good public man and a bad private one. With these views and feelings, I move you, sir, that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Appendix to Mr. R.'s Speech, furnished by himself.

NOTE 1.

I ought to have excepted Albert Gallatin, "the apostle of Truth, and the favorite votary of Liberty," as he was hailed by the companion of my early manhood. This gentleman might say, of the place in which he finds himself, what was said of a certain Doge of Genoa, I think, whom the arrogance of Louis XIV. ordered to Paris to make an apology, in his own person, for some offence on the part of that once proud republic, against the dignity of the Grand Monarque.

Had Montgomery, instead of falling on the heights of Abraham—where Montcalm and Wolfe, congenial spirits, also their mansions in this fleshly nook," survived to see the Revolution of 1788-'9, brought about, would it have ever been objected to him that, by birth, he was an Irishman? Would his foreign descent have stood in the way of his other claims to the Chief Magistracy of the country?

— "forsook

Were Mr. Gallatin a French or Englishman, there would be some color to this objection. But he is a native of Geneva, and no good Genevese can worship at the shrine of a Bonaparte or a Bourbon. I think it must be his citizenship of Virginia that stands mostly in the way of the elevation of this extraordinary man, who sees himself postponed to persons in no respect considerable, except for the modesty of their pretensions, who have never, and can never, render a tithe of his public services, and whose names were not known out of their own parish, so late as the acquisition of Louisiana, and the commencement of Mr. Jefferson's second term of Presidential service.

No foreigner, be it remembered, can ever become President, who was not a citizen at the time of the adoption of the new Constitution of 1787. The door will soon be closed against them forever, be their merits and services what they may.

NOTE 2.

The principal of the debt proper of the United States was funded at 6 per cent., but the payment of one third was postponed for ten years.

The interest, the evidences of which were called "indents of interest," was funded at 3 per cent.

Of the assumed debt, one-third was taken, on estimate, to be the amount of interest due upon it, which, at the time, could not be ascertained; and, also, funded at 3 per cent.

These two sums constitute the 3 per cent. stock of the United States.

Of the remaining two-thirds of the assumed debt, two-thirds, being the estimated amount of principal, equal to 2s. 8d. Virginia money, to a dollar, were funded at 6 per cent.; and the remainder (one-third of two-thirds, or 1s. 4d. Virginia money, on the dollar) was also funded at 6 per cent., but the payment postponed in like manner, as on the debt proper of the United States.

This is the origin of the term deferred stock, in our laws and financial statements.

NOTE 3.

From this admission, I feel myself compelled to except the opinions, however long established, as to the impolicy of the expulsion of the Moriscoes from Spain, and of the Huguenots from France by the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Never having been "addictus jurare in verba magistri," I have long ago taught myself to believe, that the alleged impolicy of these two celebrated measures (which I have never heard called in question by any authority whatsoever) is one of those "vulgar errors" that ought to go to swell the catalogue of the ingenious Sir Thomas Brown. From the institution of the Passover to the latest experience of man, it will be found that two essentially different and hostile nations cannot peaceably and advantageously inhabit the same territory, and live under the same form of government. I have been led to ascribe the subsequent grandeur and power of France, mainly to the removal of this fruitful source of schism and of weakness. Had the Protestants remained in the bosom of France, their superior industry and intelligence would speedily have raised them to a level with their Catholic enemies and fellow-subjects; and the seeds of incurable division and weakness would thus have been sown, never to be eradicated.

With some millions of wealthy and exasperated Moriscoes in her bosom, could Spain have made the stand she did against the power of Bonaparte? It is this which renders Ireland a dead weight upon England, instead of a powerful auxiliary. Would Virginia have been impoverished in case she had expelled her black population, constituting the great mass of her productive labor at the peace of 1783? Suppose, instead of ceding her northwestern territory to Congress, she had, at the peace of 1783, driven every negro and mulatto, bond or free, across the Ohio? Would she now, think you, be less populous or powerful than she is at present? Would she now be driven to the humiliation of receiving the law, and, perhaps, a master, from the Congressional and electoral influence beyond, not only the Ohio, but the Mississippi—beyond Aurora and the Ganges?

I speak of the results, not of the motives, of those celebrated measures. Was the Reformation not eminently beneficial to England, because it was owing to the lewd passions and ungovernable caprices of a tyrant, even more odious than Louis XIV. or Philip IV.? Were the motives of his overgrown subjects, greedy for the spoils of the church, panting for the plunder of the rich abbeyes and benefices, less infamous than those of their master? Is the Jackall, who humbly receives the offal carcase, when the hunger of the royal beast is appeased by its blood, distinguished in any way to his advantage from the monarch of the forest?

When Mr. RANDOLPH had concluded his speech—

Mr. HOLCOMBE rose, and stated to the Chair that he wished to make some observations on the subject under consideration. I have been, he observed, so patient and persevering a listener throughout this long discussion, that I feel myself entitled to the indulgence of the House for a short time. The fate of the bill, Mr. Speaker, is no longer doubtful. Signs and indications, which can neither be resisted nor mistaken, have announced its destiny. It will pass, I doubt not, at least in this House, by a small but decisive majority. Such facts, on ordinary occasions, would seem to render all further discussion unnecessary, if not intrusive. But, when the policy of a great nation, in relation to one of its most important interests, is about to assume a new character, or, at least, receive additional impulse; when the manufacturing interest of this country, already under the protection of the Government, is demanding yet more efficient protection, in opposition to the remonstrances and hostility of a large and imposing minority, within and without this House, public opinion seems to require—public opinion, indeed, does require—from the friends of the new policy, the fullest exposition of the views and causes which have led to its adoption.

With such apologies, I come before the House at this late period of the debate. But, sir, I scarcely know how or where to commence my observations. The manufacturing question is utterly exhausted. The field of discussion which it presents has been so long preoccupied, so perseveringly explored, that neither fruit nor flower remains to reward the adventurer. If we refer to history for illustration, nothing can be more familiar than its examples. If to political economy, or the labors of the statist, their tables and statements, their axioms and principles, have been urged upon us, from every department of the House, by friend and foe, even to satiety.

Mr. H. observed, the general principles of the bill had been so fully discussed by others, that he would proceed at once to examine, as rapidly and briefly as possible, the principal objections which had been urged against it. The bill, Mr. Speaker, is combatted on this floor by three interests essentially distinct; the agricultural interest of the South, the manufacturing interest of the East, and the general interest of commerce and navigation. For the sake of perspicuity, the objections arising out of the supposed hostility of the bill to each of these interests, will be noticed separately. The protection of the manufacturing interest is said to be hostile to the agriculture of the South. If gentlemen were able to establish the truth of this objection, the principles as well as the policy of the bill would remain, at least to me, entirely indefensible. For I have neither the right nor the disposition to advocate any measure calculated to build up the interest of one section of the Union at the expense of another. I have no personal interest which this bill can possibly promote. I support it, as a measure purely national in its character, intended to advance the prosperity, not of sections only, but of the Union; to equalize all our great interests; to promote, by its direct and necessary operation, the manufacturing interest; to promote, by the creation, or rather the extension, of the home market, the agricultural interest; and, finally, to promote the commercial interest, by enabling the American merchant, by the abundance and cheapness of the fabrics of the manufacturer, to adventure successfully in the great markets of the world; particularly in the opening and growing markets of South America.

The gentlemen of the South must pardon me for believing, as I certainly do believe, that they mistake altogether the ultimate operation of this bill, as far as their agriculture is concerned. It is true, we can only speculate upon this point. But it has always appeared to me that, if there be one section of the Union more deeply interested than another in the friendly operation of our manufacturing policy upon its agriculture, it must be the South, inasmuch as the creation of a steady home market for its rich agricultural staples must be to the South an object of vital and lasting consideration. The European market is at best precarious. A state of war impairs, and may extinguish it. Competition, also, seriously threatens it. The Southern planter, indeed, has already found in it growing and formidable rivals. Cotton, the great staple of the South, is at this moment extensively cultivated for exportation in three quarters of the globe, in India, Brazil, and, lately it would seem, in Egypt. And the time cannot be considered distant when it must form no inconsiderable staple of the whole series of South American Republics. Driven, therefore, as, in a great measure, it appears to me it necessarily must be driven, from the European market, where is the Southern planter to find refuge and protection, except, indeed, in the home market, which it is one of the first objects of this bill to assist in establishing? And a refuge and protection it assuredly will prove, ample and unchangeable, (the derision and infidelity of gentlemen to the contrary notwithstanding,) if we will consent to extend to it, from time to time, that legislative aid which its necessities may require, and which its great national importance will always justify. The American market, at present, consumes probably one-fourth, at least one-fifth, of all the cotton grown in the South; stimulated to excess as that culture has been by the extraordinary demands upon it, growing out of the peace of Europe. Extend, therefore, extend to the cotton manufacture of this country efficient protection, and I mistake, utterly and hopelessly mistake, the genius and enterprise engaged in it, if, before the revolution of another national period—the period of ten years—it be not able to absorb all the surplus cotton of the South,—for a part of Southern cotton, from its quality, will always find a market in Europe; provided, no more additional lands be appropriated to its culture; and the quantity is said already to trespass greatly upon correct agricultural proportions.

But, the gentlemen of the South deny that the cotton market of Europe is in danger. They contend that they will always be able to undersell the foreign agriculturist in it. But, is not this confidence, Mr. Speaker, both dangerous and delusive? Can the labor of the slave be made as profitable as the labor of the freeman? And, if the labor of the slave be not as profitable as the labor of the freeman—and that it is not is almost universally conceded—how will the Southern planter be enabled to compete successfully, in years to come, with the millions of free agriculturists rising up and scattered over the immense and fertile regions of the Southern continent? He will be crushed by the competition; he must be driven from the market. There is, indeed, one method whereby the labor of the slave may be made more profitable than the labor of the freeman. The fact has been established; but, happily, not by the experience of this country, for the process is a dreadful one. It is by furnishing the wretched slave with the smallest portion of raiment sufficient to protect him from the inclemency of the elements, and graduating his coarse food to the minimum barely necessary to sustain, for the purposes of his labor, his miserable existence, stimulated into all its capabilities by the unceasing lash of the task master. A state of society, of servitude, and suffering, not more incompatible with the public opinion of the age than unequivocally abhorrent to the sensibilities of the South.

But gentlemen contend that England will refuse to purchase our cottons, if we refuse to purchase her fabrics. Mr. H. observed that this was no novel argument, but one which had been repeatedly urged in Congress, and also in the reviews and essays of the day. He denounced it; and particularly the principle upon which it is founded, as offensive and fallacious. And what, Mr. Speaker, is this principle? It is, that we, the guardians and protectors of the rights and interests of the good people of these States, should look calmly on, whilst our infant manufactures perish before us; or, that we should see them struggling into existence, unnoticed, unaided, and unprotected. That we should consent to postpone indefinitely one of our greatest interests, and subscribe, officially, to articles of virtual and lasting dependence upon foreign nations! For what? To protect the cotton culture of the South from imaginary extinction! Or rather, which is really the fact, to give to the English manufacturer the monopoly of the American market forever.

But the proposition which is assumed, that England will refuse to purchase our cottons if we refuse to purchase her fabrics, is wholly gratuitous. Long before this Government first manifested any serious disposition to foster the manufacturing interest, cotton had been extensively imported into England from India and Brazil, and its culture in those places sedulously encouraged. The English manufacturer purchases from the cheapest market, (can we suppose he can or will pursue for any length of time any other course?) entirely regardless of the country that grows it. It is true, the prices being alike, and the quality the same, he will purchase the cottons of every other country in preference to ours. And the cause is obvious. He has foreseen, from our uncommon skill as manufacturers, and the extraordinary progress which we have already made in every department of useful industry, that the time is not distant when the monopoly which he enjoys upon these shores will not only be extinguished, but rivals will here grow up to compete, with him, in all the great markets of the world. And hence his disposition to promote, in preference to ours, the agriculture of every nation, where new markets can be created. And this is the course which he will pursue—this indeed is the course which he must pursue—in despite of every effort of conciliation—of every act of favoritism which we may be disposed to extend towards him. As long as we continue to undersell the foreign agriculturist in the European market we shall be preferred—but certainly no longer. Every other consideration is idle—is but dust in the balance when weighed against this obvious, this irresistible fact.

But this bill, Mr. Speaker, is further said to be hostile to the general agricultural interest of this country. I must pass over very rapidly an objection so decisively extravagant. For where in the history of the world has the encouragement of manufactures ever proved hostile to the interests of agriculture? Look to the present age—go to the Lothians of Scotland; the rich agricultural districts of England; the kingdom of the Netherlands; the banks of the Rhine and the Elbe; the Rhone and the Seine; go indeed to every manufacturing hamlet, circle or city in Europe, and witness everywhere the refutation of this extravagant objection. Ask history—summon from the dead the Saracens of Spain, the Lombards of the twelfth century—the Genoese; the Venetian—ask the illustrious house of Medicis whether the fostering care which they awarded to manufactures proved hostile to the agriculture of the beautiful region over which they presided? Even our own short experience amply refutes the objection.

Wherever manufacturing establishments have been successfully located amongst us, the country has, in all instances, flourished around them—exhibiting the strongest evidence of their friendly influence upon the interests of the farmer. And were we disposed to receive, with due courtesy, the representations of our constituents, our tables at this moment would be covered with memorials from our agricultural constituents—at least from those of the middle States and the East and the West, praying for the protection of the manufacturer—experience having dissipated their early hostilities, and convinced them, by the most irresistible testimony, that in the protection of the manufacturer is embraced their own surest and best protection.

But the bill, Mr. Speaker, is said to be hostile to the interests of commerce. This, if sustained, would prove an argument entirely unanswerable. Inasmuch as it would not only render a resort to excises or direct taxation necessary to meet the ordinary expenditures of the Government, but involves seriously and lastingly the interests of the Navy. Mr. H. controverted this argument at some length. He maintained that it was opposed by the testimony of innumerable facts, and the universal experience of the commercial world—that commerce is directly promoted by whatever tends to promote national wealth and industry. That the bill, in its present shape, was as judicious a revision of the tariff as could be devised; and, consequently, that the interests of commerce and the revenue, instead of being impaired, would be promptly and decisively promoted by it. That domestic manufactures create a multitude of new wants, and furnish the means of gratifying them; and hence, consumption is increased; and hence, the loss which the revenue sustains by the lessened importation of articles manufactured at home, is more than repaired by the increased consumption of others; and that, if to these considerations be added the steady and extraordinary advance of our population, and the necessary increase of luxury, the interests of the revenue may be fairly regarded, as secure from all future contingency and danger. As a striking illustration of the above positions, Mr. H. referred to the example of England, whose revenue has constantly increased, exactly in proportion as the restrictive system, for the encouragement of the manufacturing interest, has been enforced. Mr. H. contended further, that a more rigid tariff than the present—a tariff for the ample and exclusive protection of the great objects of our industry, would, whatever might be its immediate operation, ultimately advance (and at no distant period too) the interest of commerce. Such a tariff, it is acknowledged, would extinguish some of the fountains of commerce—but open a four-fold number in their stead.

It is impossible for me to say, Mr. Speaker, how far the feeble encouragement which we have thus far awarded to our manufactures, has advanced the interests of the Treasury. But if numerous facts be not entirely fallacious, we have already reaped a golden harvest from the limited sacrifices which we have heretofore so reluctantly made. How is the present remarkably flourishing state of the Treasury to be accounted for, unless we refer it, partly at least, to the friendly operation of our manufacturing establishments upon our foreign commerce? The great markets of Europe are closed upon our agricultural productions. And we have lost, consequent to a state of general peace, the carrying trade of half the world. Besides, sir, from the cultivation of sugar within our own territories, and the lessened importation of West India spirits, the revenue, as formerly constituted, has been lessened millions. But, notwithstanding these fearful fallings-off (and fearful they would have been, and wide-spread and desolating in their influence upon ordinary nations) we are steadily advancing in the career of commercial prosperity. Successive Treasury reports mock the predictions both of friend and foe. The canvass of our marine—I use, or wish to use no figure—still swells upon the remotest seas, and our flag yet streams upon every shore.

And where, I demand, are the realities of those gloomy forebodings—of those appalling pictures of national bankruptcy—of taxes, loans, and excises, conjured up, and so gloomily portrayed, to alarm the fearful and despairing politicians of 1816 and 1820? Faded away forever, and lost in the light of that general prosperity, of that energy and enterprise, of that industry and universal improvement, which is shedding a distinguishing lustre around the present moment, and illuminating, with the intensest brilliancy, the path of our future destinies.

I would not mock, Mr. Speaker, the House with idle tales, with visionary pictures; but I must be permitted to repeat, and to reiterate, again and again, in despite of the sombre picture of the Speaker, and of the innumerable examples of deep distress, embarrassment, and ruin, which have been and may be referred to, during the discussion, that the real, the vital, the lasting prosperity of this country, is not only not impaired, but steadily advancing. And here I am gratified to find myself upon ground, which has been so ably pre-occupied by the distinguished member from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER.) And further, sir, when we take into consideration the state of the world, growing out of the peace of Europe, and our own peculiar embarrassments, resulting in a great measure from the disastrous and temporizing policy which we have heretofore pursued, our situation, I apprehend, will be found to be one, not of ruin or despondency, but rather of wonder and congratulation. Our prosperity has heretofore resembled a stream, swelled by transient and extraordinary causes, into a torrent. The torrent has subsided, and the traces of its desolation, it is certain, are every where visible. But the stream, sir, the stream remains; sunk, indeed, into its accustomed channels, but still full and flowing, diffusing every where, life, fertility, and blessings, throughout our vast domain. But, wherefore this concession? What, sir! Because this great nation—ay, great nation—in the vigor of youth, and the freshness of her glorious institutions, has been sustained without fainting or falling, under the tremendous pressure of the times, shall we, her rightful guardians and protectors, refuse to lighten officially her immense burdens, or lessen, by every possible means of legislation, the duration of that long minority among nations to which she must otherwise necessarily be subjected?

I have spoken incidentally of the disastrous policy which we have pursued. One moment, sir, in explanation of this policy, of its origin, progress, and results. A state of universal warfare in Europe, by putting into requisition our entire commercial and agricultural energies, flooded us with wealth. Success, by intoxicating, lulled us into a delusion in relation to our real and permanent interests, unhappily as profound as it became universal and alarming. And when the shock of reaction, consequent to the sudden and universal peace which succeeded, awakened us from our golden dreams, we were absolutely astounded to discover that bread could grow in other soils, and enterprise flourish under other flags. Our great markets closed suddenly upon us, and the convulsion which succeeded forms a memorable epoch in our history, and would have proved inexpressibly jeopardous to the safety of the body politic, had not the redeeming spirit of our institutions interposed to save it from dissolution. And even at this moment, it is not difficult to perceive; that a silent but powerful cause of indisposition, if not hostility, to the manufacturing interest, arises from an undefined wish, from a lingering hope, that the circumstances of the world would again open to us the carrying trade, and the profitable markets of Europe. Thus, betraying a disposition to stake, as desperately as ungenerously, our great and lasting interests upon the contingency of foreign war, and the consequent miseries of the human race!

But this bill, sir, has excited the hostility of the manufacturing interest itself, particularly of the flourishing manufacturing interest in the East. A single remark, in reply to this objection. This hostility, ungenerous and unbecoming as it may seem, is perfectly natural. The manufacturer has perceived, (and certainly the perception required no preternatural illumination,) that the ultimate operation of this bill, by bringing additional skill, capital, and competition into the business, will tend to lessen, rather than multiply, his profits. And hence his hostility. A fact worth a thousand speculations, urged, as they may be, with all the zeal and perseverance of the gentlemen of the South. Do not gentlemen perceive the dilemma to which this argument reduces them? The South combats the bill, because it will advance the price of goods, and thus operate as a permanent and oppressive tax upon its agriculture. The manufacturing interest of the East, on the contrary, combats it, because it will destroy monopoly, and reduce the price of the manufactured article below its present value, to the minimum of a living profit.

But, Mr. Speaker, is it correct policy, to stimulate, at this moment, by additional protection, the manufacturing interest of this country? This is the more immediate question before this House? My views, in relation to it, are soon expressed and easily understood. To the manufacture of cotton and woollen goods, of iron and glass, flax, and hemp, and lead, and all other manufactures, the material of which we either possess, or can create in abundance, and which are indispensable for our security and independence in peace and war, I would grant ample, and, as rapidly as circumstances would permit, exclusive protection. Between these, and the innumerable other articles which constitute a great mass of our foreign commerce, I would draw a line of perpetual distinction. The first, as I have observed, I would protect amply and immediately. For the last, I would remain dependent upon foreign nations, or reserve as subjects for future legislation. This, sir, very briefly expressed, is the manufacturing policy which I am disposed to advocate, and of which this bill, as originally reported by the Committee, was a fair exposition; a policy equally removed from the system of bounties and monopolies on the one part, as from the visionary and degrading system of foreign dependence and unrestricted commerce on the other. "A policy which purports not to protect the manufacture of gold and silver; not the velvets of Lyons, or the silks of Spitalfields; not the lawns of Brussels, or the laces of Cambray; not the clinquillerie or the bijouterie of Paris or Birmingham, but such as we feel the want of in time of war, and such as may fairly be regarded as of prime necessity, or immediately connected with agricultural wants and pursuits."—Professor Cooper.

And this policy, whatever may be said or imagined to the contrary, is the growing, and is, indeed, already the favorite policy of the American people. It is an appeal to their interests, their patriotism, and experience, which, from its very nature, must be irresistible. And gentlemen may denounce the bill in the bitterest possible manner; they may originate for it, and affix to it the most opprobrious epithets; and they surely have betrayed no lack of capacity in this respect; they may hold it up to public reproach, to public execration, as high and as perspicuously as they are able—stigmatizing it as a tax, levied most unrighteously upon the agricultural community; as "an odious monopoly," calculated to benefit the few at the expense of the many; as a "voracious idol," which is to swallow up all the other interests of the country; as "a vast experiment," got up for the amusement of speculative politicians; or, finally, as "a hateful and accursed measure," which is to bring down upon the Republic dissolution, penury, and pauperism. But, sir, in despite of this host of imaginary evils—of this storm of epithets, which gentlemen have literally showered upon the bill,—its policy, the American policy of the Speaker—will prevail—will remain fixed and irreversible—its foundation being deeply sunk in public opinion—in the confidence, favor, and affections of the people.

Permit me now to make a few general observations upon the bill. If there be a principle in political economy, or any other science, entitled to unquestionable assent, it is, that commercial restrictions, or a tariff of duties, calculated to protect the manufacturing or home industry, is indispensably necessary, in the present state of the world, to develop the resources, and establish the wealth of nations. It is a principle sustained by the universal testimony of the present and the past. Its truth is written in letters emphatically of gold, in the history of every country that has adopted it, and marked, on the contrary, in characters of ruin and bankruptcy, and utter extinction, in the examples of such as have rejected or abandoned it. It is the great wand, indeed, of the magician, which, when stretched over nations, sheds upon the most unpropitious regions the bounties and blessings of Providence; but which, reversed, withers away from the fairest portions of the globe the munificence of nature. Language, Mr. Speaker, as unequivocal as this, will probably be denounced as declamation; but it is notwithstanding the sober evidence of experience, in every period of the civilized world. Consult both ancient and modern history, and you will find the restrictive system, either in its natural or artificial existences, virtually the basis upon which every nation has erected the superstructure of its distinction and wealth. It was this principle which, upwards of thirty centuries ago, collected upon the rock of Tyre the riches of the ancient world, and which in modern Europe has given to Venice and Genoa, to Holland and England, a rank and influence among nations entirely denied them by the dispositions of Providence. Since the agitation of this subject, I have examined, or rather glanced over, the history of every distinguished modern nation in its relation to manufactures. And it is a striking and gratifying fact to observe in every instance civilization and science, intelligence, and freedom, dominion and wealth, following in their footsteps. From the modern Greeks, (in the twelfth century the most polished people in Europe,) they passed to the Venetians and Lombards. From the Lombards to the Hanseatic towns of Germany and Holland; from Holland to France and England. An imposing and magnificent march—destined to receive its final consummation, (who will presume to doubt?) in the land of Fulton and Franklin.

But the early manufacturing cities and nations of Europe, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) who opened this discussion says, have disappeared—have perished from the earth. And the eloquent gentleman seems to deduce from this fact a general argument against the manufacturing interest, as tending more than any other interest, from the contingent and perishable nature of its capital, to hasten prematurely, the decay of nations. But alas! sir, upon what communities, however constituted, does the breath of time alone pass over, not to blight or destroy? The Eternal City itself is sinking beneath the influences of an agent the most fearful and mysterious in its march of desolation of any of the hitherto visitations of the Almighty. The cities and republics referred to were the creations of accident—of fortuitous circumstances, from the beginning. And they have declined and perished by being absorbed by the nations around them possessing from nature most extensive manufacturing advantages, and availing themselves of them.

It is with nations, Mr. Speaker, as with individuals; and the economy of nations, it has been said during the debate, should be represented in miniature by the economy of well regulated families. I subscribe with pleasure to the doctrine. And the whole policy of the bill before us may be beautifully illustrated by the family of an American farmer. The farmer, in all the essentials of life, of food, and clothing, is perfectly independent. Accidental circumstances—a state of war, for example—brings to him, as it brings to every one, embarrassments and privations; but it does not, it cannot, abridge materially the necessities, or even the conveniences and comforts of his household. He is independent. But, independent as he is, he is willing to continue dependent upon other countries for the finer articles of clothing, and the luxuries of his table. And such is the nature of the independence which this bill contemplates to give to this country. I have not time to extend the illustration further. Yes, sir; it is indeed with nations as with individuals. And, if there be in national economy a spectacle more gratifying than the independence of an American farmer, it will only be found in that more extended and magnificent spectacle—the independence of this great Republic—with all its interests, agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing, aided, sustained, advanced, and carried to perfection.

But, what kind of tariff would gentlemen be willing to tolerate? What, I repeat, is the nature of the commercial system which they are disposed to establish as the permanent policy of this country? It is something which I can scarcely comprehend, and certainly not define. Something, I presume, graduated to the minimum of an ordinary revenue law, and based upon the principle of Adam Smith, that national prosperity is best promoted by an entire dissolution of commercial restrictions—by a free and liberal intercourse among nations. Come, then, let us test for a moment this specious, captivating theory. Let us pursue this free, this liberal system, to its legitimate, its ultimate consequences. Repeal your revenue laws; raze your custom-houses to their foundations; give your commercial restrictions, of every description, to the winds; and, after you have achieved these triumphs over the institutions—the delusions, if you please, of ages—go reap the golden, glorious harvest which awaits you. Alas! you have sown in the winds and must reap the desolation of the whirlwind. The Kalmuc of the Crimea will supply you with bread; the Copt of Egypt, and the Indian of Bengal with cotton; England, as formerly, with your household furniture, and France with the articles of your wardrobe. Your great interests paralyzed; your agriculture languishing; commerce declining; manufactures perishing; your—But, sir, I cannot, will not finish the picture. It is too utterly repulsive and extravagant. But, repulsive as it is, and extravagant as it may seem to be, it is a picture faithfully correct, and exhibits, in strong relief, the desolation and extremity to which the favorite system of gentlemen opposed to this tariff—the system of unrestricted commerce, in the present state of the world, if adopted and persevered in, would necessarily and rapidly reduce us.

But gentlemen contend that manufactures will naturally arise whenever population acquires a certain degree of density; that capital will seek its most profitable investments; will flow into its most profitable channels; and, consequently, that the interference of Government to give it impulse or direction, is to be deprecated as intrusive, unnecessary, and unjust. I do not say, Mr. Speaker, that such opinions are either "jargon or nonsense;" these would be ungracious terms, notwithstanding their recent application, from a distinguished quarter of the House, to a proposition apparently obvious and irresistible. But I do contend, that the doctrine which maintains that manufactures will arise of themselves, in the present age of stern and universal competition, without the aid and protection of Government, if not "jargon or nonsense," is mockery—the bitterest mockery. They cannot arise. It is true, that the ordinary domestic manufactures may arise and flourish, as they have arisen and flourished, in a remarkable manner among us. But the greater manufactures, national manufactures—the manufactures devoted to the great articles of commerce—cannot be established or sustained without the fostering and unceasing aid of commercial restrictions. They will otherwise fail, and sink, and perish, and be withered away from the face of the earth, before the skill, the competition, and enterprise, of older and more protected nations.

But England, gentlemen say, is tired of the restrictive system, and willing and anxious to abandon it. This fact, Mr. Speaker, if established, would prove a strong argument against us, inasmuch as we depend much upon the example of England for the illustration and defence of our doctrines. But what facts do gentlemen adduce, to prove that England is really tired of the restrictive system, and willing to abandon it? Is it from the occasional declamation which we hear, and to which we have been referred, in the English Parliament; or is it from the letters of English commercial agents; or from essays in English newspapers and reviews, written designedly to mislead and bewilder other nations—particularly this country? Is it from sources like these that gentlemen have deduced the proposition that England is tired of her commercial system, (the restrictive system,) and willing to abandon it? England tired of her commercial system! Sir, it is a system so interwoven with every tissue and fibre of her existence, that the relaxation of a moment would seriously endanger its vitality. England tired of her commercial system! England is self-styled "the fast-anchored island"—"the mistress of the seas." Let her but abandon her commercial system, and the bark—the proud, proud bark—of her destinies will be driven, almost instantaneously, from its innumerable moorings, and soon dismantled and a wreck, with the billows of the ocean dashing over it! England tired of her commercial system! England is the Queen of Islands—the great mart of the commercial world. Let her but abandon her commercial system, and this day and generation shall not pass, before she shall become desolate and a waste, and present to history, like the Babylon of the Apocalypse, a mighty and memorable ruin, from age to age, forever. England tired of her commercial system! But, why should England be tired of her commercial system? Has it failed to accomplish any of the great objects for which it was established? On the contrary, has it not rendered her distinguished and wealthy and powerful beyond all example, and beyond all calculation? We are told in Eastern fables of gold unbounded—of riches inconceivable. We read in classic history of Plutus and Midas and the golden sands of Pactolus. But these fables—these brilliant dreams of poetry and romance—have been realized—ay, more than realized—by the commercial system of England. Her land is the land of palaces; her streams are richer than the sands of the Lydian river; and her commercial and manufacturing cities present wealth more abundant than the gold of the modern Ophir, or the multiplied productions of the hither and further India. But, with all her wealth, England is, notwithstanding, gentlemen observe, the land of debt irredeemable, of paupers, and taxation. True, sir, true; the result, however, of every cause rather than her protective system—of her ruinous and interminable wars; of the bitter blessings of legitimacy; of kings and courts and pensioners; and that all-pervading and unceasing spirit of parade and expenditure, which, by the perversion of public opinion, is regarded as indispensable for throwing a becoming splendor round the altar and the throne; and sustaining, what Burke has absurdly denominated the grace and majesty of a great people!

But, sir, the very fact that England has been enabled to accumulate her immense debt, and sustain herself under its tremendous pressure, appears to me to carry with it strong evidences of the extraordinary influences of her system upon the resources and wealth of nations. There are several facts which so strongly illustrate the results of her restrictive system, that I must be permitted to present them to the House. The revenue of England has amounted, in a single year, the Speaker has informed us, to four hundred millions of dollars! An unprecedented fact in financial history. Again, sir. The annual interest of the English national debt amounts, at present, to between one hundred and fifty and one hundred and sixty millions of dollars! a sum greatly exceeding the whole interest and principal of the national debt of this country; and which, moreover, is sufficient to provide for, and maintain comfortably at one great public table, the entire population of the United Kingdom forever! But, sir, there is another fact which exhibits the resources and wealth of England to an extent still more unprecedented and extraordinary. In 1798, when the genius of the modern Cæsar was carrying the victorious arms of the French Republic over Europe; at a moment when the excessive loaning system of Pitt had excited dismay and consternation throughout the moneyed circles, and the Kingdom itself seemed tottering upon the brink, if not of revolution, at least of some great convulsion—at this moment, I say, of universal despondency, the idea was conceived that the attitude of the nation might still be preserved, and the vast expenditures of the war successfully met by additional impositions upon the revenue and income of the people of England, or, in the language of the Exchequer, by creating the supplies within the year. The idea was adopted; England was thrown upon her own resources; and, in less than twenty-three years, in addition to the loans and the ordinary war taxes of the Kingdom, already carried to the supposed maximum of possible payment or endurance, upwards of three thousand millions of dollars were realized from the internal revenues of the Kingdom; a sum largely transcending the entire wealth dug, for ages past, from all the mines of all the world. A single remark more in relation to England. Contrast her situation, for a moment, with any other country that has pursued an opposite commercial system—with Spain, for example. England is, naturally, the land of mist and gloom; a comparatively barren island in the Northern ocean: Spain, the most delightful region in the temperate zone. Three hundred years ago Spain was rich and powerful—so much for the industry of the Saracens: England, poor and resourceless. About this period, they exchanged commercial systems, or rather, they adopted new ones; and the result, after the lapse of three centuries, is before the world. England sways a sceptre, compared with which, the power of the Roman Cæsars shrinks to nothing. But Spain—sir, it would be as possible to give form and stature, and flesh and blood, to the ashes of her ancient kings, as to extort, by any possible means of legislation, from the entire population of the Spanish monarchy, the ordinary revenue of England for a single year. And yet, sir, such is the result, the splendid, the magnificent, the almost inconceivable result, of a system which is so bitterly denounced, even in its least exceptionable parts, in its application to this country!

I will detain the House but a few moments longer. But, before I take my seat, I must be permitted to express my surprise and regret at the extraordinary excitement which the system under consideration has produced. It embraces no monopoly. On the contrary, there is not an article which it purports to protect, which time alone, unaided and unprotected, would not establish. No, sir. The policy of this bill, I mean the policy of efficient protection to the great objects of our industry, is no sickly exotic, whose miserable existence can only be sustained by unceasing nurture and protection, but the hardy native plant that, unassisted, attains slowly to maturity, but which strikes its roots deeply, and extends its branches loftily in proportion to the care and protection which we award to it.

The adversaries of the bill affect to regard it as a question, whether we shall, or shall not become, a manufacturing people. This is not the question. We are already a manufacturing people; the greatest, with the exception of France and England, in the world—at least in the Christian world. We manufacture, by computation, from one hundred to one hundred and fifty millions of dollars worth of fabrics—similar articles of which we imported, or the greater part of which we imported, before and since the Revolution, from England, France, and Holland. The monuments of our dependence upon the old world, are yet every where visible. Within our immediate vision stands a house (and such houses are found in all the Atlantic States,) built of imported materials, and constructed probably—for in many instances houses were so constructed—by European artificers. The progress indeed which we have made in every department of useful industry is unexampled. And if gentlemen would but look back and observe what we have accomplished for the last thirty years, by means of our own unassisted energies; and then look forward for the same period, and reflect upon what these energies—stimulated and sustained by protective laws, and operating on the rapid development of our internal wealth and resources, may and must accomplish, a single glance at the brilliant prospect would be sufficient—at least should be sufficient to remove all doubts—to extinguish all apprehensions, in relation to the policy under consideration.

But I despair of being able to direct the attention of gentlemen either to the past or the future. They are so deeply interested with the present moment, in combatting the shadows—the Gorgons and Chimeras, which imagination has conjured up from this bill, that both precedent and prospect are alike lost upon them.

But the bill is further denounced as a novel project—as a vast and wanton experiment—as a bill containing new and extraordinary principles. Sir, it is neither project nor experiment. It contains no new nor uncommon principles.

Its principles, indeed, are as ancient as history; and have been incorporated into the policy of every nation, distinguished for success in commerce or the arts. A novel project! Sir, it is the policy we combat—the unrestrictive system of modern economists, the dissolution of all tariffs—which is the real novelty of the day. A system captivating in theory, but totally inapplicable to the present state and temper of the commercial world. The age of free commerce, like the millennium of Patmos, the reign of universal peace, is evidently reserved for times less stern than ours. The temple of Janus, we may confidently predict, will be closed for the last time, and forever, among men, before its revolutions commence. But to close my remarks—What sir, is the real nature of the bill before us? of this “fearful, frightful bill?” of this “stamp act measure?” which is to be the precursor, if we are to credit the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) who immediately preceded me, of rebellion and revolution? of this “fire-brand,” which is about to be thrown (not indeed into the Ottoman empire but) into a region of spirits infinitely more fiery and formidable than Turk or Greek—the South? What I demand is the real nature—the pervading spirit—the grand design of the bill before us? Sir, the full front and face of its offending, is this, and simply this, to secure to American industry, by a liberal, progressive, and protective tariff, the monopoly of our own resources—of that vast manufacturing material, which nature, in her munificence, has every where created around us, in immeasurable abundance.

I have nothing further to add, but to thank the House for its indulgence, and apologize for having trespassed so long upon its time.

FRIDAY, April 16.

The SPEAKER presented a memorial of John Ross, George Lowrey, Major Ridge, and Elijah Hicks, delegates from the Cherokee nation of Indians, representing the unwillingness of the Cherokees to abandon the territory upon which they now reside, declaring their determination to pursue peaceably, agriculture, manufactures, and the mechanic arts, and praying that the General Government will protect their rights.—Referred to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER also presented a petition, signed by Thomas Law, Walter Jones, and Elias B. Caldwell, a committee appointed at a public meeting of the citizens of Washington, praying the attention of Congress to the pecuniary embarrassment of the country, and the establishment of a national paper currency, as best calculated to remedy the evil.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to divide the district of Kentucky into two judicial districts; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RICH, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of John Mitchell, accompanied with a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. GURLEY, the Committee on Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of relinquishing to the parish of West Baton Rouge, in Louisiana, the title of the United States to a tract of land containing about eight acres front on the Mississippi, for the purpose of making and keeping in repair a levee on said land.

Bills from the Senate, of the following titles, viz:

- 1st. An act for the relief of Hezekiah Langley and Benjamin M. Belt;
- 2d. An act for the relief of Thadeus Mayhew;
- 3d. An act for the relief of Ichabod Lord Skinner;
- 4th. An act to alter the times of holding the district court in the district of Missouri;
- 5th. An act for the relief of Thomas Hewes; were, severally, read the first and second time, and referred; the 1st, to the Committee of Claims; the 2d, to the Committee of Claims; the 3d, to the Committee on Roads and Canals; the 4th, to the Committee on the Judiciary; and the 5th, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

A Message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: “An act for enclosing the burial ground of Christ Church, Washington parish;” “An act to provide for the sale of the warehouse at the former quarantine ground, near the English Turn, in the State of Louisiana, and for the erection of a dwelling house at the Balize, in the said State, for the use of the boarding officer at that place, and for other purposes;” “An act supplementary to an act of Congress, passed on the 30th day of June, 1812, entitled ‘An act making further provision for settling the claims to land in the Territory of Missouri;’” “An act for the relief of Elijah Van Syckel, of Philadelphia;” and “An act for the relief of Thomas Shields;” in which bills the Senate ask the concurrence of this House.

Three Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, to wit:

AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. GOVAN, from the committee to which was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to the suppression of the African slave trade, reported a bill respecting the slave trade; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passing of this law, if any citizen of the United States, or any person resident therein, shall, in any port or place whatsoever, build, or in any respect fit, equip, man, load, or otherwise prepare, or cause to be prepared, or in any respect fitted, equipped, manned, or otherwise prepared, or be in any respect concerned in equipping, manning, or preparing any ship or vessel, for the purpose of being employed in the slave trade, or in the transportation of slaves from any foreign port or place to any foreign port or place whatsoever, for the purpose aforesaid, every such citizen or other person, so offending, shall, on conviction, be punished by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding seven years; and such ship or vessel, her tackle, apparel, furniture, provisions and cargo, on board thereof, shall be forfeited. And any citizen, or other person resident as aforesaid who shall voluntarily serve on board such ship or vessel, or shall sail on board thereof, knowing the same to be intended to be employed in the slave trade, or in the transportation of slaves as aforesaid, shall, on conviction, be liable to be punished by fine not exceeding three thousand dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding five years.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to affect, or in any wise repeal, any acts hitherto passed for the prohibition or suppression of the slave trade; but the same acts, and every clause thereof, shall remain in full force, in the same manner as if this act had not been made.

CLAIM OF DANIEL D. TOMPKINS.

The report of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the claim of D. D. TOMPKINS, which, on motion of Mr. COCKE, was laid on the table a day or two ago, was taken up.

Mr. COCKE then moved to recommit the report to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill. This motion he grounded on the fact that, to agree to the report of the committee, would only leave the matter where it was before. He proceeded to examine, in detail, the report of the committee, in part of which he said he cordially acquiesced, being willing to make every just, and even liberal allowance to this individual, and in other particulars of which he was of opinion the Government was not bound to make to Governor Tompkins any indemnification whatever. He specified the sort of allowances which he was disposed to make, and those to which he objected. He concluded his observations, by moving the instructions to the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill, viz:

“1st. To authorize an allowance of interest on all moneys advanced by Daniel D. Tompkins on account of the United States, from the time of making the advances until its repayment.

“2d. To provide indemnity for actual losses sustained by him in consequence of the United States failing to furnish him with money and Treasury notes within the time stipulated, and on account of which failure the losses were sustained.”

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, made a few remarks expressive of his opinion, that the most liberal adjustment of the accounts of this officer should be made. He would not only settle his accounts liberally, he said, but, if within the powers of this House, he would vote him from the national funds any reasonable amount of compensation besides, for the eminent services he has rendered his country. This country must be reduced low, indeed, if it was not disposed to remunerate such services as his. Such a man as Daniel D. Tompkins was not always to be found when wanted. The virtue and integrity of that man led mainly to the fortunate termination of the war with Great Britain. He would not trammel the settlement of his accounts with the same checks and restrictions as are required upon the settlement of the accounts of a disbursing officer, acting under prescribed rules; for, when the United States had no credit, that individual had not spared his own—at a time, too, when, as our fleets were endeavoring to get to sea, there were men, in a neighboring State, who showed blue lights as a signal to the enemy. The destinies of this nation were, in a manner, in the hands of that man, and his patriotism and virtue saved us from disgrace and defeat, &c.

Mr. McLANE suggested to the gentleman from Tennessee the propriety of a recommitment, with less limited instructions.

Mr. COCKE professed a desire to do every thing that justice should dictate to Governor Tompkins, and any modification of the instructions, compatible with that view of the subject, he was willing to assent to.

Mr. McLANE then expressed his views of this subject. He considered it unfortunate that the subject had been again brought before the House, and was averse to a recommitment of it now, because it was at too late a period of the session to take up the subject de novo, and act upon it. He then stated what was the particular situation of the accounts of this gentleman, adverting to the act of Congress passed at the last session, and the principles of the report of the select committee on which that act was founded. At that time, he suggested, the subject of these accounts underwent an elaborate discussion. The question, whether or not it was proper to make an equitable settlement of the claims of Governor Tompkins, was then decided in the affirmative. If the House were now to undertake to resettle these claims, he did not know when any settlement of a principle by this House was to be considered conclusive. There must be some end to questions of this sort, and he was desirous that the same weight should be given to decisions on questions of right by Congress, as if the same decisions had been made in a court of justice. On the question of commissions, for which the President was disposed to make a liberal allowance to Governor Tompkins, and which the accounting officers were disposed to allow, on the principles usual in the settlement of ordinary accounts, Mr. McL. said, that Mr. Tompkins had procured for the Government, during the war, loans of money for the use of the Government to the amount of one million eight hundred thousand dollars, and had also disbursed those funds; and, without the aid which it thus received from this individual, every one must know that the operations of the war would have been exceedingly embarrassed. For this service, of borrowing and disbursement, it was proposed to allow him a commission of five per cent., which would make an amount of about $95,000. And of this amount, Mr. McL. said, there was a sum of $460,000, for which the Government had agreed to send to the Vice President Treasury notes to take up the personal notes which he had given for it. But the Treasury notes did not arrive until his own notes had become due and been protested, by which his credit was destroyed, to which, in a great degree, all the subsequent losses and misfortunes of this gentleman were to be attributed. The Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. McL. said, did not wish to reinvestigate this case, or they would have been disposed to recommend a more liberal allowance than was proposed. If instructed, however, by the House, it would be their duty to take it into consideration. He replied to some other suggestions of Mr. COCKE, as to the nature of the services rendered by Mr. Tompkins in the capacity of a Major General. If the gentleman had had an opportunity of becoming fully acquainted with the facts on the subject, he would have learned that his services, in that capacity, had been of great importance. On one occasion he had left his family, then in a deplorable situation, and departed in the night for the frontier, where he called forth the militia, and at that moment saved the country. The Committee of Ways and Means, he added, would have acceded to the propositions of the Vice President, in regard to the difference which now exists between him and the Government, if they had not considered the law of the last session so broad as to make any further legislation on the subject unnecessary.

Mr. HAMILTON rose to testify to the fact of the Vice President having exercised military command during the war, which was within his personal knowledge.

The question was then taken on Mr. COCKE's motion, and decided in the negative by a large majority.

And the question was then taken on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, referring the subject back to the final decision of the President, and decided in the affirmative, without a division.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill for the revision of the several acts laying duties upon imports—the question being on Mr. RANDOLPH's motion for the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE rose and said, the unsolicited indulgence of the House, to which he was indebted for the opportunity of presenting his views on this interesting subject to-day, instead of being compelled to perform that duty yesterday, under the fatigue and exhaustion of a long sitting, had laid him under obligations of which he was profoundly sensible. The only return, however, said Mr. McD., which I can promise, for the kindness thus shown to me, is the brevity of the remarks which I propose to offer. At so late a stage of this already protracted discussion, I cannot flatter myself with the expectation that I shall interest the attention of the House by the novelty of my arguments, but must be content to indulge the hope that I may not exhaust its patience by their prolixity.

During the progress of this debate upon the various questions which have arisen upon the details of the bill, I have studiously avoided entering into the consideration of the general principles and policy of the protecting system. And I have done so in compliance with this general rule, by which I have determined to regulate my conduct, so long as I have the honor of a seat upon this floor, never to consume the time of the House by discussing any question which is not distinctly before it for consideration. I have the less cause to regret having thus abstained on the present occasion, because it is now obvious that the subject has assumed more than its usual interest, as well from the crisis at which we have arrived, as from the peculiar circumstances under which the question is now presented to us. In all the various stages of our proceedings, we have still had before us the opportunity of reviewing our work. But the question being now on the passage of the bill, whatever decision we shall make upon it, will be, as to us, final and irrevocable. And we are called upon to give this final sanction to the measure, with the fact clearly ascertained, that it cannot be adopted but by a very small majority. Waiving, for a moment, any inquiry into the policy of protecting domestic manufactures, I put it to gentlemen to say whether prudence does not dictate, even to the most firm and independent statesman, that a measure laying very heavy burdens upon the whole community—a measure which, however we may speculate upon the subject, the people must sensibly feel—a measure which has already produced, in some parts of the Union, the most intense excitement, ought to be adopted with a bare majority of the national representatives in its favor? Sir, a Government emanating from the people, and responsible to public opinion, ought not to be indifferent to this prudential consideration. I do not profess to be minutely acquainted with the Parliamentary history of Great Britain; but I hazard little in asserting that no British Minister, in the height of his ascendancy, would venture to pass even a tax bill for the public service, to the extent of this, with a majority so small as that which has ordered this bill to its third reading.

This measure, all agree, is part of a system intended to produce a great and fundamental change in the policy of the country—a change, to be effected by disturbing the relations which now exist between the different portions of the Union and the different classes of society. That such a change as this can be produced by legal regulations, operating, of necessity, as a tax upon the people, without exciting a strong feeling of popular discontent, not to say indignation, is an expectation which gentlemen delude themselves if they indulge. An acute and lively sensibility to every invasion, by Government, of the rights of property, is one of the strongest characteristics of freedom in modern times; and there is no people on earth more distinguished for it than the citizens of the United States. I therefore submit it, respectfully, to the consideration of the friends of the manufacturing interest themselves, whether there is not serious danger that a measure of this character, enacted by a lean majority, will produce a reaction among the people, which may result in the entire prostration of the system they are so anxious to foster and extend.

In soliciting the attention of the House to a very brief examination of the policy of this measure, it is far from my intention to enter into a formal dissertation upon the general principles of political economy. This is neither the place nor the occasion for such dissertations. My observations shall be confined to a practical examination of the question, in reference to the actual state of things in this country, assuming, as a basis, a few palpable and obvious principles, which have long ceased to be questionable in the estimation of the most enlightened philosophers and statesmen of Europe.

Whilst, sir, on the one hand I unequivocally deny, what is maintained by some, that manufacturing industry is, in itself, more profitable than agricultural or commercial, I distinctly disclaim the notion, maintained by others, that the pursuits of agriculture are more profitable than those of manufacture or commerce. All such notions are utterly erroneous and visionary, and are founded upon a misconception of what it is that constitutes wealth, and of the principles which regulate the distribution of capital and labor. What is wealth? The wealth of a nation consists in the abundance of those articles which administer to the necessities, the comforts, and the luxuries of life, according to the existing habits of society. It results from this, that a combination of the products of agriculture and of manufacture is essential to the wealth of a civilized community, such as exists in the United States. With the most unlimited abundance of the products of agriculture, we should be poor without the products of art; and with an equal abundance of manufactures, we should perish without the productions of the soil. It is conceded, on all hands, that we abound in articles of the latter description; and the only question to be debated is, how can we most advantageously obtain the former? Shall we fabricate them ourselves or import them from abroad? To the common understanding of mankind, it would seem to be a self-evident proposition that the cheapest mode of obtaining them is that which a nation ought to pursue, as it is certainly that which individuals would pursue, with a view to the promotion of their own interest. But here we are met with the argument that commerce is a barren and unproductive pursuit. A very few remarks will serve to refute this notion, which, when examined, will be found to be a mere verbal proposition. It is true that commerce does not produce either the one or the other of the elements of wealth, but it communicates value to both. Without commerce the surplus production, both of individuals and nations, would be utterly valueless. Of what value, for example, are the surplus productions of the manufactories of Manchester and Birmingham, either to us or to those who produce them, until, by the agency of commerce, they are brought to our stores and distributed to the consumers? It would be precisely as correct to say that their entire value is derived from commerce, as to maintain that its operations are unproductive. Either proposition would be equally absurd. While, therefore, I view any proposition, which asserts the superior productiveness of one of the great divisions of human industry over the others, as being not only erroneous, but absolutely unmeaning and unintelligible, I admit that the wealth of a community depends upon the maintenance of a due proportion between them. And the question for a practical statesman to determine is, how is this proportion to be maintained, so as to produce the greatest aggregate benefit to the community?

H. or R.

The Tariff Bill.

APRIL, 1824.

On this question, if I may be permitted, and I scarcely know whether I ought to venture upon it, I will lay down a general principle, upon the authority of Adam Smith, who, notwithstanding the terms of sweeping condemnation which have been applied to his speculations, has done more to enlighten the world on the science of political economy than any man of modern times. He is the founder of the science. All that has been since done is but a development or modification of the principles he established. What, then, is his great elementary principle? That labor and capital, if left to receive their direction from individual sagacity, will naturally seek, and speedily find, the most profitable employments. And this is founded upon the idea that individuals are more capable of forming a judgment as to what will promote their pecuniary interests, than the most enlightened Government can possibly be, from the very nature of things. This, however, is denounced as empty theory! Every thing, it seems, which does not result from legislation, from the officious restrictions of Government, is to be regarded as the operation of a ruinous theory. But, sir, I put it to the common sense and common observation of every gentleman in the House, whether this theory does not rest upon the most steady and immutable and powerful principles of human action—principles which never cease for a moment to actuate the great mass of every community. What stronger instinct belongs to the character of man than that which impels him to improve his condition? And what conceivable obliquity of perception can prevent him from discovering, upon a survey of the various pursuits which are open to him, that from which, with his peculiar capacities, he can derive the greatest profit? I can very well imagine the case of a rude and barbarous people, unaccustomed to the enjoyments of civilized life, in which a Government, despotic in its character, and rising much above the existing state of intelligence in the country over which it holds dominion, might produce great and beneficial changes in the pursuits of society by legal regulations. The Government, for example, which should conduct a people from the hunter to the shepherd state, or from the latter to the agricultural, would undoubtedly confer the most signal benefits upon the community. Such a change, however, could be accomplished only by a gradual improvement of the people, and by giving them a taste for comforts and luxuries to which they were unaccustomed. But, I will venture to say that there is not a people on the face of the earth to whom a policy of this kind would be so utterly inapplicable as to the people of these United States. What, sir, is their character? Is there a nation more acute, ingenious, or enterprising, more keen and sagacious in perceiving the avenues to profit, or more prompt and energetic to pursue them? Do they need the direction of this Government to indicate the way to individual prosperity? Shall we undertake to enlighten the capitalists of Boston as to the most profitable mode of investing their disengaged capital? They would laugh to scorn the folly and impotence of such officious dictation. It will scarcely be alleged that our people have not a taste for the products of manufacture. For all the productions of human industry—for all the articles, at least, of which we propose to encourage the domestic fabrication, the people of this country have perhaps too keen an appetite. Indeed, the complaint of the friends of this measure is, that they import them in too great abundance. No legislation, therefore, is necessary to create a demand for those articles. In such a state of things, the general principle is indisputably true, that capital and labor will naturally flow into the most profitable channels of industry, without the control of Government.

But, to this general principle I admit there is an exception, which I will candidly state. And here I will take leave to remark, that, anxious as I am to defeat this measure, which I believe would be ruinous to some portions of the Union, and beneficial to none; yet I would not, if I could, accomplish this object by stating any principle which I believe to be false. An elevated morality, which regards the establishment of correct principles as more important than victory, should characterize our deliberations here. I admit then that when from the revolutions of trade or the progress of society a crisis has occurred in which a great and fundamental change must take place in the distribution of the capital and labor of a nation, a wise, moderate, and cautious legislation may aid in effecting the change, and is even necessary to effect it in the manner most beneficial to the community. But, sir, if we attentively examine the principles upon which this proposition is founded, we shall perceive that useful legislation on this subject is confined to very narrow limits, and that there is much greater danger of doing harm by transcending these limits than by abstaining from legislative interference altogether.

What, then, are the principles upon which the interference of Government can be justified, in such a crisis as that to which I have alluded? In the first place, the habits of a community, operating with something like the force of laws, will induce an adherence to accustomed pursuits, after they have ceased to be profitable. But the principal ground upon which the protecting policy can in any case be justified, is the inability of infant manufacturing establishments to sustain a successful competition with their foreign rivals, even after the country has reached the point at which the domestic article can, with the experience of a few years, be fabricated cheaper than the foreign. And here, sir, the limit of the protecting system is distinctly indicated. It must be satisfactorily shown, that the protection sought is only temporary; and that, after a reasonable time is given to acquire experience and skill, and bring the domestic manufactures to perfection, they can furnish the domestic fabrics cheaper than similar fabrics could be obtained from abroad. Now, if we apply these principles to the actual protection heretofore extended to our domestic manufactures, it will be seen that the Government has already fulfilled its obligations to them, in the amplest manner. Gentlemen have argued this question as if the manufacturing interest of the country had been unjustly assailed by some foreign power, and Congress had manifested the most cruel indifference to their sufferings. But is there the slightest foundation for either of these assumptions? The only power with which our manufacturers have had permanently to contend, is the superior natural advantages of the foreign artisan; and I will now call the attention of the House to the protection which our establishments have actually received from this Government. I venture to assert, that since the commencement of the restrictive system in 1807, the manufacturers of this country have enjoyed an unusual and artificial stimulus from our legislation; and I am perfectly satisfied that it is this extraordinary stimulus that has given them that voracious appetite for prohibition which nothing, it seems, but the absolute protection of all rival articles can satiate.

The Tariff Bill.

H. or R.

Manufactures not protected! Why, sir, during the restrictive system, our commerce with the manufacturers of Europe was almost entirely annihilated, and our own manufacturers had little short of an absolute monopoly of the home market. And here, sir, let me call the attention of these practical gentlemen, who so contemptuously discard every theory but their own, to the effect of this restrictive system, upon the distribution of the capital and labor of the country. During the five years of commercial restrictions which preceded the war with Great Britain, when there must have existed in the country a superabundance of surplus capital, suddenly disengaged from commerce, we find that manufactures, notwithstanding they enjoyed the advantages of a prohibitory system, made but a very slow and gradual progress. If gentlemen would duly consult this portion of our experience, I think it would at least admonish them to have a little patience. They would see that, under any possible protection which legislation can provide, particularly in time of peace, when there is no extraordinary consumption of manufactures, these must, in the very nature of things, advance by slow degrees. It cannot be otherwise, unless we ascribe to an act of Congress the magical power of forcing on manufactures beyond the natural capacity of the country, either to produce or to pay for them. Yes, sir, it would be well for us to reflect that it is much more easy to diminish the consumption than to increase the production of manufactured articles, by prohibitory legislation. Such was undoubtedly the effect of the restrictive system. But the measure which gave the strongest impulse to our manufactures, was the war of 1812. And here it is worth remarking, that a war with England gives a stimulus to manufactures, which no other kind of protection can possibly afford. For, at the same time that it cuts off our trade with the nation that principally supplies us with manufactures, it compensates the diminished consumption of them by the people, by the extraordinary consumption of the Government. At the close of the war, the system of double duties was continued till 1816, when the existing tariff was enacted for the avowed purpose of sustaining those establishments which the war had brought into existence, against the extraordinary influx of foreign manufactures, resulting from the universal restoration of peace in Europe. And while I contend that the tariff of 1816 afforded a most liberal protection to the manufacturing interest, I most perfectly accord in the policy which dictated that measure. I distinctly recognise the principle, that, wherever large investments of capital have been made in consequence of a state of things produced by the necessary acts of the Government itself, the Government is under a moral obligation to extend to the interests, thus created, a reasonable protection.

But, sir, what is a reasonable protection in such a case? Can it be expected that the manufacturing interest is to be maintained permanently in the same degree of prosperity that it enjoyed during the war? That it is to be exempted from a participation in that general distress which has pervaded the whole community? This would not only be unreasonable, but utterly impracticable. Nothing but a perpetuation of the war could have accomplished so much for the manufacturers. What, sir, was the light in which the tariff of 1816 was viewed by the liberal statesmen who then supported it? It was intended merely to mitigate the shock which our manufacturing establishments must experience, in passing from a state of general war to a state of general peace. More than this was neither expected nor claimed by the manufacturers themselves. As the persons then engaged in the business had nobly sustained the war, gratitude mingled with justice in the policy adopted. But no intelligent man was so visionary as to expect that, when the ordinary channels of trade, so long obstructed, were suddenly opened, there could still be maintained, by artificial means, the same demand for domestic manufactures as before. It was apparent that many of the existing establishments must go down, and that neither the wisdom nor the folly of human legislation could possibly prevent it. And, sir, such has been the fact. Eight years of probation have elapsed since the passage of the existing tariff, and, if policy or humanity required it of us, it is now too late to relieve the distresses of those manufacturers who made their investments during the war. Those of them who have been enabled to sustain themselves till this time, under the extraordinary pressure of the four or five years immediately succeeding 1816, when the country was almost literally overwhelmed with the surplus manufactures of foreign establishments, can certainly maintain themselves now, when foreign commerce is rapidly returning to its ordinary channels, and contracting within its proper limits. Those who have passed through the furnace, do not require to be protected from the ordinary heat of the sun. And it is a fact that they now stand firm, and constitute the most prosperous interest of the country. As to those who were swept away during the disastrous period to which I have alluded, they are irretrievably destroyed, and beyond the reach of our remedies, unless, indeed, we had the power of producing a resurrection by an act of legislation.

It is obvious, then, that the protection of these establishments, which originated in the war, is not the object of the present bill. It does not even assume this modesty of pretension. Doctrines are now advanced, which never entered into the conception of those who advocated the tariff of 1816—doctrines which, though maintained by gentlemen who have waged a special war of sneers and sarcasms against the theories of political economy, throw into the shade the boldest theories of the French economists. We are now told that it is the duty of a paternal Government not only to protect existing interests against extraordinary reverses which it has contributed to produce, but to create new manufactures and new pursuits, by the mere energy of legislation. The people, it is said, are absolutely idle and in wretchedness, for the want of employment; and a gentleman from New York, (Mr. Wood,) who often edifies the House by his philosophical speculations, has told us, if I understood him correctly, that 30 per cent. of our population are actually in idleness for the want of pursuits to which their labor can be applied. These three millions of people, who are thus destitute of employment, as the gentleman has demonstrated by statistical tables and mathematical calculations, (the obvious and palpable facts to the contrary notwithstanding,) are to obtain employment by the notable expedient of an act of Congress!

[Mr. Wood here explained. His argument was, he said, that thirty-three per cent. of our population produce no more than fifteen per cent. ought to do. Thirteen and a half per cent. only of our population, he calculated, was absolutely employed in productive industry, and in this proportion was included the army, navy, and public officers, amounting to three and a half per cent.]

I am glad, resumed Mr. McDuffie, that the gentleman has removed an erroneous impression from my mind as to the extent of his argument. But, even modified and limited as it now stands, it will be difficult to make it pass current for a practical argument. Is it in the power of tables and calculations to make any man seriously believe, in opposition to the evidence of his own senses, and to the result of his general observation and knowledge of the country, that one million of our population are not only idle, but destitute of employment? Shall we be told, in a country like this, abounding with almost interminable wilds of fertile lands, that a tithe of the people are suffering for the want of something to do? Sir, there are innumerable avenues to employment in this country, and if any man were to make his complaint to me that he was without employment, I could tell him simply to go to work. That is the obvious remedy, a remedy in the reach of every one; and, if it were more generally pursued, there must soon be an end of this wretched and delusive dependence upon the quackery of legislation for employment. Sir, I boldly assert that there is not a single individual in the vast extent of this Republic, that cannot readily obtain, not only employment, but such an employment as will enable him to improve his condition. This is the only country on earth where a common laborer, of industry and enterprise, can, in the course of an ordinary lifetime, besides comfortably supporting himself and his family, leave to his children an inheritance of real estate: and, with these facts staring us in the face, we are required to believe, on the authority of tabular statements, that the people can only be saved from suffering and discontent, by the adoption of this measure, to provide them with employment. The gentleman from New York, by way of confirming his general conclusion, has stated that the wages of a laborer in his vicinity, is only twelve and a half cents a day. In answer to this, I can only say to the gentleman, that, if his distressed neighbors will only make a transition from Long Island to any other point in the whole Union, even the most unfavorable, I will be responsible for their obtaining fifty cents per day. But, as the cry of distress has been reiterated until it has made a strong impression upon the country, I beg leave to recur, with a view to illustrate and enforce them, to some remarks which I offered during the discussion of the duty on cotton bagging. I believe the causes of the disease, and the tendency of the proposed remedy, to be equally misconceived, as to some portions, at least, of the Union. I stated, on the occasion to which I have referred, that the distresses of the country, such as they were, resulted from the change of circumstances occasioned by passing from a state of war to a state of peace, in connexion with the excessive issues of bank paper, which threw forward and increased the pressure of the evil. During the war, there was a considerable proportion of our population—those engaged in the military service of the country—who consumed the products of the grain-growing States, but produced nothing. All those States which were near the theatre of war, found a ready market, and high money prices for their grain. To them the war was therefore a source of prosperity, and peace was, in one sense of the word, regarded as a calamity. And whence do we now hear the loudest complaints of distress? Whence come the most strenuous demands for the passage of this bill? From the very points of the Union which enjoyed the advantages of a war demand and war prices for their produce—New York, Pennsylvania, and the Western country. You cannot define the boundaries of any State more accurately, than you can trace the limits of the region of country favorable to this tariff, by the positions of our armies in the late war, and the multiplication of banks during that contest, and since its termination. Pennsylvania and the Western States supplied the Northwestern army, and I believe the Government paid as high as one hundred dollars per barrel, at the theatre of war, for flour purchased in Ohio; a State now unanimous for this tariff. New York, every one knows, was in the immediate neighborhood of extensive and permanent military operations, and supplied numerous armies with provisions. Now, it happens that the very States I have enumerated, have been most afflicted with the curse of banks that did not pay specie, (a delusive expedient to perpetuate the war prices and war prosperity,) and have also been most earnest and persevering in their appeals to this Government for protection. New England, and the Southern States, on the contrary—States which sustained the privations of the war without the same mitigating circumstances, and from necessity regulated their enjoyments by the rules of a severe and self-denying economy, are now to be subjected to an onerous taxation—and for what? Not to relieve the other States from positive distress, but to restore certain interests in them, to the state of artificial prosperity which they enjoyed during the war. During the whole period of that contest, the Southern country was deprived of a market for its great staples, and there was nothing in the military operations of the Government to compensate the loss. Even if the people had devoted themselves to the growing of grain, there were no armies in the field to consume it, and that, like their cotton and tobacco, would have remained without a market. In this state of things they not only ceased to make any progress in wealth, but were compelled to contract their accustomed expenses, and use an economy before unknown to them, to provide a decent maintenance for their families. These habits made the return of peace, to them, the harbinger of prosperity. It is a dispensation of justice resulting from the very nature of things, that those who suffer the greatest privations in war, shall be least affected by the changes resulting from the restoration of peace.

But, sir, I will venture to assert, that the Middle and Western States have, at this moment, as large a share of the means of positive enjoyment as any other portion of the Union. Their distresses are relative, and in a great degree imaginary. It is not what they are, but what they were, that causes the prevailing discontent. The reduction of an inflated currency has reduced the nominal price of property; and the man who, a few years past, estimated his wealth at fifty thousand dollars, and now finds it only twenty-five, complains of his distresses as though he were in want of the necessities of life. I admit that the Western people are embarrassed, but I deny that they are distressed, in any other sense of the word. Where is the evidence of actual suffering? In some of the Western States, I am informed, they have no poor laws at all, and such a being as a pauper is scarcely known. Regarding, therefore, the aggregate enjoyments of the whole community as the true criterion of national happiness, I should select the Western States as the part of the Union where the highest degree of prosperity prevailed. Indeed, sir, I believe there is not on the face of the earth a region of country of equal extent, where so few are suffering from poverty, and where the means of comfortable subsistence so abundantly reward the toil of the laborer. It is not distress, I repeat it, but discontent, that has excited this rage for creating wealth by legislation. To prove this, I will advert to another standard of prosperity, referred to, very unfortunately, I think, for his own purposes by the honorable gentleman from New York, to whom I before alluded. He told us that the prosperity of a nation was indicated by the increase of its population; and then favored us with a beautiful disquisition on the comforts of matrimony, and the duty of a Government to promote it. I perfectly accord with these views of the honorable member; but I must be permitted to say, that, according to the criterion to which he has referred, there is no other nation so prosperous as the United States, and no part of the Union so prosperous as that from which we hear so much about their distresses. And if the honorable member wishes to promote the cause of matrimony, I would advise him to send his twelve-and-a-half cents per day laborers to the Western country. What, sir! a country which doubles its population in ten years, call upon the Government to relieve it from distress, by creating new employments! The thing will not bear examination. The historian will scarcely be credited, in future time, who ventures to record it. Permit me to call the attention of the House to a few facts, illustrative of this part of the subject, which I am sure will not be disputed. In the States where the public lands are in market, you can purchase land of the first quality for one dollar and fifty cents—one dollar and twenty-five cents, says a gentleman near me—when land of the same quality is worth, in some parts of the Union, fifty dollars per acre. This single fact speaks more than volumes of declamation on the subject of popular suffering. Indeed, it may be safely asserted, paradoxical as it may seem, that the imaginary distresses of the Western country proceed from the very abundance in which they possess the primary aliment of national wealth. What is their complaint? Not, as one would suppose, the scarcity, but the superabundance of the necessities of life. And here, I will observe, that nothing, in my opinion, has contributed more to the existing derangement in the elements of wealth in the Western States, than bringing the public lands into market injudiciously, and without any regard to the existing demand. The inevitable tendency of this policy, by overstocking the market, is, to reduce lands to the minimum price; and if that were fixed at fifty cents per acre, the land would command no more. The consequence is, that the people purchase large quantities of productive lands, which have all the constituents of value, but scarcity. And, because they have not every thing else in proportion, they are discontented and restless. And I will avail myself of this occasion to declare, that I never will give my vote to bring another acre of the public lands into the market, but under the strongest conviction that there is a fair and natural demand for it. Our very system converts our land into a mere drug in the market, and the people into speculators.

I will now take the liberty of addressing a few words especially to the Representatives of the West, on the subject of their own interests. A subject upon which I certainly will not presume to instruct them. But I am sure they will excuse a friendly admonition, when I state the particular topic to which it relates. I am well assured that the permanent prosperity of the West depends more upon the improvement of the means of transporting their produce to market, and of receiving the returns, than upon every other subject to which the legislation of this Government can be directed.

On measures of this description, I have heretofore given them my earnest and cordial support. Most of my colleagues, and many others, who represent the Southern portion of the Union, have pursued the same course. As for myself, nothing will induce me to change my views or conduct on the subject; but I submit it to the dispassionate consideration of the Western gentlemen, whether there is not danger, that, by urging upon us a system which we believe to be oppressive, they will alienate the kind feelings of the portion of the country to which I have alluded, and lose its co-operation in relation to that system of internal improvements, which, in my opinion, is of more importance to the West than all the tariffs that can be passed in half a century.

I will also present another view of certain interests of the West, which are intimately connected with the portion of the country I have the honor to represent.

Gentlemen are aware that a very profitable trade is carried on by their constituents with the Southern country, in live stock of all descriptions, which they drive over the mountains and sell for cash. This extensive trade, which, from its peculiar character, more easily overcomes the difficulties of transportation than any that can be substituted in its place, is about to be put in jeopardy for the conjectural benefits of this measure. When I say this trade is about to be put in jeopardy, I do not speak unadvisedly. I am perfectly convinced, that, if this bill passes, it will have the effect of inducing the people of the South, partly from the feeling, and partly from the necessity growing out of it, to raise within themselves, the live stock which they now purchase from the West. It is at least certain that more will be lost in this trade, than is gained in that of cotton bagging.

I will now attempt to show that the progress which our manufactures have made, and are now making, is as rapid as they can make consistently either with their own prosperity or that of the country. And I must be excused for saying that the attempt to make this a great manufacturing nation, suddenly, and by a single sweep of legislation, is more indicative of restlessness than of wisdom. The country seems to me to have been excited to that kind of feeling which actuates an individual speculator—a vain desire to become wealthy by a bold dash, but utterly regardless of the maxims of prudence, and the habits of industry and economy, which are indispensable to the attainment of his object. The friends of this measure appear to me to have overlooked entirely these practical considerations, upon which the policy of such a measure as this must depend. The progress of manufactures must be regulated, not by our desires, but by our capacities. Now, I believe there is no proposition, in which the gentlemen who are best informed on the subject of manufactures will more generally concur, than that it is essential to their own prosperity that their progress should be slow and gradual. Their success depends mainly upon capital and skill; and it is utterly impossible that they can advance, prosperously, faster than the one is accumulated, and the other acquired. And when I speak of capital as being essential to the progress of manufactures, I mean surplus capital—capital which does not find a ready employment in the pre-existing pursuits which have produced it. It is in vain that gentlemen tell us we have capital, unless they can show that it is disengaged, and seeking investment. And here I will remark to the gentlemen from the Western States, and the interior of the Middle States, who are the most strenuous advocates of this measure, that they cannot participate, to any considerable extent, in the advantages which are anticipated from this system. Sir, if you were to prohibit commerce altogether, manufactures would follow capital; and Boston, Providence, and Philadelphia, the points at which there is the greatest accumulation of it, and the greatest difficulty of investment, would realize the principal part of the benefit resulting from the restriction. Before the interior of the Middle States or the Western States can hope to enjoy the advantages of this system, they must be protected not only against foreign competition, but against that of New England. But I have heard it contended, and I believe the argument has weight, in the estimation of many, that the Boston manufacturers are opposed to this bill, because they dread the domestic competition that it will rear up. There cannot be a notion more absolutely fallacious than this, as will be seen upon a moment's examination. It assumes that the Boston manufacturers, who flourish in defiance of foreign competition, cannot compete with those domestic rivals who are now claiming the protection of the Government, and who admit that they cannot sustain the foreign competition! This involves the absolute inconsistency that the weaker rival is more to be dreaded than the more powerful.

Sir, I repeat it, that almost the entire benefit of any protection you can extend to manufactures, will be engrossed by those portions of the Union to which I have referred, as having superior advantages for that business. But I shall be told that manufactories do already exist in the interior of the Middle States, and in some of the Western States. But upon what principles and under what circumstances have most of those establishments grown up? And what is the extent of the market they can command? To this inquiry I ask the attention of the House for a few minutes. I maintain, sir, that the manufactories to which I have just alluded, have risen up and flourish because they enjoy a sort of local monopoly, and that they cannot command a market beyond the sphere of that monopoly. I will advert, for the purpose of explaining this view of the subject, to what was said very correctly by the Speaker the other day—that it was better for a people, abounding in the products of the soil, to give a high price for manufactured articles, provided they could thereby obtain a market for their produce, than to obtain manufactures at much lower prices, from those who would not take produce in exchange for them. Take, for example, any district of country in the interior, producing a large surplus of grain, which the foreign manufacturer will not take in exchange for his fabrics. Is it not obvious that the manufacturer who would, under these circumstances, erect his establishment in the supposed district, and take the products of the soil in exchange for his manufactures, would enjoy a perfect monopoly of the local market, and be absolutely free from foreign competition? The farmer has nothing to give but grain. This the foreign manufacturer will not take. It is to no purpose, therefore, that the foreign fabric can be purchased cheaper, if the only thing the farmer has to give will not be taken in exchange for it. And, on the other hand, the farmer can well afford to give a higher price to the domestic manufacturer, who will give him a good price for his grain. To present the same idea in another view, the value of any given trade depends as much upon the highness of the price of what is sold, as upon the lowness of the price of what is bought. It results, therefore, that the foreign manufacturer, who will not take the produce of the farmer at any price, must be absolutely excluded from the competition with the domestic manufacturer, provided the latter will take it, even at a very low price. It is upon the same principle, that, within a very small sphere, even household manufactures, in one sense the dearest of any, can hold a competition with those made by the most perfect machinery. The error of the argument, however, which has been founded upon the foregoing principles, consists in the assumption that the manufactures, thus sustained by local monopolies, can, under the protection of this bill, maintain a competition in distant markets, beyond the sphere of the monopoly. But that is impossible. In fact this bill can have no effect at all in favor of those manufactures; for how can they be benefited by excluding foreign manufactures that never come in competition with them? As to the more distant markets, those which are now supplied by foreign commerce, nothing is more certain than that the manufacturers of Boston, Rhode Island, and Philadelphia, will occupy them.

APRIL, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

That our domestic manufactures cannot hold a successful competition with those of other nations, except at the points of the Union most eligibly situated, and, consequently, that the attempt to make this a manufacturing country, in a much greater extent than it is already, is unwise and impracticable, will be apparent, from a few considerations, to which I solicit the attention of the House. In all those manufactures which principally result from manual labor—such, for example, as iron—the high price of labor here, which is the most conclusive evidence of our prosperity, renders it impossible that we can maintain a competition with foreigners. It was stated by a gentleman from Kentucky, on a former occasion, that our citizens labored but eight hours a day, whereas the manufacturers of Inverness and Dundee labored sixteen. And, he asked, emphatically, if we were disposed to compel our population to labor sixteen hours per day, also? I answer, no. But is it not evident that, if our manufacturers labor only eight hours a day, they cannot compete with the foreign manufacturer, who labors sixteen, even if they are equally skilful? Can leisure contend with industry, unless you give it a premium? I do not complain that our citizens devote less time to labor than the people of other countries. I rejoice, on the contrary, that they can live more comfortably than any other people, with half the labor. But I do complain of this attempt to divert their industry into pursuits, in which they must either double their exertions, be involved in ruin, or receive a bounty at the expense of the country. Indeed, the admitted fact, that a common laborer in this country receives double the wages that a common laborer receives in the most favored nations of Europe, and labors little more than half the time, conclusively demonstrates the impolicy of protecting, by duties, those manufactures, of the price of which labor is the principal constituent.

But, sir, I admit that, owing to the improved state of the machinery by which most of the articles we import are fabricated, (those manufactured of wool and cotton,) labor constitutes a very inconsiderable item in their cost. In determining, therefore, the question how far such manufactures can successfully contend with foreign competition, more depends upon the price of capital than upon the price of labor. How, then, stands the comparison between this country and England, assuming the rate of interest as the standard of that comparison? The rate of interest in this country is higher than it is in England, in the proportion of about five to three. The English manufacturer, therefore, has the decided advantage, indicated by this proportion, over the American, so far as capital is concerned; and a much greater advantage, so far as labor enters into the estimate. And these are advantages against which we should have to contend, even if our machinery and skill were equal to those of our foreign rivals. The only circumstances which can tend to counterbalance the disadvantages under which we thus labor, are the superior cheapness of the raw material, and the saving of the charges of transportation, which are incurred upon the imported manufacture. The former advantage exists only in the case of manufactures of cotton; and the latter is quite inconsiderable, owing to the very small bulk of the articles imported, in proportion to their value. The two circumstances taken together, will not put us on a footing of equality with the British, even in relation to cotton fabrics. But, as relates to woollens, as we are laying a high duty on the raw material, the advantage will be on the side of the British manufacturer, in all the constituents of the price of his fabric, the transportation excepted. In this comparative view, I have not taken into consideration the duties imposed upon foreign manufactures, because my object is to compare and estimate the natural advantages of this country, and that from which its principal importations are made, for prosecuting the manufacturing business. For, it is only when the natural advantages of our own country are not decidedly inferior to those of the country which supplies us, that the application of artificial or legislative aids can be expedient.

Now, we cannot disguise the fact that Great Britain has a decided ascendancy over us in the aggregate of natural advantages for manufactures. She has a vast surplus capital, the accumulation of centuries. We have very little capital that is not readily absorbed, either in the business which produces it, or in some of the pre-existing pursuits of the country. She has a crowded population, driven, from the necessity of their circumstances, to labor for a bare subsistence. We have a population thinly scattered over a vast and fertile territory, capable of sustaining ten times the number of human beings that now inhabit it. While these permanent natural advantages are against us, advantages resulting essentially from time and the progress of population, and which nothing but time and the progress of population can counteract; it is in vain that we attempt to legislate ourselves into a great manufacturing nation. Nature rises up against it, and every attempt to countervail her laws must be impotent. I admit that it is possible to bring our machinery to perfection, and to acquire manufacturing skill in a comparatively short time. These results may illustrate the power of genius. But what human power can suddenly give this nation an accumulated surplus capital, and a crowded population; or, in other words, convert a young country into an old one? We have all the advantages of a youthful and growing nation; and, if we were wise, we would be satisfied with our lot. But we vainly aspire to attain the advantages peculiar to an old nation, without participating in the disadvantages of age. If capital could be obtained at three per cent., and labor for half its present price, as they may be a century hence, I have no doubt we could surpass the British manufacturers in the excellence and cheapness of their fabrics. But would any one purchase success upon such conditions? In other words, would any one consent to reduce the income of every capitalist in the country thirty-five per cent., and of every laborer fifty, for the mere purpose of enabling our own manufacturers to undersell the British in our own markets?

But, sir, even if it were true, that the interest of this country required that we should give an additional encouragement to manufactures, I think it can be shown that this is almost as injudicious a measure as could be devised for that object. It is obvious that the cotton and woollen are the only manufactures of any importance, which can claim to be protected, consistently with the general interest of the country. These are made by machinery; and nothing is more certain than that it is such manufactures only, that we can hope to make as cheap as we can import them. Now, let us examine the provisions of this bill, as they bear upon these two descriptions of manufacture. As to cotton fabrics, no protection is claimed by those manufacturers who have made the largest investments, and have the deepest interest in them: but protection is obtruded upon them by the officious kindness of those, who, it seems, understand their interest better than they do themselves. But as to woollen fabrics, although they are protected by ultimate increase of twelve and a half per cent. duty, yet this is fully counterbalanced by the ultimate increase of forty-five per cent. duty on the raw material. There cannot be a greater inconsistency than that in a bill professedly designed for the protection of domestic manufactures, the raw material of one of the most important of those manufactures should be subject to a much higher duty than the manufactures themselves! And here I will advert to an authority which has not only escaped the denunciations of the advocates of this measure, but received their most unqualified eulogies—I mean the authority of Alexander Hamilton—of whom, whatever odium the party conflicts of his time may have cast upon his political character, I will say, that this country has never produced a statesman of higher endowments. And although I widely differ with him as to what are said to have been his views of the principles of our Government, yet none of his contemporaries, unless Washington be an exception, entertained more profound and correct views of its policy. The name of Hamilton has been introduced into this discussion, as a sanction to the heterogeneous provisions of this bill. I wish to God, sir, he were living and present, to vindicate himself from so unjust an imputation! Recurring to his recorded opinions, what does he recommend? That a heavy duty should be laid upon unmanufactured wool? The very reverse. He recommended not only that it should be imported duty free, but that a bounty should be given upon the importation. If you really desire to promote and protect domestic manufactures, it is our true policy to encourage, instead of discouraging, the importation of the raw material, so that the manufacturer may obtain it as cheap as practicable. But instead of this, you absolutely lay almost a prohibitory duty upon the raw material. Upon what can this be founded, unless upon the erroneous and unjustifiable policy of buying up different interests to insure the passage of the bill? I presume I may use this language without offence, as some gentlemen have distinctly avowed that they view this measure as a compromise of interests; or, in other words, that one provision is to be regarded as the consideration for another. But, sir, I do most earnestly protest against this principle, as one of the most dangerous that can be introduced into our legislation. Each provision should stand upon its own separate and distinct merits, and if it cannot be sustained in this way, it ought to be abandoned. But, in relation to this article of wool, it is a mistaken notion to suppose that you really promote the interest, even of the wool grower, by laying a heavy duty upon foreign wool. The only effectual mode of benefiting the wool-grower, is to increase the domestic manufacture, and, consequently, the demand for wool; but you defeat this object precisely in the degree that you increase the duty on the raw material. Great Britain has recently made an experiment upon this very subject, which is not unworthy of our attention. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, with a view to reconcile the landed interest to a considerable increase of taxes, laid a duty of six pence per pound on foreign wool, which has, theretofore, been subject to a nominal duty only. The consequence was, that the export of woollen manufactures was rapidly reduced, the market for domestic wool, and consequently its price, were diminished, and all the interests connected with wool were seriously injured.

But, sir, there are various other articles embraced in this bill, the duty upon which, so far from promoting manufactures, will operate directly against them. Iron, which enters largely into the cost of the machinery used in all the manufacturing establishments—and hemp, a raw material used in various manufactures, which we propose to encourage, are considered by the friends of this measure as two of the leading articles entitled to the protection of Government. Indeed, we are told that this is not a bill for the protection of manufactures merely, but for the protection of home industry. The argument is, that we ought to discourage, by duties, the importation of every article which can be produced at home, whether it be the product of manufacture or agriculture. Sir, there never prevailed in an enlightened body so perfect a delusion. It assumes that foreign commerce is a national evil, that every nation that can furnish us with the articles we consume cheaper than we can make them, is an enemy to our prosperity; and, in a word, that we should be more prosperous and wealthy, if there were no country in existence but our own. Disguise it as you may, sir, this scheme of protecting home industry in the general, without reference to the kind, involves the almost entire annihilation of foreign commerce. It embraces within its proscription, as I stated on a former occasion, almost every important article of human consumption. When it is urged that too much of our capital and labor are applied to agricultural pursuits, and that we ought to encourage manufactures, because we have not a due proportion of our industry devoted to that essential branch of national wealth; though I believe that existing laws and the natural course of things, will afford all the encouragement that ought to be desired; yet I can understand the argument. It is not only intelligible, but plausible. But when it is contended that we must protect and encourage, by duties on rival productions, not only manufacturing industry, of which it is alleged we have too little, but agricultural, of which we have too much, I confess myself utterly at a loss to comprehend what is the practical end at which gentlemen are aiming. But, whatever may be their aim, it is certain that the result of their system would be the destruction of commerce. If we make every thing we consume at home, we will, of course, import nothing; and if we import nothing, it is a self-evident proposition that we can export nothing.

Sir, we have been urged to the adoption of this measure by the highest considerations that can be addressed to the patriotic spirit of a free people—we have been told that it is essential to the independence of the country and the defensive power of the Government. No man can be more sensible to these considerations than I am; and by no one, I believe, have they been more sincerely and anxiously regarded. There is no sacrifice essential to the independence and safety of the country that I would not make. I would disdain the huckstering spirit that would even count the cost of these objects. But, if I am not greatly in error, the bearing of this measure upon our independence and safety as a nation, is precisely the reverse of what gentlemen have supposed. I believe there is no proposition relative to the policy of this country, in which politicians of all parties so generally concur, as that the Navy is the most important arm of our defence. Now, the naval power of the country absolutely depends upon its commerce and navigation; and you impair the one precisely in the proportion that you diminish the others. The sailors who fight your battles in war, must be trained in your merchant ships during peace. You may build ships, but you cannot make sailors, upon an emergency. How, then, stands the argument on the subject of national defence and national independence? In order to provide iron, and hemp, and clothing—articles of which the production could be increased so as to meet all the demands of the country in six months from the declaration of war—you destroy the elements of our naval power, which cannot exist in war, if they are not created in peace, by the slow and gradual operation of commerce.

But we have been informed, in the course of this debate, that this measure will have the effect rather to increase than diminish our foreign commerce! A most extraordinary anticipation, certainly; and it requires the most unlimited faith in the efficacy of political nostrums, to believe it can be realized. Our commerce now consists in exchanging the productions of our soil for the manufactures and peculiar productions of other countries. The great mass of our imports consists of manufactures.

Now, the professed object of this measure is to provide a substitute for foreign manufactures, and thereby prevent their importation. Is it not self-evident, then, that you will diminish our existing commerce precisely to the extent that you augment your domestic manufactures? But this wonder-working bill, it seems, is to furnish a substitute for those branches of our foreign commerce that it will destroy. If any thing, on such a subject, is susceptible of demonstration, I think it is the delusiveness of such an expectation. Of what, I ask, is this new commerce to consist? It will be at once perceived that it cannot exist without new articles, both of exportation and importation.

What, then, shall we be enabled to export that we do not now? Manufactures, it is said. But, can it be seriously contended that manufactures, which cannot hold a competition with the foreign in our own markets, with the heavy duties which have existed for the last eight years, but require the additional protection provided in this bill, can maintain a successful competition in foreign markets? In other words, when, with an average protection (including duties and transportation) of at least thirty per cent., we cannot command the home market, how is it possible that we can command the foreign markets, in which we shall have no such protection? I do pronounce it to be absolutely a visionary expectation. For at least half a century to come, the British manufacturers will exclude us from foreign markets. A few occasional exceptions, resulting from peculiar circumstances, do not weaken the general proposition.

But, another inquiry remains to be made in relation to the commerce which is to compensate for that which we destroy. What description of articles shall we import in this new commerce? It cannot be manufactures, for our policy excludes these of course. They are to be our exports under this new system. What, then, shall we import? The productions of the soil? These, we are told, are superabundant, and literally rotting on our hands for the want of a market. This new commerce, then, is to realize the splendid but empty vision of exporting every thing and importing nothing! By such a commerce, we should certainly avoid one evil which haunts the imaginations of some gentlemen: The balance of trade would never be against us. But, sir, let us examine this subject a little more minutely. It is said we shall export our manufactures to South America. There we shall come in competition with British manufactures. Admitting, for a moment, that we could sell our manufactures as cheap as the British could sell theirs in the markets of South America, yet we should be excluded, because that country produces nothing that we want, but precisely that which our rivals want. The great staple of South America will be unmanufactured cotton, which is the great staple of this country also. And nothing can be more idle than to calculate upon a profitable commerce, or, indeed, any commerce at all, between two countries that produce precisely the same articles for exportation. The argument, therefore, that our commerce will not be diminished by this system, is, in my judgment, utterly fallacious. And even if it were true, in point of fact, that a new commerce could be substituted for that which we cut off, it would only be giving up a natural and profitable, for a forced and unprofitable trade. And here I will remark that there seems to be a palpable inconsistency in the arguments of the advocates of this measure. They tell us, in one breath, that their object is to relieve the country from its dependence on foreign commerce, and in the next, that our foreign commerce will be increased. If this latter proposition be true, our dependence on foreign commerce will be greater under the proposed system than it now is. And, unless it can be shown that this measure will produce two opposite and inconsistent effects at the same time, it will be difficult to make out the proposition that our commerce will be increased, and our dependence on commerce diminished.

I will now invite the attention of the House to a few remarks as to the practical operation of this bill upon the community. Whatever may be its effect upon domestic manufactures, I speak advisedly when I say it will operate as a tax upon the people to the extent of at least four millions of dollars. And whether the proceeds of this tax shall go into the national Treasury or into the pockets of individuals, the thing about which there can be no doubt, is, that the tax will be paid by the people. If it shall operate merely as a revenue measure, it will not benefit the manufacturers, and is subject to the objection that it is unnecessary, and therefore oppressive, taxation. If it shall operate to exclude foreign manufactures, it is liable to the still greater objection of being not only an oppressive, but an unproductive tax. The people pay, but the Government does not receive. In point of fact, it will probably, for a short time, operate partly as a productive, and partly as an unproductive, tax; partly as an increase of the revenue, and partly as a bounty to the manufacturing interest. But we are advised to submit quietly to these burdens, and to be satisfied with the assurance that we shall, at some future time, obtain the domestic manufacture as cheap as we can import the foreign. Let us examine this idea for a moment. And I would remark, at the threshold of the examination, that it is not sufficient for gentlemen to show that the articles for which they claim protection can be made at home as cheap as they can be imported from abroad under our system of revenue duties; but they must further show that they can be made as cheap as the foreign articles could be imported if there were no revenue duties levied upon them. Suppose, for example, that the gentlemen could clearly make out their case, that all the manufactures we import can be made at home precisely as cheap as we now import them, but no cheaper; and, to make the illustration more complete, suppose that they actually were made at home, and that the foreign importation had ceased. What would be the result? It is true we should obtain the articles as cheap as we do now, but we should lose the whole revenue of the country derived from imposts, and be compelled to resort to other sources of revenue. Even, therefore, in the case supposed, the country would sacrifice above fifteen millions of dollars per annum at the shrine of this anti-commercial system. And this is the strongest case which can be supposed in favor of domestic manufactures. The supposition that they can ever be made as cheap as the foreign fabrics could be imported free of duty, is too extravagant to be indulged for a moment. And yet this supposition, chimerical as it is, must be realized before any benefit can result to the country from this measure, to compensate the great and palpable sacrifices which it involves.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Looking to the operation of this measure upon the different classes of the community, it may be fairly stated as its general result, that it will sacrifice the laboring classes for the benefit of the capitalists. And when I say capitalists, I include as well those who employ capital in some of the products of agriculture, as in manufactures. You propose to protect, by duties, not only manufactures, but wool, hemp, and even grain. Ridiculous as the duty upon this last article is, it serves admirably to illustrate the genius of the system.

Although the manufacturing interest makes the most prominent figure in this scheme of protection, the question is no longer between the manufacturing and agricultural interests, but between all those who produce more than they consume of the articles subject to duty, and those who purchase that surplus production. From this it is obvious, that but a very small part of the community can enjoy the benefit of this system, which operates as a permanent tax upon the remainder. As to the manufacturers we know their number is exceedingly small in comparison with the aggregate of our population. But the smallness of the number of farmers who can be benefited by this bill, is not so obvious. There exists a delusion on this point, which is easily removed. It is supposed that the great mass of the farmers will participate in the bounties provided. But every practical observer must know, in relation to wool, for example, that a great majority of the farmers can produce no more than they consume in their own families. It will be the more wealthy farmers, therefore, who will realize the advantages, such as they may be, of this compromise with the manufacturers, while the small farmers and the whole class of mere laborers will be compelled to bear the burdens of the system, such as they certainly are, without the slightest equivalent. No man has pretended, no man will venture to assert, that the price of labor will be increased by this measure. That, sir, the thing which most deserves encouragement, is left unbountied to its fate. I do pronounce it, that this is a combination, not only of the few against the many, but of the wealthy against the poor; we take from those who have not, and give to those who have. I speak with studied precision when I say, that those who consume what they do not make, are taxed for the benefit of those who make what they do not consume. These are the true antagonist powers of this system.

The experience of Great Britain, of whose prosperity we have had such extravagant descriptions, furnishes a most striking and conclusive illustration of that tendency of the protecting system which I am now considering. It is true, that Great Britain is a nation of vast power and resources. To the eye of a distant beholder, she undoubtedly presents a splendid spectacle. But history, while it records the achievements of her policy and her arms, says nothing of the condition of her people. If you but look beyond the dazzling surface, you will see a vast population pushing their industry to the utmost extent of their physical power, for a bare subsistence, to say nothing of the great proportion (about one-sixth, I believe, of the whole number) who are absolutely or partially dependent upon public charity. Yes, sir, the fact is so universally true in that country, that the wages of labor never rise higher than to the point at which the laborer can barely subsist and perpetuate his race—that it is laid down by the British writers on the subject, as a settled principle of political economy. If, from disease or other casualty, a laborer is unable to work for a week, he runs the risk of perishing. It never enters into the calculation of the British laborer to improve his condition in life; and it is in the power of very few, even to lay up a pittance for the future. Such is the condition of the great body of the people of Great Britain, who have been characterized by the Speaker as the happiest people on earth, and held up to us for our special admiration.

But, sir, even if the prosperity and happiness of Great Britain were much greater than they are, upon what principle of sound reasoning can they be ascribed to her system of commercial restrictions? I am ready to admit, if gentlemen desire it, that her prosperity is derived mainly from her manufactures; but I unequivocally deny that these have been fostered into existence by the restrictive system. A few palpable facts of her history will render this apparent. Which of her manufactures have been the great sources of her prosperity? Those of cotton, wool, and iron, undoubtedly. Will any gentleman venture to say that these have derived their prosperity from the protecting system? Where, sir, is the nation that ever for a moment held a competition with Great Britain in cotton fabrics, and against whom, therefore, protection was necessary? From the first moment of its existence, this manufacture in Great Britain, like the raw material in our Southern States, set all competition at defiance. Neither ever needed or received the protection of Government. Both have succeeded, because the countries in which they respectively flourish are peculiarly adapted to their production. The same remarks are true (though not so strikingly true) in relation to manufactures of wool and iron. On the contrary, those manufactures which have been forced into existence by artificial stimulants, are regarded by all the enlightened statesmen of the present day as so many obstacles to British prosperity. This is emphatically true in relation to the manufactures of silk. In fact, sir, you might as well tell me that the muscular energy of a giant is derived from the fetters he sunders into atoms, as that the prosperity of Great Britain is derived from her restrictive system.

But we have been admonished to adopt this system, with a view to countervail the restrictions and bounties by which other nations sustain their domestic industry; and it was conceded by the Speaker, that, if all other nations would pursue the same liberal policy, it might be expedient to leave commerce unshackled. I am perfectly willing to meet the gentleman upon this ground; and if I do not show that the principal restriction which the existing laws of foreign countries impose upon our commerce operates as a protection to our manufactures, instead of giving them a claim to the protection of this Government, I will acknowledge my entire ignorance of the subject. What, then, is the principal restriction of which we complain? It is the exclusion by Great Britain of our grain from her market. And what claim does this give our manufactures to the interference of Congress? How does it operate against them? On the contrary, is it not perfectly apparent that it operates in a two-fold manner to give them an advantage over their British rivals? By raising the price of grain in England, it enhances the price of labor there; and by diminishing the price of grain here, it also diminishes the wages of the laborer here. As far, therefore, as labor enters into the price of manufactures, this very restriction (of British policy) is a direct encouragement to our manufacturing industry. But, perhaps gentlemen will say, it is the growers of grain whose interests require us to countervail this injurious restriction. But how do you propose to accomplish this object? The British Government injure our farming interest by excluding our grain and reducing its price! And we are called upon to relieve the farmer, not by increasing the price of the grain which he has to sell, but of the manufactures which he must purchase! Sir, there is more spirit than wisdom in such a policy as this: it defeats its own object.

I will now offer a few remarks upon another view of this subject, to which our attention was called by the Speaker. He told us that this Government ought to pursue, as nearly as practicable, such a policy in relation to the different portions of the Union, as each of those portions would respectively pursue, if existing as a separate confederacy. Let us then inquire what would be the relative situation of the principal subdivisions of the Union, if each were free to legislate for itself. And I will first examine the probable condition of that subdivision which the Speaker himself represents—the Western country. If that region were separated from the rest of the Union, and formed a distinct confederacy, how would it stand in relation to this very question? It would derive its supplies of foreign manufactures principally through the Atlantic States. I presume it would, because it has done so heretofore, and it would continue to be the interest of the people to do so. What would be the result? What power would they have in regulating the imposts upon foreign merchandise, and how could these imposts affect their interests? It is obvious that they would have no agency in regulating the tariff of duties, and would yet have to pay, indirectly, the amount of those duties, in the increased price of imported articles they would consume. In a word, the Western States would be tributary to the Atlantic States. When, therefore, the gentlemen from the West call upon us to adopt this measure for their benefit—a benefit which I am sure they will never realize—they require us to do what they could not themselves do, even if separated from the rest of the Union, unless indeed they would cut off all commercial intercourse, not only with Europe, but with the Atlantic States also. But how would the principle laid down by the Speaker operate upon the Southern portion of our Union? If that were a separate confederacy, (which God forbid that it ever should be!) what power could restrain it from pursuing its own most obvious and decided interest, by having a free and unrestricted intercourse with Europe? And when we are about to be deprived of this natural right, and to see our interests immolated at the shrine of a voracious idol, which devours every thing, and produces nothing, it ought not to be a subject of surprise that we oppose the measure as a direct invasion of our most essential rights. And, if I may be permitted to give an opinion as to the true interests of another portion of the Union, I would say, most confidently, that, if New York were a separate State, this would be a most unwise and ruinous policy for her to pursue. For, if there be a State in the Union more interested in foreign commerce than any other, it is New York; and I will add, if there be one more interested than all others, in the cotton trade of the South, that, also, is New York. Yes, sir, that commerce which the majority of her representatives now seem to condemn, is the true source of her prosperity and greatness; and there is no portion of that commerce so important as that which this measure is calculated to jeopardize, if not to destroy—the carrying trade of the South. Without this, the city of New York, the great emporium of the Union, would be deprived of half its wealth, and shorn of half its splendor. And here, sir, I will say a word or two in relation to a view of this subject, which seems to have great weight with the gentlemen who represent the interior of the State of New York. They believe that, by rearing up manufactories, they will create a market for their grain: but, do they not perceive, that commerce furnishes a market for this article, much more extensive than they can reasonably anticipate from the manufactories they can create? The city of New York alone, nourished and sustained by the very commerce which this bill is calculated to destroy, creates, by its consumption, a more extensive market for the grain of the interior than will be created by all the manufacturing establishments which this system will bring into existence in half a century. Indeed, this idea of obtaining a market for grain, by forcing manufactures into existence—an idea which has made a very strong impression upon the farming interest in the Middle and Western States—can never be realized, but to a very moderate extent. In the existing state of the arts, manufactures are made principally by machinery, which consumes no grain—so that it would not, perhaps, be going too far to say, that the agents directly and indirectly employed, by commerce, in supplying the country with a given quantity of foreign manufactures, consume as much of the products of the soil, as would be consumed by the agents who would be employed in the fabrication of the same quantity of domestic manufactures.

While considering the operation of this measure upon the several divisions and interests of the Union, I hope I shall be excused for repeating, with a view to further illustration, an idea which I advanced at an early stage of the discussion upon the details of this measure, the correctness of which, however, has been since repeatedly denied. I stated, and I now deliberately repeat it, that the cotton of the Southern States, the great source of our prosperity, constituting one-third of the whole export of the Union, has reached that critical point in the competition with foreign cottons, when any material derangement of our commercial relations with Great Britain must inevitably expose us to the hazard of losing the market of that country, at least to a very considerable extent. If we cease to take the manufactures of Great Britain, she will assuredly cease to take our cotton to the same extent. It is a settled principle of her policy—a principle not only wise but essential to her existence—to purchase from those nations who receive her manufactures, in preference to those who do not. You have, heretofore, been her best customers, and therefore it has been her policy to purchase our cotton to the full extent of our demand for her manufactures. But, say gentlemen, Great Britain does not purchase our cotton from affection, but interest. I grant it sir, and that is the very reason of my decided hostility to a system which will make it her interest to purchase from other countries than our own. It is her interest to purchase cotton, even at a higher price, from those countries which receive her manufactures in exchange. It is better for her to give a little more for cotton, than to obtain nothing for her manufactures. It will be remarked, that the situation of Great Britain is, in this respect, widely different from that of the United States. The powers of her soil have been already pushed very nearly to the maximum of their productiveness. The productiveness of her manufactures, on the contrary, is as unlimited as the demand of the whole world. She, therefore, has no choice of pursuits. Her surplus capital and labor must be directed to manufactures, or remain idle and unproductive. A demand for her manufactures is, then, from the very necessity of her condition, the primary consideration, to which every other must be subservient in the regulation of her commercial relations. To say, therefore, that she will continue to purchase our cotton, because she can get it a little cheaper than other cottons, after we have ceased to purchase her manufactures, is to suppose that she will be utterly blind to her own necessities; that she will, in fact, abandon, where it is most indispensable, that very policy which the friends of this bill now call upon us to adopt, in a spirit of reckless speculation, without considering that our circumstances are the very reverse of those which render such a policy necessary to Great Britain. In fact, sir, the policy of Great Britain is not, as gentlemen seem to suppose, to secure the home but the foreign market for her manufactures. The former she has without an effort. It is to attain the latter that all her policy and enterprise are brought into requisition. The manufactures of that country are the basis of her commerce; our manufactures, on the contrary, are to be the destruction of our commerce. And yet, in a spirit of blind and indiscriminating imitation, we are called upon to follow the example of Great Britain, by adopting a policy which will produce a result precisely the opposite of that which she has experienced of her policy; or, in other words, we are required to adopt, in deference to British wisdom, a system the very reverse of that which British policy would pursue, under the same circumstances! It cannot be doubted that, in pursuance of the policy of forcing her manufactures into foreign markets, she will, if deprived of a large portion of our custom, direct all her efforts to South America. That country abounds in a soil admirably adapted to the production of cotton, and will, for a century to come, import her manufactures from foreign countries. Under these circumstances, it is obvious that Great Britain will use every effort to stimulate the industry of South America, by the various commercial advantages she has it in her power to present, and to make up, by this new trade, the loss she will have sustained in being deprived of ours. But I must hasten to bring my remarks to a conclusion, lest I should exhaust that indulgent patience which, I fear, I have already taxed too severely. A few words, and I shall have done.

APRIL, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

It would be some consolation to me, sir, if I could believe that the heavy impositions, which must operate so oppressively upon the part of the Union I have the honor to represent, would produce an equivalent benefit to other portions of the Union. If my constituents must be sacrificed, it would in some degree soothe their injured feelings, if they could have this excuse, at least, for quietly submitting to their fate, hard as it is, and unjust as they believe it to be. But even this humble consolation is denied us. We are doomed to suffer, under a clear conviction that our sufferings will administer no relief to the distresses, whether real or imaginary, of any portion of our fellow-citizens. We are to be made the victims of a system "which not enricheth them, but makes us poor indeed"—a system which wages war, not against our enemies, but our friends; not against the hostile regulations of other countries, but against the advantages of our natural position in the world, and the munificent bounties of an all-wise Providence—a system which has originated in discontent, and must inevitably end in disappointment. Against such a system I do most solemnly protest, as a palpable invasion of those rights and interests which I am charged to defend and protect. And I do beseech its advocates, as they regard the principles of justice, the interests of the Republic, or the mutual good will of its members, to pause before they give this bill the irrevocable sanction of their final vote. If, however, they should pass it, even with a majority of a single vote, I shall, as bound by my allegiance, submit to it as one of the laws of my country. I have endeavored, with zeal and fidelity, to discharge my duty as a Representative. I trust I shall never be found wanting in my duty as a citizen. I must take leave, however, to say one parting word to the authors of this measure; I thank God that, if mine is to be the suffering, theirs will be the responsibility.

The Tariff Bill.

APRIL, 1824.

When Mr. McDUFFIE had concluded—

Mr. MARKLEY, of Pennsylvania, rose, not, he said, to make a speech upon the bill, although such had originally been his intention; but he thought, after so long a discussion, the House must be ready and anxious to take the final question on the bill. He therefore moved a call of the House.

After the call was concluded, the doors were closed; four members only were found to be absent.

Mr. STEWART then moved to dispense with all further proceedings in relation to the call: his motion was carried.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, rose to call for the previous question. He said he thought the present a proper time to finish the debate. It was known that one member was attending, contrary to the advice of his physicians, and two or three others contrary to the advice of prudence. He admitted that some courtesy was due to those who wanted to speak, but much more, he thought, was due to those whose sense of duty had brought them to the House from sick beds. He was one of those who had intended to present his views of the subject before the final question was taken, and some things had been said on yesterday which called for a reply from the friends of the bill; but he had predetermined to waive his right to do so, and hoped that gentlemen on both sides would consent to close the discussion. No tariff had ever been debated in cold blood, and the old members would support him in saying, that the debate on the present bill was marked with more temperance than on former occasions. He hoped it would terminate in the same spirit of moderation and forbearance that had marked its progress. He assured the House that he made the call under a sense of duty, but in the full spirit of deference for those who might oppose it.

The call was sustained—101 members voting in favor of, and 98 against it.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose and demanded another count.

The CHAIR, in pursuance of a rule of the House, then appointed Messrs. RANDOLPH and TAYLOR as tellers; and the members on each side of the question were counted, by passing between the tellers, and returned as follows: In favor of the previous question 103, against it 95.

So the House determined in favor of the previous question.

Mr. WEBSTER then rose. He said he had been waiting in the House for several days, laboring under severe indisposition, in order to make a motion in relation to this bill, which was of vital importance to his constituents; but as he had not yet had an opportunity to do it, he moved that the bill be ordered to lie upon the table. Upon this question he requested the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were accordingly ordered; and the House refused to lay the bill on the table—yeas 98, nays 110, as follows:

ADDRESS OF NINIAN EDWARDS.

The SPEAKER communicated to the House an address of Ninian Edwards, late a Senator of the United States, from the State of Illinois, complaining that injustice has been done him in a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying the correspondence between the Treasury Department and the banks in the different States, upon the subject of the deposits of public money in said banks; exculpating himself, and also, preferring certain charges against the said Secretary. The address is as follows:

WHEELING, VA., April 6, 1824.

SIR: I have the honor to request you to present the address herewith transmitted, with its accompanying notes and documents, to the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

NINIAN EDWARDS.

Hon. HENRY CLAY,
Speaker of the House of Reps.

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

As certain proceedings at the last session of Congress, under the authority of the House of Representatives, and a recent report to your honorable body, by the Hon. Wm. H. Crawford, Secretary of the Treasury, seem to have been intended, and are calculated, to cast upon me imputations injurious to my character, which I know to be unjust, and which, I think, I can demonstrate to be so, I trust no apology can be necessary for my requesting leave to present my vindication against those imputations, directly to your honorable body; in order that it may be conveyed to the nation through the same channel by which I have been assailed.

This is a right which, under similar circumstances, I should suppose, ought not to be denied to the humblest individual in the Union. In this case, it is due to the nation itself, in consideration of the station I lately held, and that which I have now the honor to hold; and, owing to the peculiar circumstances of my case, it is emphatically demanded, on my account, by every principle of honor, and every regard to justice. Nor is it unprecedented in either House of Congress, in cases which certainly had no greater claim to such indulgence.

It will be seen that I was called upon by a committee of the House of Representatives of the last session, as a witness to testify before it; that I was subjected to an examination, which has not its parallel in the records of any free country; and that, after the lapse of about twelve months, and just as I was on the eve of my departure for a foreign country, an attempt has been made to impeach my credibility, on grounds which must have been, at all times since my testimony was given, within the command of the honorable gentleman by whom they have been so opportunistically alleged.

To refuse to permit me to repel such an attack, in the manner proposed, would be to overthrow the longest established precedents, and to establish in their place the odious, oppressive, unjust, and indefensible principle of allowing the credibility of a witness to be impeached, and yet denying to him the right to support it before the tribunal under whose authority he had been called on to testify.

But, independent of all considerations, in regard to myself, personally, I humbly conceive that your honorable body might well desire to receive my vindication, and every corroboration which I can give to my testimony, on your own account, in order to enable you the more clearly to ascertain the truth of, and the more satisfactorily and correctly to decide upon, statements now before you, and not yet acted on.

Notwithstanding all the canting about an "A. B. plot," the ingenious attempts that have been made, and the stratagems that have been adopted, by certain newspaper editors and others, to mislead and deceive the public mind into a belief that the committees, appointed at the last session on that subject, had thoroughly investigated all the statements made by a writer under the signature of A. B. in regard to certain suppressed documents; and that Mr. Crawford had been "triumphantly acquitted," in relation to the whole of them; I assert, without the fear of contradiction, that it is known to your honorable body that neither of those committees extended their investigations into those statements, beyond about four paragraphs, which were mere bagatelles in comparison with other letters and matters that were expressly charged, and incontestably proved, by the documents furnished by Mr. Crawford himself, to have been withheld, contrary to the resolutions of the House which required their production.

These important statements, and the matters and things contained in my testimony, have neither been investigated by any committee, nor acted on by the House; and if my testimony had been, it is now revived by Mr. Crawford himself; and, surely, if it be competent to him to attack it, it cannot be fair or just to withhold from me the equal right of defending and supporting it.

By referring to the resolution of the House, (note 1,) under which the second committee of investigation was appointed, and to my examination by that committee, (2,) it will be seen that the latter fully merits the character I have given to it; that it was wholly unauthorized by any powers delegated to the committee; and that it evinced a far greater disposition to implicate me in some kind of censure, in regard to the public deposits in the Bank of Edwardsville, than to investigate the conduct of Mr. Crawford, or to inquire into those subjects for which the committee had been professedly appointed. Whatever may be thought by those who may be at the trouble to examine the list of interrogatories that were put to me, as to the source from whence they originated, none can read some of the following statements and documents, without being convinced, that a very small portion of candor would have rendered a part, at least, of those interrogatories unnecessary and useless, even in the opinion of the committee itself, (3.)

Whatever may have been my agency in procuring the Bank of Edwardsville to be made a depository of public money, it had nothing to do in originating the great system adopted by Mr. Crawford, of employing the local banks, and in several instances, in direct violation of law, by allowing them a permanent deposit of nine hundred thousand dollars, equal to a salary of $54,000 per annum, for receiving and transmitting the public money, which the Bank of the United States was bound to do without compensation, and would have done, without those immense losses to the public, which must inevitably result from the adoption of a plan so contrary to the letter and spirit of the bank charter; and to the avowed intentions and objects of Congress in granting it.

The effect of my application to have the Bank of Edwardsville made a depository of public money, was merely to have deposits made there, that otherwise would have been made in the Bank of Missouri, which previously had been authorized to receive the public moneys, collected by the two Receivers in Illinois, who alone were directed to make their deposits in the Bank of Edwardsville. My agency in this transaction, therefore, did not prevent the depositing of a cent in the Bank of the United States; and your honorable body may well judge, whether the public interest could have been much jeopardized, by the change I recommended, from the following statement, extracted from the documents presented to you by Mr. Crawford.

The Bank of Missouri had a capital of $210,000, of which, the stockholders drew out of it, on pledges of stock, $186,335, leaving only $23,665 for the further accommodation of themselves and others. Upon this last sum, its real banking capital, it discounted and paid on over drafts, to the amount of $244,345 53. The whole amount of its discounts, including payments on over drafts, was $430,680 43; of which sum, its directors alone were responsible for $297,492 13, if, as is presumed to be the case, they are chargeable with over drafts, to the amount of $11,622 27.

To this bank, Mr. Crawford allowed a permanent deposit of $150,000, equal to a salary of $9,000 per annum. He permitted the public money to accumulate in it, to the amount of $726,031 90, in the course of nineteen successive months, ending with the 1st of

September, 1819, without exacting those precautionary returns and statements, which he himself considered essential to insure the fidelity of all the banks appointed to receive the public money; and, eventually, he received from it, in part payment of its debts, contrary to the positive injunctions of the resolution of Congress, of 1816, a large amount of uncurrent notes, some of which were not worth twenty-five cents in the dollar.

Much as he has mystified this subject, in several of his reports, and particularly in that one which is part of document 105, (in the 8th volume State Papers, 2d session 17th Congress,) in which he blends a deposit in the Bank of Missouri, of $64,613 58, with "the special deposits which passed through the Bank of the United States," it cannot excuse, or even successfully disguise, the flagrant impropriety of his having received, at par, the uncurrent notes above referred to; for, by the very document last mentioned, it appears that this deposit had been "re-transferred to the Bank of Missouri, and assumed as cash, in September, 1819," which was previous to the receipt of those notes. His own letter to the Cashier of the Bank of Missouri, dated 23d March, 1819, and the Cashier's answer, dated 25th of June, 1819, (4 and 5) clearly show, that no justification for receiving uncurrent paper can be derived from that circumstance. Because, he received uncurrent notes that were not, and could not, have been included in that deposit; for, not to mention other cases, the notes which he received on the "Bank of Georgetown, Kentucky," were not, at that time, even receivable in the land offices. Nor was there ever any contract between the Bank of the United States, or the Treasury Department, with the Bank of Missouri, from which the latter could derive any right to tender, or be any justification for receiving, those uncurrent notes.

But, had it been otherwise, it would not be less difficult to justify the placing of this bank upon a footing so different from that of all other similar depositories of public money.

Under all these circumstances, it would seem incredible, that any injury to the public could have resulted from the change of deposit, for which I applied; and the attempt to subject me to censure, for the small participation which I have had in this business, ought to be considered as a plain acknowledgment of the awful weight of responsibility that rests upon him, whose especial duty it was, to take care of the public money.

My responsibility, however, did not long continue; for, finding the Bank of Edwardsville, on my return from Congress, soon after it had been authorized to receive the public money, involved in some difficulties, I determined to sustain it against the danger that then threatened it, and, after seeing it in a safe situation, to relieve myself from all kind of responsibility for that, or any other bank. Accordingly, in the same year, I made a publication in several newspapers, and in two different States, of my determination to be held no longer responsible for that, or any other bank. This publication can be established by a part, if not the whole, of the respective delegations, now in Congress from the States of Illinois and Missouri. It was forwarded to Mr. Crawford, and I have no apprehension that he will ever deny having received it.

He had, also, been put upon inquiry, in regard to the Bank of Edwardsville, by a bitter philippic, in ample detail, against it, which he received from the Hon. Mr. Benton, of the Senate. This was shown to Col.

Johnson and myself, and a copy of it was transmitted to the bank, where I suppose it now remains.

He was fully apprized of those very difficulties of the bank, which produced my determination to retire from it. They were communicated in letters from myself to Colonel Johnson, which were intended to be, and were, forwarded to Mr. Crawford. The receipt of two of them is acknowledged by his letter to Colonel Johnson, of 15th July, 1819, in which he says, "Yours of the 28th ultimo came to hand this morning. The circumstances connected with the Bank of Edwardsville, as developed in the two letters of Governor Edwards, submitted by you to my perusal, will receive due consideration." In the same letter, he says, "With Governor Edwards I had no personal acquaintance, before the last Winter. The opinion which I had formed of his talents and integrity, from the official correspondence which had been carried on between us, both in the War and Treasury Department, has been confirmed by personal acquaintance."

"The different subjects upon which he had occasion to ask my opinion or decision, during the last session of Congress, were fairly and candidly stated; his comments upon them were judicious, and it afforded me great pleasure to be able, after due examination and reflection, generally to coincide with him." The session here spoken of is the one in which I made the application in favor of the Bank of Edwardsville.

Had Mr. Crawford been as much disposed to profit by the impressive lessons of experience, which he was constantly receiving, as I was by those of a few months only, it might have prevented a vast accumulation of "unavailable funds," and have enabled him, much earlier, to have secured to the Bank of the United States, "in their just extent, the advantages intended to be secured to it by the charter," which he fairly promised to Congress, in his report of the 10th December, 1817, [6] and the necessity for which he seems to have been duly sensible of, in another report, (8 vol. State Papers, 2d session 17th Congress, p. 77,) in which he says, "In the Winter and Spring of 1819, the Bank of the United States was, in the opinion of the enlightened officer who presided over its direction, in a great degree indebted for the preservation of its credit to the forbearance of its creditors, and to the support which it received from the Treasury Department. Such were my impressions of its critical state, that I felt it my duty to accept propositions made by the Board of Directors, which, under other circumstances, would have been declined." It is wonderful, therefore, that, with these impressions, he should have thought it consistent with his duty to have extended such favors as have been noticed to a single local bank; much less to the multitude that shared his patronage, and could not have existed without it.

It would be just as fair and candid to implicate me in the unjustifiable indulgence that has been extended to the Bank of Edwardsville, since its failure, as to endeavor to involve me in any kind of censure for its continuance as a depository of public money after the Fall of 1819. At the time of its failure, its resources were, I am well satisfied, more than amply sufficient to have secured its debt to the Government. But, every man of common experience and observation knows, that the resources of all banks, in its situation, must necessarily become more and more impaired, and are more liable to be misapplied. Yet, strange and incredible as it may appear, I have never heard, nor do I believe, though I reside in the same village in which the bank is located, that Mr. Crawford has collected one cent from it; or made any adjustment with it; or resorted to any measure to coerce the payment of its debt. He, who could find motives for an indulgence so extraordinary, and at the same time so inconsistent with, and detrimental to, the public interest, could not have required either my recommendation or sanction for continuing this bank a depository of the public money after the Fall of 1819.

I come now to the report that contains the dextrous insinuation against my credibility. So much of it as relates to this subject is in the following words, viz: "The honorable Mr. Edwards, late a Senator from Illinois, having stated, on his examination before a committee of the House, on the 13th of February, 1823, that the late Receiver of Public Money at Edwardsville had, on his advice, and in his presence, written a letter to the Secretary, enclosing a copy of the publication which Mr. Edwards represents himself to have made some time in the year 1819, announcing his intention of retiring from the directorship of the Bank of Edwardsville, and that he had advised the Receiver to withhold his deposits from the bank until he could receive further orders from the Secretary; and that the Receiver afterwards informed him that he had received a letter from the Secretary, directing him to continue the deposits: The Secretary deems it proper to state, that no such letter from the Receiver is to be found on the files of the Department; that the officers employed in it have no recollection of the receipt of such a letter; and that, on an examination of the records of the Department, it appears that no answer to any such letter, directing the Receiver to continue the deposits, was ever written to him by the Secretary of the Treasury."

This statement bears intrinsic evidence that it was intended to deprive me of the benefit of my justification—not voluntarily made, but drawn from me by the committee, in regard to the Bank of Edwardsville; and to subject me to the odious suspicion of having sworn falsely. Were there any doubt on this subject, it would be removed by the conduct of a distinguished individual, whom it might not be respectful to name in this communication, and who, since I left the city, has not thought it beneath his dignity to go about exhibiting the report, and expressing his opinion that it "placed me in a dilemma." He may yet find it more difficult for his patron to get rid of one, of infinitely deeper interest.

Believing, as I call upon my God to witness I sincerely and confidently do, that Mr. Crawford did receive the letter mentioned in the above report, and that it is now in his possession, or has been purposely destroyed, I can but regard this attack upon my reputation as unparalleled by any thing I have ever witnessed or heard of, as emanating from so respectable a source, except certain manœuvres and stratagems to fix upon a much more distinguished individual of this nation the disgraceful charges of a guilty participation in horse-stealing, and the passing of counterfeit money, which I have somewhere met with in the course of my reading. Malicious insinuation is the resort of a timid mind. Wilful misrepresentation denotes a wicked one.

In regard to the time which has been selected for making this attack upon me, it very much resembles the management which Mr. Crawford resorted to, at the last session of Congress, to defeat a certain applicant for a land office appointment. This gentleman had been before the President for many weeks. He was supported by gentlemen of the first respectability, and of different parties, in the States of Illinois, Missouri, and Tennessee. No objections to him were anticipated by himself or his friends. And none was made till the President was about to transmit his nomination to the Senate. Then, when a nomination could no longer be kept back, by any contrivance whatever, and not till then, did Mr. Crawford exhibit his objections. The gentleman's residence was too remote, and the session of Congress too far spent, to admit of any defence or explanation from him; and thus he lost the appointment. As this case is strongly marked by certain characteristic traits, which tend to illustrate the objects and design of this well-timed attack upon me, I refer, for a further explanation of it, to my letter to Mr. Crawford on the subject-[7]

In the latter part of the week previous to my departure from the city, on calling to take my leave of the President, I met with Mr. Dickens, to whom, in a short conversation with him, I communicated my intention of leaving the city on the Sunday following, (one day before the date of Mr. Crawford's communication,) and, but for an accidental engagement of the Secretary of State, which prevented his signing a paper that it was necessary for me to carry to the Treasury Department, till after the hours of business in that Department had elapsed, I should have departed from the city before Mr. Crawford's communication was made; and probably should not even have heard of it till after I had left the United States.

But, independently of what I stated to Mr. Dickins, my intended departure was strongly indicated by the business I was engaged in transacting in the public offices. It was generally known; and, if it had not been, it was very naturally to have been expected.

Deprived of all opportunity of defence, a victory over me might, indeed, have been easy; but, surely, the triumph would have been most ignoble.

By way of availing myself of further characteristic traits, I beg leave to state, that an inspection of the public documents is sufficient to show that, in repeated instances, Mr. Crawford's replies to calls upon him by the House for information, &c., have been so tardy and protracted, as to prevent the possibility of investigating them during the sessions in which the calls were made; and to require a great degree of charity—possibly however, not more than is justly due—to resist the belief that he has been as much disposed to evade as to invite a scrutiny into his conduct.

Even the correspondence which accompanied the report in question, though required by a resolution of the 8th May, 1822, to be laid before the House as early as practicable, after the commencement of the then next succeeding session, has been delayed to so late a period of the present session as to render an investigation of it, before the first Monday in December next, impossible.

Notwithstanding all these circumstances, it may be that Mr. Crawford did not intend to take an undue advantage of my absence. He must well know with what indignant condemnation such an attempt would be denounced by every magnanimous and generous bosom. What surprises me most is, that a just apprehension of so degrading a suspicion had not induced him to have exhibited his insinuation a little sooner, or to have declined it altogether. But, whatever may have been his intentions, I could not have been more disadvantageously affected by any contrivance or stratagem that he could have adopted, to deprive me of a fair opportunity of defence.

Scarcely convalescent from a long indisposition, exhausted with the fatigue of travelling, and required to proceed on my journey with all convenient despatch, I must leave him unanswered, or content myself with such a defence as, with all these disadvantages, a very short time of necessary delay on my journey may enable me hastily to present. But, what I regard with the most concern is, that writing, as I must do, without having it in my power to refer to, and re-examine, certain documents, I shall not be able to avail myself of some important circumstances which they would establish, and may be betrayed into some slight inaccuracies, to which all men are liable who have to trust to memory alone. I promise, however, to be more accurate than Mr. Crawford has been, in cases in which he had before him every means of being entirely so.

Having endeavored to establish my right to make my defence before your honorable body, and taking it for granted that a request so reasonable, under all the circumstances that have been mentioned, will not be denied me, I presume I shall be indulged in every legitimate right of defence that belongs to my case.

Among these, it will scarcely be denied that I have a right—

1st. To corroborate my own testimony.

2dly. To show, by any means in my power, that the statements made against me are inconclusive; and, particularly, to avail myself of any circumstance that is presented by the documents in the case in which I was called on to testify, for the purpose of invalidating those statements. And,

3dly. Directly to impeach the credibility of those who have assailed mine.

The latter I shall probably waive; for, though I have, at all times, felt myself at liberty to animadvert upon Mr. Crawford's official conduct, and to defend my own, both of which he has found me prompt to do, in cases that never yet have met the public eye, I never have intentionally treated him with the slightest indecorum, or a want of that respect that is due to his station. (8.) Respect for your honorable body would, of itself, be sufficient to induce me to abstain from the language of passion, or abusive vituperation, before you. Respect for myself would prevent me from it anywhere else. I cheerfully leave that resource to bullies, political tools, mercenary hirelings, and those who, conscious of their inability to defend their own conduct, can find no better means of diverting public attention from themselves to others. I shall, nevertheless, freely urge, and insist on, such facts as I know to be true, disclaiming, however, any other construction of them than the most innocent of which they are susceptible. If I shall point out palpable omissions and violations of duty, or show that letters, which ought to have been communicated to the House, have been suppressed, and that various misstatements have been officially made, I shall attribute them to nothing more than forgetfulness, inattention, inadvertence, or some erroneous, but innocent views of the subject.

This will be sufficient to show that the negative statements of Mr. Crawford, and "the officers employed in the Treasury Department," ought not to prevail against my positive statement on oath. If others should suppose this forbearance on my part a little too fastidious, and that the cases which I shall exhibit are evincive of intentions less innocent, let it be remembered that their views of the subject would unquestionably render the case the stronger in my favor.

H. OF R.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

APRIL, 1824.

With these preliminary remarks, I proceed to my defence against this mal apropos statement of Mr. Crawford.

It will be recollected, that I was not a volunteer in giving my testimony before the committee, and I can conceive of no motive which could be supposed, by any but a most depraved mind, misled by its own wicked operations, to have influenced me to make an uncandid statement. As to my responsibility, in consequence of having applied to Mr. Crawford to cause certain deposits to be made in the Bank of Edwardsville, in preference to that of Missouri, surely I have shown that enough was known about the latter bank, at the time my testimony was given, to have freed me from all apprehensions in regard to any responsibility that I had imposed upon myself, even if I had not withdrawn, as already stated, from the "Directorship" of the former. But, Mr. Crawford does not deny that he received my publication, and even if he had not received it, it having been made in two different States, and he having been, as I have shown, put upon inquiry in regard to that bank, and informed of the difficulties it had had to encounter, I certainly might rely upon the notoriety of my acts, in this respect, with a much better grace than he relies upon a supposed notoriety of his repeated but unpublished omissions, to comply with the most positive legal injunctions as an excuse for those omissions, which he does in his letter of the 24th February, 1823, to the chairman of the committee of investigation; and in which he also seems, almost, to insist that his violation of his duty was equivalent to a fulfilment of it.

It could have been no object with me to have established an additional suppression upon him; for, if time do not fail me, it will be seen, before I am done with this subject, that I had in my possession proof, whose credibility could not be questioned, of his having suppressed, in a variety of other instances, letters enough, of a much more important character and delicate bearing, for any purpose that the utmost malignity could have contemplated, as possible to be effected by such means. [9.]

The amount of my statement before the committee, as well as I can now recollect it, (not having it in my power to refer it for examination,) but which will be supplied at Washington is,

1st. That, for the reasons therein mentioned, I made a publication of my intention to retire from the "Directorship" of the Bank of Edwardsville.

2d. That I advised the Receiver of Public Money at that place, to withhold his deposits from the bank, till he could receive further orders from the Secretary of the Treasury.

3d. That the Receiver did write to the Secretary on the subject, enclosing my publication, &c.

4th. That the former afterwards informed me that he had received a letter from the latter, directing him to continue the deposits.

Now, it is not denied, and dare not be, that I did make the publication alluded to, and this I could not have done, for the reasons that influenced me, consistently with the known friendship and intimacy that then subsisted between the Receiver and myself, without giving him the advice mentioned in the second part of the above statement. But that I did give that advice is much more strongly corroborated by the fact that the Receiver did actually withhold the deposits, and Mr. Crawford knows it. This might be established by the monthly returns of both the Receiver and the bank. But these are in the possession of Mr. Crawford. I, however, felicitate myself upon being able to satisfy your honorable body of the fact, by documents that have been furnished by himself, but which, thank God, are now out of his power.

By his report of the 27th February, 1823, (8 volume State Papers, 2d sess. 17th Congress, pages 31, 33, and 35,) it will be seen that the amount of deposits stated to have been in the Bank of Edwardsville, to the credit of the Treasurer, was—

At the end of the 2d quarter of 1819, $45,560 68

At the end of the 4th quarter of 1819, 53,191 59

The two first of these statements are presumed to be correct, or nearly so. The latter is entirely otherwise, as I will prove to your satisfaction, if there is any kind of confidence to be reposed in previous statements exhibited to you by Mr. Crawford. Had it been intended to disguise the fact of the Receiver's having withheld the deposits, as above stated, and to give some semblance of plausibility to the recent insinuation against myself, nothing could have been more ingeniously, or more disingenuously, contrived, for these purposes, than this last statement. If it had been truly stated that, instead of $53,191 59, the real amount in deposits, at the end of the fourth quarter, was $98,191 59½, the contrast between this sum and the amount of the previous deposits, might have afforded some corroboration to my statement before the committee. But this, subsequent events have proved, it was intended to question. I will, however, make the case too plain for doubt.

By the report last referred to, it appears that the amount of deposits in the Bank of Edwardsville, to the credit of the Treasurer, on the last days of June and September, was a little upwards of $45,000.

By Mr. Crawford's previous report of the 27th of April, 1822, (in which is an ingenious contrivance of placing December before November,) it is shown by the bank returns themselves, that, on the 30th of November, 1819, the amount of deposits was $45,475 04½, and that, on the last day of the succeeding month, (the end of the fourth quarter of 1819,) it was $98,191 59½, [10] and not $53,191 59, as subsequently reported from the Treasury Department.

From the correspondence between the several amounts of deposits in the bank, on the last days of June, September, and November, and the difference between them and that of the last day of December, in the same year, no one can doubt that the Receiver at Edwardsville did actually withhold the deposits as above suggested; unless it can be believed that he did, in one single month, distinguished by no particular circumstances, receive to the amount of $52,716 55, equal to the rate of $692,598 60 per annum.

Let us, then, inquire a little into the probability of his having written to Mr. Crawford, or, rather, into the great improbability of his not having done so.

This gentleman united in himself the office of Receiver and President of the Bank of Edwardsville. As Receiver, he had positive orders to make his deposits in that bank, and was bound to make monthly returns of his accounts to the Secretary of the Treasury. As President, it was his duty to have monthly returns of the state of the bank, and the amount of public deposits therein, regularly transmitted to the Secretary. Is it, then, to be believed, that he should have withheld the deposits contrary to his orders, without having given to Mr. Crawford some reason, either as Receiver or President, for his having done so! And, if he had failed to perform this duty, is it credible that Mr. Crawford would have been so negligent and inattentive to his duty, and so regardless of the public interest, as not to have called him to an account for such conduct?

APRIL, 1824.

But, if further confirmation of the letter's having been written, and received by Mr. Crawford, too, were wanting, strong presumptions in favor of both may be derived from the very guarded and characteristic artifice by which he would seem equally to deny the receipt of the letter, and that any instructions had been given to the Receiver to continue to make the deposits. Let it be observed, that my statement, as quoted by Mr. Crawford, is, "that the Receiver informed me he had received a letter from the Secretary, directing him to continue the deposits." Mr. Crawford does not deny that such directions were given, but he says, "it appears that no answer to such letter, directing the Receiver to continue the deposits, was ever written," &c. From this peculiar manner of denial, I can but infer that, not being willing, from some cause or other, to admit the receipt of the letter, Mr. Crawford contrived to give the directions under some other form or pretext than that of a direct answer to it. But that such directions were given, I cannot doubt, though I have nothing to rely upon for this opinion but the Receiver's word for the fact. If Mr. Crawford did not write to him specially on the subject of his having withheld the deposits, it can only be satisfactorily accounted for on the supposition that he (Mr. Crawford) did, in some form or other, give such directions as he supposed would produce the proper corrective.

Another fact, in confirmation of my statement, is, that one of the two Receivers who had been directed to make their deposits in the Bank of Edwardsville, was ordered to make his elsewhere. But under what pretext I do not know, nor do I recollect ever to have heard; probably, however, under some one equally calculated to disguise the real motive, as the giving of directions, without acknowledging the receipt of the letter that produced them.

It will not, I persuade myself, be considered a trifling corroboration of my statement, that it was not made to the committee for the first time; but that, in a private correspondence between Mr. Crawford and myself, more than twelve months before my examination by the committee, I had asserted the same facts substantially to himself.

In my letter to him of the 9th February, 1822, (which I would not venture to refer to if I had not his answer to it,) I say, "I beg leave most respectfully to suggest, that it would be but an act of justice to me to present my publication of 1819, in which I declared I would be no longer responsible for the bank [of Edwardsville] in any way whatever. This publication was contained in the St. Louis Enquirer, which I believe you took at that time. It was also contained in a paper which I forwarded to you myself. And it was enclosed, and referred to, in a letter from Colonel Stephenson, the President of the Bank, [and the Receiver also] to you, which letter, he informed me, had been answered. Since the Fall of 1819, my connexion with that bank has entirely ceased, except that I am a stockholder in it, without, however, ever having borrowed one cent from it."

In my letter to Mr. Crawford, of 14th February, 1822, I say to him, "I must, however, say, sir, that, as the information, in the Treasury Department, relative to my original recommendation of the Bank of Edwardsville, has, for some time past, been distinctly understood, and freely used at this place, [Washington,] I can but consider it somewhat unfortunate for me, that other communications in the Department, which ought to have terminated all responsibility on my part, have not been equally known. That I was the cause of the deposits being made there, in the first instance, I freely acknowledge. But, that I unequivocally declared, I would not be held responsible for that or any other bank, in any way whatever, after the Fall of 1819; that you were notified thereof in due time; that the deposits have not been continued there in consequence of my recommendation since that period; and that the bank was then in a good situation, I may, I think, according to my present impressions, fairly insist upon. And, if so, the partial information, now in circulation at this place, is not calculated to do me that justice which, I hope, I have a right to expect from your magnanimity. It would, therefore, afford me great pleasure, I assure you, sir, that the whole of my conduct, in relation to that business, should be so fully known as to be no longer misunderstood."

The first of these letters was written five days before his report of the 14th February, 1822. The second bears the same date of the latter. They must both, therefore, have been written before any charge of suppressions had been made or suggested.

Had the existence of the Receiver's letter been denied, or the slightest intimation of questioning it been given, at the time it was thus asserted, I could, and would, have proved every fact contained in my statement in regard to it, by that gentleman himself. But he is now dead. Mr. Crawford knew this before he made the report in question—and dead men cannot contradict living ones.

No one can read the interrogatories that were put to me by the committee, and believe that Mr. Crawford was not well informed of my testimony before the date of his letter to the chairman of the same committee, which was eleven days later than my examination. From the nature of the inquiries which he was then called upon to answer, they afforded as suitable an occasion, as the one he has selected, for questioning my credibility. Why, then, has he so long postponed it? One thing is certain, it never could have been undertaken with greater hopes of success than when it was supposed I should have no opportunity of defending myself.

I will now submit to your honorable body a few remarks, to show that the negative statements of Mr. Crawford, and his "officers of the Treasury Department," however confidently relied upon by him for my total overthrow, are too inconclusive for his purpose.

You have been informed by him that, previous to the calls for his correspondence with the local banks, which were made the depositories of public money, it had been usual to refer all such calls to Mr. Jones, his chief clerk, but that, in these cases, another clerk had been selected to collect the letters, &c., which were called for. Why this change was made, at that particular juncture, (being wholly unaccounted for by Mr. Crawford,) is left to conjecture. Was Mr. Jones incompetent to the discharge of this duty? The very station he holds in the Department forbids such a supposition. Had he proved himself unworthy of confidence? If so, he could not have retained his station; and such is acknowledged to be his stern, unyielding, inflexible integrity, that no one could have supposed him capable of a subserviency in any unfair purpose. I confess I regret that the change was made: for, had it not been, I cannot resist the belief that I should have been spared much of the labor of this vindication. But, without yielding to unavailing regrets, I must be content to take things as I find them. I, therefore, proceed to examine the testimony that is offered against me.

This is substantially, 1st. That no such letter from the Receiver [as that mentioned in my examination] is to be found in the files of the Department. 2. That the officers employed in it have no recollection of the receipt of such a letter. And 3. That the records of the Department do not show that it was answered.

Supposing it to be true that this letter cannot be found "in the files of the Department," it by no means proves that it was not received by Mr. Crawford.

This is not the first occasion on which I have had to regret that a letter received by him could not be found when it became necessary for my defence.

Finding myself grossly misrepresented in relation to a letter I had written to him, and being determined to vindicate myself against the insinuations that were predicated upon it, I wrote to him on the 5th of January, 1821, requesting a copy of it. In his reply, dated 10th January, 1821, he says: "The letter which you have described in yours of the 5th instant, has been sought for in vain. Mr. Jones states that, according to the best of his recollection, he considered it not of a description to go on the files, and that consequently it was not filed. If his recollection is correct, it accounts for the absence of the letter from the files, and for its being lost or mislaid." My letter being thus disposed of, Mr. Crawford, in his answer, impliedly repeated one of the insinuations above referred to. This was promptly repelled by me; and, since then, I have heard no more on that subject.

From this case alone, it might not be unreasonable to presume that some similar disposition may have been made of the letter now in question. But, with every motive to make such an assertion, Mr. Crawford has not ventured to say he did not receive this letter. It will not be difficult to show that other letters, of infinitely more importance, have been received by him, about which it might be truly said, "no such letters are to be found in the files of the Department." He has sometimes another depository for them, in which the letter mentioned in my examination may also have been placed. It may have been addressed to him "without the addition of Secretary of the Treasury," which we have seen it gravely insisted on as giving him a right to consider any letter as "a private paper," though exclusively relating to matters of official duty. Or he may have "considered it not of a description to go on the files;" and thus may "its absence from the files," or "its being lost or mislaid," be very naturally accounted for, according to the practices of the Department.

The probability of this supposition is greatly strengthened by the following case:

Between 1816, and the 31st December, 1819, he received important communications on the subject of the illicit introduction of a large number of African slaves into the United States, which strongly implicated one of his particular friends. By a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the last mentioned date, he was directed to lay before the House copies of such communications as he had received since 1816, and such information as he possessed, in relation to the illicit introduction of slaves into the United States. But, notwithstanding this positive call upon him, I assert, and I challenge investigation, that he did withhold letters and information upon this subject, implicating his friend, which ought to have been communicated to the House, and some of which, he did not even permit "to go on the files of the Department." Of course, it might be very truly said of them, "that no such letters are to be found on the files of the Department; and that the officers employed in it have no recollection of the receipt of them;" for, having been deposited in his own private bureau, those officers could have no means of ascertaining the fact, and the very motives for withholding them from the files, would render fruitless all attempts to find "answers" to them "by an examination of the records of the Department." And yet, there is no doubt of their having been received, and the strongest probability that they were answered also. If the authority of the House of Representatives was not sufficient to obtain their production, the non-production of the letter of the Receiver at Edwardsville ought not to excite a moment's surprise.

But it also appears that he, and his "officers of the Treasury Department," have not been able to find a great number of other letters, and even some of his own official ones, when required by other calls of the House; or, if they could have been found, they were suppressed. Of this, the documents furnished by himself afford both abundant and conclusive proof. Many instances might be stated. For the sake of brevity, I will allude to a few of them only.

Several cases of this kind are presented by the correspondence with the Bank of Huntsville. I will refer to but one of them. This is too conclusive for any artifice to elude it; and it requires but a bare inspection of the documents themselves to be convinced of it.

In his letter, "L., No. 7," to the President of the Bank of Huntsville, dated the 30th July, 1819, he says, "You will perceive, by the contents of my letter of the ninth instant, that the failure of the Nashville Bank, and its offices, was, at that time, known to this Department. It was then foreseen that the Bank of Huntsville could not fail to be injuriously affected by that event, and by others of a similar nature, which were then anticipated." The reasons stated in my letter of the ninth instant, in favor of the prompt adoption, by the bank, of the measures necessary to the transfer of the public money in the possession of the bank, beyond the permanent deposit, remain unimpaired.

This letter of the 9th of July, 1819, is also referred to in letter "L., No. 8," from the President of the Bank of Huntsville, dated September, 1819. Yet this same letter of the 9th instant, whose "relevancy to the subject-matter of the call" admits of no question, "was not to be found on the files of the Department," or it was purposely suppressed, for it has not been communicated.

By an examination of the documents No. 66, and No. 119, it will be seen that more than half the correspondence with the Bank of Missouri, though called for by a resolution of the House has been suppressed. The importance and very delicate import of a few of these letters will be noticed presently, in connexion with another subject.

But, though there were two calls in this case, either of which rendered it the duty of Mr. Crawford to have transmitted all the correspondence; and though, in answering the second call, he expressly stated that he had transmitted "all the correspondence required by the resolution, except two letters from the Receiver at St. Louis, which were of a confidential nature," yet, your honorable body will find very strong reasons to doubt the correctness of this statement, and I shall be much surprised if the third call, with which he has so tardily complied, has been sufficient to draw from him all the correspondence, even with the Bank of Missouri. The omission of letters, addressed to the Department, might be accounted for on the supposition that they might have miscarried. But this is a casualty to which the letters, or copies of the letters, of the Secretary himself, which should always remain in the Department, are not liable. They may, however, sometimes disappear, as the letter of the Receiver at Edwardsville seems to have done. If not, it will be difficult to account for the absence of a letter of the 30th July, 1819, which is presumed to have been addressed by Mr. Crawford to the Bank of Missouri, upon the authority of a report of a committee of the Legislature of Missouri, at its session in 1822.

APRIL, 1824.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

H. OF R.

This was a committee appointed to examine into the concerns of the Bank of Missouri. Mr. Crawford's letters to that bank were submitted to the inspection of the committee, and the report, which I have the honor herewith to transmit, (11) contains extracts from several of them, among which is one from his letter of 30th July, 1819, of which enough appears to prove that it was embraced by the call, and ought to have been communicated, unless, indeed, it is a mere fabrication by the committee, for which no imaginable motive can be perceived.

I have not time to dwell upon several curious particulars that are disclosed by this report. I beg leave, however, to refer your honorable body to the contract with the Bank of Missouri, as therein set forth. An inspection of it will enable you to decide at once whether it is correctly represented in Mr. Crawford's report of it, and whether he had a right to withdraw any part of the permanent deposit, under any pretence whatever, before the expiration of six months "after it ceased to be employed to receive the public moneys."

In regard to the letters that have been alluded to, I will barely remark, that, if so many of them, actually belonging to the Department, could not be found on "its files," it will not be strange if it shall hereafter appear that the letter of the Receiver at Edwardsville has been overlooked; or, if the former were purposely suppressed, there is nothing improbable in the belief that the latter has shared the same fate.

But this letter may have been received by Mr. Crawford, and he may have forgotten it.

This, I presume, I may fairly demonstrate, by showing that his memory has been extremely treacherous, in other instances, of far greater consequence. For this purpose, I beg leave, in the first place, to call the attention of your honorable body to his oath, before the committee.

Regardless of the salutary admonitions of the proverb "of the glass windows," he has treated my oath somewhat freely, and he can have no reasonable cause to complain if his own shall undergo a slight investigation.

On his examination before the committee, he says, "I never sanctioned the omission of any part of the correspondence."

Now let us hear Mr. Dickens, his confidential clerk. On the examination of this gentleman before the same committee, he says, "It is the general direction of the Secretary, when information is called for, to give every thing that relates to the subject. When the call was made, I looked over all the papers, filed and unfiled, relating to the subject. The papers, after selected, are laid before the Secretary; and in this case, he directed me to collect every thing in the office relating to the subject. They were selected and submitted to his inspection. In this case, from the urgency of it, I took the originals and rough draughts. The papers remained some time before the Secretary, while he was making the report, after I gave them to him, and before he communicated to the House."

Let it be recollected that Mr. Dickens is one of Mr. Crawford's witnesses against me, and enjoys his highest confidence. Now, if this gentleman swears the truth, I would ask, how it could have happened that so many letters of the correspondence with the Banks of Huntsville and Missouri alone were suppressed, without Mr. Crawford's sanction?

The document No. 119, before referred to, most indisputably proves that upwards of twenty letters of the correspondence with the latter bank were suppressed, on the first call for them; and that these very letters were "in the office." If, then, Mr. Dickens did collect, and lay before Mr. Crawford, "all the papers, filed and unfiled, relating to the subject," which he was strictly ordered to do, and swears he did; by whom could the suppression of so great a portion of the correspondence with the Bank of Missouri have been effected? If not by Mr. Crawford, his own statement shows that it must have been done by Mr. Dickens. To permit so flagrant a breach of trust and confidence to pass with impunity, is to sanction it. If this suppression escaped Mr. Crawford's notice, when he answered the first call for those letters, he could not have been ignorant of it, when he shortly afterwards complied with the second call, by transmitting the very letters that had been suppressed. Yet, we have never heard that Mr. Dickens has been punished, in any manner whatever; and from the relation in which these gentlemen stand to each other, it cannot be presumed that he has been even blamed.

Again: Mr. Crawford, in his testimony, says, "It is usual when resolutions require information which the records or files of the office afford, to send copies; but when there is a press of business, the originals are sometimes sent, as in the present case."

Thus, it appears, from the oath of these two gentlemen, that Mr. Dickens delivered all the "originals and rough draughts" to Mr. Crawford: and that the latter sent them all to the House. No one therefore could reasonably expect to find copies among them. Yet, upon an examination of the correspondence with the Huntsville Bank alone, it will be found that about one-third of the pages it occupies, and more than that proportion of the letters, are given as extracts. These, surely, can not be originals, unless Mr. Crawford and the President of the Bank of Huntsville were in the habit of sending extracts of their own letters to each other—a novelty that can scarcely be believed to have occurred.

But, besides the striking variance between Mr. Crawford's statement of having sent the originals to the House, and the fact of this case, the transformation of those originals into extracts requires explanation, at least. It is difficult to conjecture any motive for sending these extracts, instead of the originals, unless it was for the purpose of omitting and withholding something which the latter contained. And if Mr. Crawford "never sanctioned the omission of any part of the correspondence," by whom and with what motives could these extracts have been made, and foisted into the place of the originals?

H. OF R.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

APRIL, 1824.

It cannot be too much to say that there appears to have been considerable forgetfulness in some part of this affair.

Mr. Crawford must also have forgotten the resolution of 1816, when, in direct violation of its positive injunctions, he received from certain local banks, in discharge of their debts to the United States, and at par, the large amount of uncurrent notes which, in his report, he admits he did receive from them.

But his memory must have been much more unfortunately treacherous to him in two other particulars relating to this business; for I shall show that he has made two palpable and important misstatements in regard to it.

Being called on by a resolution of the House of Representatives to state the amount of uncurrent paper which he received from the local banks that had been made depositories of public money received from the sale of public lands, he admits the receipt of a large amount from the banks of Edwardsville, Missouri, and Tombeckee. But, as an excuse for his conduct, he represents those notes to have been deposited in these banks "before the date of their contracts," under which they agreed to account for the public deposits in specie.

This I do most unequivocally and positively aver to be a misrepresentation, and an indefensible apology; and your honorable body cannot fail to be convinced of it, by adverting to the contracts themselves. I will refer to only one of them at present. The very first article of the contract with the Bank of Edwardsville, under which it received the first cent of public deposits, is in the following words, viz: "1. That the public moneys shall be entered to the credit of the Treasurer as cash; which may be seen in document No. 66, letter G, Nos. 1 and 2.

But, for his own opinion upon the subject, even in a case where there had been no express stipulation "to pay cash," I refer your honorable body to his letter L, No. 1, to the President of the Bank of Huntsville, dated the 11th January, 1818, where it will be found that he says: "In making the Planters and Merchant's Bank of Huntsville a place of deposit, at its particular solicitation, it was expected that the transfer of the funds which it undertook to make, would be effected in funds that circulated at par at the place where the transfer was directed. As the Receiver had been directed to receive the bills on no banks which did not discharge them in specie upon demand, it was expected that the bank would be answerable for the amount deposited in specie, or in bills which would be received as specie, at the place to which the money should be directed to be transferred, unless it should state the contrary."

But this is not the worst case. He has, in the same report, misstated the amount of uncurrent notes which he did receive from those banks, making it much less than it actually was; and some of the suppressed letters in the correspondence with the Bank of Missouri will prove it.

This statement, no doubt, will surprise and astonish your honorable body; but you will not long regard it as a proof of temerity. I shall, however, content myself with barely stating enough to carry resistless conviction to your own minds of the truth of it. None shall doubt who will either read or hear the testimony exhibited to you by Mr. Crawford himself.

The suppressed letters B, No. 13, from the President of the Bank of Missouri, dated the 11th October, 1819, and B, No. 19, from Thomas Reddick, agent of the bank, dated the 18th February, 1820, taken in connexion with Mr. Crawford's settlement with the said agent, will prove that the sum of $1,175, which he (Mr. Crawford) received from that bank, though artfully stated so as to disguise the fact, was composed of $290 of notes on the Franklin Bank of Alexandria, and $885 on the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria.

His own suppressed letter B, No. 7, dated the 29th May, 1819, contains a notification to the Bank of Missouri of the failure of the former of these banks. And a friend has furnished me with the following extract from the files of the National Intelligencer in regard to the latter, viz: "August 28, 1819. The Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria does not redeem its notes in specie, and its notes no longer pass here currently."

The suppressed letters B, No. 25, from himself to the President of the Bank of Missouri, dated the 14th November, 1820, and the President's answer B, No. 26, dated the 12th December, 1820, will show that he received from that bank $40,156, in notes on the Bank of Tennessee and its branches, which were deposited in the Branch of the United States Bank at Louisville, on the 21st May, 1820, to meet the Treasurer's draft.

A report from Luke Lea, pension agent at Knoxville, to J. L. Edwards of the Pension Office, dated the 27th January, 1823, shows that these notes were "mostly on the branches of the Knoxville Bank."

I have in my possession proof that those branches stopped payment in the Summer of 1819, but I deem it unnecessary to exhibit it, as every member of the delegation in Congress from Tennessee, as well as other members of Congress, must know that they had failed to redeem their notes in specie, long before the notes in question were received by Mr. Crawford. It is only necessary to add, that none of these notes are included in the amount of uncurrent notes reported by Mr. Crawford.

Now, though the probability that these misstatements were innocently made, is somewhat weakened by the suppression of the letters that would have detected their inaccuracies, I do not deem it necessary to insist that they prove any thing more than a greater degree of forgetfulness and inadvertence, than to have forgot or overlooked such a trifling affair as the letter mentioned in my examination. If they were intentional, it would prove the statement made against me so much the less entitled to credit.

In making deposits in the local banks of Louisville, Cincinnati, Chillicothe, and of the District of Columbia, (in all of which places branches of the Bank of the United States were established,) and, in some instances, continuing those deposits for years in succession, without making any report thereof to Congress, Mr. Crawford must have forgot, for a very long time, indeed, and on a great variety of occasions, both the letter and intention of the following section in the law establishing the Bank of the United States, viz:

"Be it enacted, &c. That the deposits of the money of the United States in places in which the said Bank or branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said Bank or branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall, at any time, otherwise order and direct; in which cases the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately lay before Congress, if in session, and if not, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the reasons of such order or direction."

Address of Ninian Edwards.

H. OF R.

Indeed, I am under the impression that, notwithstanding his compliance with the above requisition, on the 10th December, 1817, which proved that it was then fresh in his recollection, and though his connexion with the Bank of the United States, its pressing wants, and the nature of the business he had to transact with it, were all calculated to recall his attention to that part of his duty, almost every day, he himself has, in some one of his reports, admitted that he had overlooked it through "mere inadvertence."

I regret to have to say to your honorable body, that both the state of my health, and the want of time, absolutely compel me, most reluctantly, to close this investigation of Mr. Crawford's well-timed statement against me. In this situation, I beg leave to refer you, for further facts, of which I might, under more favorable circumstances, fairly and successfully avail myself, to a few of the publications under the signature of "A. B.," herewith transmitted.

Avowing myself the author of these publications, and, with the exception of a few unimportant typographical errors, and a mere verbal inaccuracy in regard to the time of a certain report's being made, reasserting, before your honorable body, and the nation, that the facts they allege are substantially true, I do most respectfully solicit that they may be taken as a part of, and be printed with, this communication. In order to strengthen my claim to this indulgence, combining all the rights of defence, of accusation, and of asking for investigation, which can entitle me, as a citizen of the United States, or an officer of their Government, to appear before your honorable body, I do expressly state:

1. That the honorable William H. Crawford, Secretary of the Treasury, has mismanaged the national funds.

2. That he has received a large amount of uncurrent notes from certain banks, in part discharge of their debts to the United States, contrary to the resolution of Congress of 1816.

3. That, being called on by a resolution of the House of Representatives to state the amount of uncurrent notes which he received from these banks, he has misstated it, making it less than it really was.

4. That he has, in his report to the House, misrepresented the obligations of these banks, or some one of them, at least, and predicated thereon an indefensible excuse for his conduct in receiving those uncurrent notes.

5. That he has acted illegally, in a variety of instances, by making and continuing deposits of public money in certain local banks, without making report thereof to Congress, according to law; and

6. That he has, in several instances, withheld information and letters, called for by the House, and which it was his duty to have communicated.

His Oath.—Let it speak for itself.

For specifications of these statements, I offer the publications under the signature of A. B., above mentioned, and this communication; and, for proof, I offer that which they respectively refer to.

All this I do defensively; for, if the facts stated be true, no rational man can doubt that they must weaken, at least, the force of Mr. Crawford's statement against me.

I will not charge him with bad intentions in any of those acts. It is more properly the duty of others to inquire into and judge of that matter. I do not ask for an investigation of his conduct. Such a request ought more naturally to be looked for from himself. But I will say, that if, being an officer of the same Government under which he holds his office, I have wilfully and maliciously misrepresented him, in the six foregoing allegations, it is a misdemeanor that would prove me unworthy of the office I hold. I invite him, or any of his friends, to make this charge against me, pledging myself to waive all notice, and, with all the disadvantages of absence, to submit to an investigation thereof by either or both Houses of Congress, and to abide by the decision thereupon. If this proposition is declined, I trust we shall have no more canting about an "A. B. plot." As to myself, I fear not the consequences of any fair investigation, for I know I shall be able, whatever may be the result, to justify myself to the nation. And never having obtained any office by the slightest sacrifice of independence, I never will owe the holding of one to reluctant forbearance, or the courtesy of my enemies.

I will only add, that, if any attempt should hereafter be made, meanly to take advantage of my absence, by those who have forborne to attack me when I could have had an opportunity of defending myself, I must beg of your honorable body, and the nation, to suspend your opinions, and to be assured that there shall be no avoidable delay in vindicating myself. I have in reserve much matter of defensive accusation, and should most certainly have invited your attention to the report concerning the Receivers of Public Moneys at Huntsville, and other matters of no less importance, had time permitted.

NINIAN EDWARDS.

WHEELING, VA., APRIL 6, 1824.

Some desultory conversation took place, as to the proper course to be taken with this communication, between Messrs. A. STEVENSON, FLOYD, CUTHBERT, KREMER, TRACY, McLANE, of Delaware, and WARFIELD.

Mr. FLOYD moved to lay the memorial on the table.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, moved that the address and accompanying papers, be printed, desiring to see the whole truth, whatever it might be. Mr. WARFIELD called for the reading of the address, and the Clerk proceeded accordingly to read it.

The reading had continued about half an hour, when, the address not having been gone more than half through, Mr. WARFIELD said he was satisfied as to the character of the paper, and did not wish the time of the House to be taken up with it longer, as it would obviously require considerable time. Mr. BUCHANAN inquired what the object of the memorialist was, or whether he requested any thing specifically of the House? Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, required that the reading should proceed.

The reading having been finished—

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, said, he was free to declare, now that he had heard the memorial read, that the style and temper in which it was written, manifested so much personal and party feeling, that he should then withdraw his motion to print, but for one consideration. It is well known, he said, that the distinguished individual whose character is assailed in that memorial, stands in a very peculiar relation to the public, and that every thing which concerns his character, in the smallest degree, will be regarded with the liveliest interest by the people of this country. Sir, we are bound to represent, not merely the interest of the people, but their feelings too; and they will not be satisfied if this accusation is prevented from going abroad to the world. This was all I meant, in saying I wished the whole truth to come out. I was far from meaning to imply, that any gentleman was not willing to have a full investigation of the subject. Mr. T. remarked that, although that House ought not to be made the vehicle of private calumny and detraction, nor be the theatre on which individuals, however elevated they may be, should settle their controversies, yet, when it was recollected how sensitive, how tremblingly alive the people were to every thing which affected the characters of those who stood in the same relation to the public as the officer who was now accused, he thought the whole of the charges brought against him ought to be published. If these charges deserved the character of malignity imputed to them by his worthy colleague, (Mr. FLOYD,) and he was not now disposed to contest the matter with him, or to give any opinion on the subject, that malignity would recoil upon its author. Mr. T. said he had unshaken confidence in the character and integrity of the distinguished officer who had been thus attacked, and he had no doubt that on this, as on all other occasions, the accusations against him would prove to be false and unfounded. He must, however, persist in his motion for printing.

Mr. WEBSTER observed, that, in the present delicate affair, the first duty of Congress was, to look to its own course, and preserve its own dignity. He had no idea that this House was to be converted into an arena on which prominent political men were to carry on their personal contests; or a mere instrument, through its power to order papers to be printed, of giving publicity to any thing they might choose to write against each other. If the gentleman from Virginia, who had made the motion to print, did not intend to follow up that motion by any other, he should certainly oppose it—as the only legitimate end of printing papers in this House was for information of members of the House, and not to spread it through the nation. But, if any motion should be made for a committee of investigation, it should have his support; and if the present motion to print, was only preparatory to such a measure, he should not object to it, though he could not consider it as very necessary.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, said, that when he made the motion to lay the memorial on the table, he had done so, because it was the usual course with such papers; but, since it had been read, he was disposed to have it examined, not, he said, because it purported to be a defence, but because, it contained specific charges against one of our officers. Mr. F. said he was opposed to the printing of the memorial, until it could be examined by a committee, and determined, on more reflection and investigation, what ought to be done. This was due to the charges made. As to the rest of the extraordinary production, said Mr. F., it cannot be advertised upon in terms suitable to it. The charges appear to contain nothing but a reiteration of those made by the A. B. conspirators; nor did I think the author of that plot would have ever had the unblushing effrontery to acknowledge himself such. This Iago, however, has chosen to acknowledge the fact, and reiterate the charges formerly made, and seems to think, that his late station as Senator, and his recent appointment by the President, as Minister Plenipotentiary to Mexico, will give a more imposing character to the plot, and that, under the sanction of his own name, with the authority of office, that may now be effectuated, which the anonymous writer failed to do.

Every member of the last Congress, said Mr. F., will recollect that two several committees were appointed to investigate this matter; and every one then seemed to consider that attack as the most infamous conspiracy that was ever formed against the reputation of any man. I am unwilling that this House should become the theatre for any political juggler, or the arena where individuals can come to adjust their disputes. I have too high a respect for the dignity of the House, and, I trust, for myself; but, as there is a specific charge, that may be attended to, I am willing to investigate it; though I will not admit that, because he has been a Senator, is now a Minister to Mexico, and enjoying the confidence of the President, that, therefore, his statements are to be received as he would wish them. The writer has not justified himself or defended himself from charges, which he says were made against him, but has cast imputations upon all who seem to have been in the way of his original design, which has been pursued with pertinacious malignity. Were this man's request allowed, and his calumnies printed by the House, would it not be right to receive and print also the defence of Mr. Dickens, or any other citizen? Why has he left the subject of his own defence to attack the character of Mr. Dickens? That could not have been necessary. Mr. Dickens has a right to be heard as well as a Minister to Mexico, as, I trust, every other American citizen has, without regard to station, and when the two former committees of this House investigated this matter, his character was admitted by all to be good, and entirely unexceptionable. I, too, have heard this of him ever since I have been in Congress, though I should not know him, were we to meet in the street; and, all agree, that he has discharged his official duties with honesty and attention, which is, in my opinion, no small recommendation.

Why has this Minister to Mexico, who enjoys the confidence of the President, left the subject of his defence and referred to the subject of the illicit introduction of slaves by a man who was the friend of Mr. Crawford? Is he to be accountable too for his friend's conduct? I do not know any thing of that matter, said Mr. F., but this I know, that one of the gentlemen who suffered by that attack, of which that memorial reiterates a part, has been here demanding reparation for wrongs suffered in that affair; I know him too, to be an honorable man, and that he will have that matter adjusted. His presence here was known, I presume, to the Minister to Mexico, and he should then have taken up this part of his subject. One would think, said Mr. F., that the object of this political Caliban was more extensive than merely to do himself justice, or his scope would not have been so broad. The A. B. conspirator, however, ought not to have again attempted to consummate the object of his wishes, after he had, in such a sort, succeeded in obtaining the appointment of Minister to Mexico and the President's confidence. He had obtained the reward of so much toil, so much industry, and so many dangers, and he ought to have left behind him the honest reputation to those who had it, as it no longer proved a barrier to his march to the Mission to Mexico and the President's favor.

Look at it. Can any man believe, for an instant, from the manner in which this memorial is brought up, that it is not a deliberate design to operate upon those feelings which, at this time, so much agitate this country and this House? How all that volume could be written from Wheeling, on the Ohio river, with a reference to so many public documents, is more than I can comprehend, and more than I believe. There are two or three charges specifically made, and yet, from his absence, he wishes the public to suspend an opinion in regard to him, should matters turn out unfavorable to him, until he can get back. Why then make them? There are, said Mr. F., several persons in the Government, in whom I have great confidence—but I have more in myself; and I wish these charges to be investigated again, and justice done, though I do not doubt it will result, as did the inquiry by the former committees, which I had thought would have prevented all similar attempts; and, considering the question which now occupies the public, and his success in obtaining office, I did not think that one of those conspirators would have had the audacity, in his own name, to avow himself, and show his unblushing front to this House and the nation; though, if my memory does not fail me, I saw in the newspapers, whilst his nomination was before the Senate, a statement which I believed was authorized by himself, that he was not the author of that plot. Had he been known as the author of that infamous conspiracy, I think I hazard little in saying, that the Senate would not have confirmed his appointment. Mr. F. concluded by moving that the memorial and papers be referred to a select committee.

Mr. LIVERMORE suggested to Mr. TUCKER the propriety of withdrawing his motion to print the papers, that a decision might first be had on their reference to a select committee.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, observed, that he thought the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) somewhat mistook the character of an order to print. Mr. T. did not consider that, in doing so, the House lent its sanction, in any degree, to the document ordered to be printed. It was merely to enable the members to examine a subject at leisure, and understand it thoroughly. Here is a very long memorial, containing facts and argument, and much of it subtle argument too, of which it is impossible to judge without a deliberate examination. After it is printed and examined, it may appear that further inquiry is proper—or, it may seem to be unnecessary. I thought it premature, at this time, to give an opinion on the subject. But, as my colleague seems not unwilling to engage in the investigation, and has moved a reference of it to a select committee, my object of giving it publicity will be attained, and I withdraw my motion to print.

Mr. RANKIN wished that the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury, to which the present document refers, might be referred to the same committee.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to amend Mr. FLOYD's motion, by adding, "and to print it."

Mr. FORSYTH said, he thought much more importance was given to this subject than it deserved. It was an ordinary question to print a long statement for the use and information of the House, and not for the public. He was never unwilling to print any paper of public interest. During the many years he had been a member of this House, he had never seen any evil arise from printing papers. Whether the House ordered the statement to be printed or not, it would doubtless be circulated in the public newspapers, and he had no doubt it was prepared for that purpose. It was intended, he presumed, as a sort of legacy to the country, by the author, who was going as Minister to Mexico—as a mark of his gratitude for the honor of his appointment. This honorable gentleman, said Mr. F., was a Senator in Congress when the former investigations took place by committees of this House; the committee gave him an opportunity of disclosing all he knew of the allegations, and, after a full examination, reported that they were fully satisfied of the groundlessness of the charges. It was the duty of this Senator, as a public man, at that time, and while he was a member of the Senate of the United States, to hold up to the public every defaulter in office with which he was acquainted; but, instead of doing this, he waits until his appointment to a foreign mission is confirmed, and when he is about to leave the country, sends forth this precious paper, pretending to be a defence of himself, but in reality an attack on a high officer of the Government, to be circulated after he shall have been beyond the reach of any call on him to substantiate his charges. He does not ask us to go into an investigation of the subject; and Mr. F. believed that the writer did not expect the House would take any notice of his communication. That was not the writer's object; he only requests the House to put it on its files—to print it, when he shall not be here to make his charges good. This, I believe, said Mr. F., is the third impeachment exhibited against the Secretary of the Treasury, during the present session of Congress: one of them is by this honorable gentleman; another was by a certain John Henry—a name of evil omen in this country, said Mr. F.—[some member here said to Mr. F., that the person's name was Robert Henry.]—I am sorry for it, said Mr. F., as their designs were so similar, it is a pity their names were not the same.

Fortifications.

Mr. F. concluded by saying, he hoped the communication would be printed as a matter of course, and that the subject might go to a select committee for investigation.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Ohio, (who was not a member of Congress when the former investigation took place into the subject of the bank correspondence and the alleged suppression of a paragraph in one of the letters,) said that, since he had taken his seat as a member, he had bestowed much attention on the report of the committee of investigation, and he was perfectly satisfied with the correctness of the conclusion, which the committee had come to; but he was willing it should again be investigated, and therefore withdrew his own motion to print the statement of Mr. Edwards.

Mr. SANFORD thought a matter of so much importance should be referred to a committee composed of a member from each State; that is, twenty-four members.

This motion was rejected almost unanimously, and a committee of seven members was ordered.

Mr. McARTHUR moved that the committee be appointed by ballot, instead of by the Speaker; which motion was also negatived.

Messrs. FLOYD, LIVINGSTON, WEBSTER, RANDOLPH, TAYLOR, McARTHUR, and OWEN, were appointed the said committee.

On motion, the committee were then empowered to send for persons and papers.

FORTIFICATIONS.

On motion of Mr. McLANE the previous orders of the day were dispensed with, and the House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill "making appropriations for completing the several fortifications of the United States—Mr. LATHROP in the Chair.

In relation to the appropriation of $125,000, for the fort at Mobile Point, Mr. COCKE called for further explanation, which was given by Mr. McLANE, Mr. HAMILTON, and Mr. OWEN of Alabama.

Mr. McLANE moved to change the appropriation of $50,000 from Fort Fayette, in New York harbor, to the projected work on New Utrecht Point, in the same harbor; and supported the motion by giving a statement of the circumstances bearing on the question.

Mr. COCKE opposed the amendment, as going to authorize a new fortification, before those already commenced were finished.

Mr. HAMILTON spoke in reply, and defended the propriety and necessity of erecting the work proposed.

Mr. McLANE confirmed the same view, and explained the connexion of the proposed fort with the general plan of defence.

Mr. SHARPE stated some further facts, and contended that the proposed fortification, as a necessary defence to Fort Lafayette, was not a new measure, but only completing what was already begun.

Mr. COCKE again urged his objections, and was replied to by Mr. CAMBRELENG and Mr. McLANE.

Mr. COBB thought that a clause in an appropriation bill was not the mode in which Congress should express its will for the extension of the plan of defence; and that the size and location of the several fortresses should be designated by law before money was appropriated for building them.

Mr. McLANE replied, and Mr. COBB explained, and enforced the grounds he had taken, and Mr. HAMILTON spoke in reply.

The question was then taken on Mr. McLANE's motion, and decided in the affirmative—85 to 45.

Mr. McLANE moved further to amend the bill, by inserting a clause to appropriate, for the gradual armament of the fortifications, one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HAMILTON supported this amendment. He stated that a bill to this effect, appropriating a larger amount, had passed the Senate, and was referred to a committee of this House. That committee had agreed not to press the passage of the bill from the Senate, provided the amendment, now proposed, were agreed to by the House.

Mr. COBB and Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, were opposed to the incorporation of this appropriation with the bill now before the House, desiring that it should be separately presented.

Mr. HAMILTON replied.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, made some remarks in reference to the prices which had been heretofore given for cannon, and the means which ought to be taken for procuring them.

Mr. McLANE said, he did not particularly wish to press the subject on the House at this time. He therefore withdrew his amendment.

Mr. McL. then moved to amend the bill, by inserting an appropriation for certain improvements to be made in the buildings attached to the Military Academy at West Point. This amendment was rejected—37 to 72.

Mr. STEWART moved to amend the bill, by inserting an appropriation for surveying the route of a canal to connect the waters of the Chesapeake with the Ohio, and of the Ohio with Lake Erie, $9,000. Mr. S. read an extract from the late Message of the President to prove the propriety of this amendment.

Messrs. MERCER and VANCE, of Ohio, opposed this appropriation; and Mr. STEWART spoke again in support of it. The amendment was rejected, without a division.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill to the House.

Mr. FORWARD gave notice that he should, on Thursday next, ask the House to go into Committee of the Whole, to take into consideration the bill "imposing a tax on sales at auction."

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD gave notice, that he should, to-morrow, ask the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, "to provide for building ten additional sloops of war."

The House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 20.

Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to alter the times of holding the district court in the district of Missouri," reported the same without amendment, and it was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made a report on the petition of John Top, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LONG laid the following resolution on the table, for consideration to-morrow, viz:

Resolved. That the Postmaster General be requested to lay before this House a statement of all the post routes now established, not included in his statement of unproductive post routes already submitted to the House; together with a statement of the amount paid for the transportation of the mail on each route, the number of mails on each route per week, and the amount of profits arising from each one. Also, the amount that would be saved by discontinuing certain unproductive routes, as proposed by the bill reported by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; likewise, the amount that might be saved by having one mail instead of two, on all routes where there are now two mails a week.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, a committee was appointed on the part of this House to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to examine and report what business ought to be acted upon at the present session; and, also, at what time the session may be closed, by the adjournment of the two Houses.—Messrs. TAYLOR, McLANE of Delaware, FORSYTH, RANKIN, and CAMPBELL of Ohio, were appointed the committee on the part of this House.

Mr. CUSHMAN submitted the following resolution, viz:

Resolved. That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of laying a duty on stills, or on spirits distilled from foreign and domestic materials, within the United States.

The resolution was read; and, on the question, Will the House now consider it? it was determined in the negative.

The resolution of Mr. LONGFELLOW, calling on the President for information respecting certain spoiliations on our commerce by French cruisers, was taken up, and, having been supported by Mr. L. in a few observations, was adopted.

Mr. FORSYTH suggested that the same information had been called for by a resolution of the Senate, but, afterwards withdrew that objection to the resolve, which finally passed nem. con.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 13th instant, requesting a detailed account of the disbursement of the sums appropriated by the acts of the 30th April, 1818, and of the 3d March, 1819, for making certain improvements in the grounds connected with the public offices and the President's house, I transmit a report from the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, which contains the information desired.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, April 18, 1824.

The SPEAKER, by leave, presented the memorial of Amelia Eugenia de la Rue, heiress of M. De Beaumarchais, in relation to her claim for repayment of moneys advanced by her late father for the service of the United States.

Mr. TAYLOR expressed a hope that the memorial would receive the early attention of the House.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, chairman of the committee to whom was referred the papers in relation to this claim, after some observations on its importance, gave notice that he should, on Tuesday next, call up the consideration of the committee's report on the subject.

INDIAN RESERVATION.

The resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, calling for certain information from the War Department, in relation to an Indian reservation, was taken up. Mr. M. said it was doubtless expected of him to assign some reasons for the call on the War Department for the information sought by the resolution, which he should endeavor to give in as concise a manner as possible. It will be recollected, said he, that, some time since, a petition of the said George Harlin, alluded to in the resolution, was presented, setting forth that he held, by virtue of the treaty alluded to, a reservation of 640 acres of land; that, in the location of this reservation, for the want of better knowledge of the geography of the country, he committed an error in its location, and did not cover the land he designed, and asked the liberty of changing its location to a more favorite and valuable tract. A bill, embracing the prayer of his petition, has been reported, and is now on file. Since it was so reported, I have received several communications from gentlemen of the first standing and respectability in the county and neighborhood where this reservation is situated, remonstrating, in the strongest terms, against the propriety of the passage of this bill, stating, among other objections, that the tract of land which the petitioner wishes to obtain has been made more valuable by means of the labor and improvements placed upon it by unfortunate settlers, and the high state of cultivation it has been put in, together with the accidental circumstance of the establishment of the seat of justice for the county immediately on its borders. It is also intimated, sir, that this idea of a mistake and wish to change the location has originated in speculative motives.

Now, sir, that we may have all the light and information of which the subject is susceptible, and act understandingly, and be enabled to do justice to the present occupants, who, I have no hesitation in saying, are more entitled to our sympathies than an Indian, I have proposed the resolution calling upon the proper department for all the information in relation to the transaction, and hope, sir, it will be acceptable to the House to adopt it. The resolution was agreed to.

Address of N. Edwards.—Fortification Bill.

APRIL, 1824.

ADDRESS OF NINIAN EDWARDS.

Mr. FORSYTH submitted the following resolution for adoption by the House:

Resolved, That the President be officially informed that this House has ordered an investigation of the memorial presented to this House on the 16th instant, by N. Edwards, lately appointed Minister to Mexico; that the said N. Edwards may be instructed not to leave the United States before that investigation has taken place.

The question of consideration of this motion being called for, (a previous, but not usual question,) was taken; and there were: for considering the motion 61; against considering it 84.

So the House refused now to consider the proposition.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, then rose, and said that, connected with the subject, he would take occasion to say, that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. FLOYD) was absent from the House this morning when that part of the Journal was read which announces the names of the persons appointed on the committee to consider the memorial of Mr. Edwards. As he believed that, from considerations of delicacy, the gentleman from Virginia would not wish to be a member of the committee, Mr. M. took this mode of apprizing him of the fact, that he might have an opportunity of asking to be excused from serving upon it.

Mr. FLOYD rose, and requested the gentleman from Alabama, if his allusion was to him, to repeat his statement. Mr. M. accordingly, in substance, repeated his statement.

Mr. FLOYD then said that, in a case of delicacy concerning him, (Mr. F.) he had hoped that the gentleman from Alabama was the last man in this nation to undertake to make suggestions, and he did not think his doing so showed any delicacy on his (Mr. M.'s) part. I am, said Mr. F., the sufficient judge of my conduct in such a case. Perhaps the gentleman from Alabama may be acquainted with some circumstances of the A. B. Plot, so called in the discussion last Winter, and subsequently. If I know any thing of myself, however, I am capable of doing justice to every individual in this nation, whose conduct may be presented to me, in my official capacity, for examination. When a specific charge is made against a public officer, after the friends of that officer, and myself by name, have been called upon, through that paper which is the channel of every thing but truth, to propose an investigation, I thought it became peculiarly my duty to investigate the charge. What I think of the accuser in private life is for me to consider, and does not touch my public duty. Mr. F. here alluded to a friend of the gentleman from Alabama, (as we understood him,) who had for several successive sessions called upon this House for the impeachment of a judge, whom, it seemed, he had previously attempted to bribe, &c.; and here, he said, were charges one, two, and three, asserting certain accusations against the Secretary, and calling for an investigation. This, surely, was sufficient reason for an investigation being pressed by those thus called upon. The devil himself might prefer charges here—it would not change our opinion of that personage—but it would surely be a particular reason for an investigation by those who are implicated. So far as the gentleman from Alabama is concerned, said Mr. F., perhaps there may be other reasons for consulting motives of delicacy. When I do want suggestions of that sort, I should think very differently of myself from what I have been accustomed to do, were I to be obliged to go to him for them.

The SPEAKER said there was no question before the House, and the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama having been made and answered, the conversation must drop.

Mr. MOORE then rose, and moved that the gentleman from Virginia should be excused from serving on the committee.

The question of consideration being called on this motion, the mover withdrew it.

Mr. MOORE then asked to make a remark in reply to Mr. FLOYD; but the SPEAKER declared it to be out of order. Mr. MOORE wished to know if it would be in order to ask leave of the House to speak in reply? The SPEAKER thought not.

Mr. MOORE then renewed his motion, in the following words, with a view in this way to have an opportunity of addressing the House.

Resolved, That JOHN FLOYD, a member of this House, be excused from serving on the committee appointed yesterday, on the subject of the memorial of Ninian Edwards.

The question being taken on considering this motion, it was decided in the negative, almost unanimously; and so this matter ended.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The amendments yesterday reported by the Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for erecting fortifications were read.

The House agreed to the several amendments, with the exception of that which substituted some other words for the term reconnaissance.

Mr. COCKE moved to strike out the appropriation of $50,000 for a fortification on Narragansett bay. He objected to the general policy of erecting insulated fortifications for the defence of single towns. He thought that the strength of the Government ought to be devoted to securing two or three great points, such as New York, the Chesapeake, and the Mississippi; and he called upon the chairman of the Military Committee for information on the subject.

Mr. HAMILTON replied, and went into an illustration, at some length, of the present system of exterior defence to which the bill had reference.

Mr. DUFFEE, of Rhode Island, succeeded, and replied to the objections of the gentleman from Tennessee, supporting his observations by extracts from the reports of the Commissioners of the Navy, stating the importance of Narragansett bay as a rendezvous for the Navy. He contended that its fortification was a national, and not a merely local object. He showed its value to an enemy, and quoted authorities to show that the British were well aware of the importance of this point on our coast.

APRIL, 1824.

Fortification Bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. COCKE replied. His observations, he said, had not had any exclusive reference to this point, but to the general system on which the Government seemed to be acting, but which had never been submitted to, or affirmed by, the judgment of this House. He should oppose the appropriation till that system had been fully explained, and the House had had an opportunity to approve or condemn it.

Mr. DUFFEE rejoined, and further referred to documents in support of the expediency of the appropriation.

Mr. STEWART opposed the appropriation for this fort, on account of the time and the manner in which it was asked for. He would vote to complete such works as are begun, but for no new works, until the whole system is exhibited, and Congress can determine how far it is proper to go in its adoption. He advocated at large, as a preferable system of defence, the adoption of canals along the seaboard, and wished that both these systems should be submitted to Congress. He also referred to the large contributions of the Western States for the defence of the seaboard.

Mr. FARRELLY, in reply, advocated the propriety of the present fortification, and of forts in general, as a suitable support to the exertions of militia for the defence of the country, and referred to the history of the late war for confirmation of the correctness of his position.

Mr. BARTLETT rose in reply to Mr. STEWART, and condemned the strain of some of his remarks, as referring exclusively to the interests of the West. He noticed the objections made to the appropriation, which, he contended, did not apply to it. The present fort might be erected without pledging the country to any general extension of the system of defence, by means of fortifications. He dwelt on the importance of this point as one necessary to be defended.

Mr. McARTHUR wished for further information as to the total cost of the fortifications contemplated for protecting Narragansett bay.

Mr. McLANE replied, and gave a general account of the contemplated system of defence. He went into an extended exposition of the importance and necessity of the fortification now asked for; he stated the capacity of the country generally to sustain the expenses of defending itself; and on this part of the subject, declared that, according to the present prospect of its finances, the national debt will be extinguished by the year 1832, even allowing for any diminution occasioned for a time by the proposed tariff.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, supported the appropriation in a short speech.

Mr. TRACY was opposed to the measure, which he did not think warranted by the finances of the country. He was of opinion that we are going too far and too fast in these appropriations.

Mr. FULLER replied to the gentleman last up, combatted the several objections which had been advanced, and contended that this was a proper time to commence the fortifications in Rhode Island.

Mr. DUFFEE corrected what he considered to be a misstatement of Mr. TRACY, on the expenses of the general system.

Mr. ROSS, intending to vote against the appropriation, stated the views that would govern him, and he adverted to the misapplication of part of the moneys heretofore appropriated for fortifications of importance superior to that now in question, &c.

Mr. TRACY explained, in reply to Mr. DUFFEE, and further insisted on the views he had formerly expressed.

Mr. COBB called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COCKE now modified his amendment, so as to strike out, also, the appropriation for a fort on New Utrecht Point, in the harbor of New York.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, opposed the motion, and adverted to the experience of the war of the Revolution, as showing the necessity of such a fortification. He insisted that it was sound economy to put up these forts; great interests were jeopardized by admitting the erection of these defences, and double expense incurred for an inefficient defence by militia.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, in a short speech, advocated the striking out.

Mr. SHARPE replied. He thought these forts could not be commenced a day too soon. If New York and Rhode Island were not thought worth protecting, he should vote against the whole bill. On the requisition of Mr. S. the question was divided, and being first on striking out the appropriation for Narragansett bay—

Mr. TRIMBLE said he had no objection to these appropriations, provided the whole amount granted this year for the purpose of erecting fortifications, did not exceed $500,000. The haste with which the system had heretofore been pursued had brought the nation to loans, and to postponing the payment of the public creditors. He thought that it would be sufficient for the present year to buy the land for these forts.

Mr. WOOD replied, and dwelt on the necessity for fortifications. In the late war, the nation had paid three hundred and twenty-six thousand militia, besides her regulars. With sufficient forts, twenty-six thousand would have done as much. Money applied wisely in defence, was the best means of preventing the augmentation of the public debt.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, was opposed to the appropriation. He discussed the merits of the general system devised for fortifications, which he thought was going beyond the resources of the country.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, again rose, and replied to the objections urged in various parts of the House, and made a variety of explanations on the subject of the bill.

Mr. TRIMBLE said a few words in reply to Mr. WOOD, on the expenses of the last war, as arising not from the want of forts, &c., but of sufficient roads, and other conveniences for the movement of troops.

Mr. HAMILTON advocated the appropriation, and went at large into a defence of the system of permanent fortifications, of which this was a part.

Proceedings.

APRIL, 1824.

Mr. COBB remarked on the present state of the national funds, and contended that the balance now in the Treasury was almost all liable to be drawn out by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, to comply with the national engagements.

The question was then taken on striking out the appropriation for the fort at Narraganset Bay, and decided in the negative—yeas 62, nays 120, as follows:

Mr. COCKE then withdrew the residue of his amendment, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

And then the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 21.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of Archibald Clarke; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McLANE, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for the sale of the warehouse at the quarantine ground, near the English Turn, in the State of Louisiana, and for the erection of a dwelling-house at the Balize, in said State, for the use of the boarding officer at that place; and for other purposes," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McLANE, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Elijah Van Syckel, of Philadelphia," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill of this House, for the relief of the same individual.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Thaddeus Mayhew," reported the same with an amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The following bills from the Senate, viz: "A bill in addition to the acts relative to the election of President and Vice President of the United States;" also, a bill "for the relief of William Duane," were twice read and referred.

The amendments of the Senate to a bill from this House concerning invalid pensioners, was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, (ayes 69, noes 54,) on the state of the Union.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD moved to take up the bill from the Senate, authorizing the building of an additional number of sloops of war. The question being taken, it was decided in the negative, ayes 69, noes 71. The Committee then rose.

On motion of Mr. RANKIN, the House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill "supplementary to an act providing for the correction of errors in the entry of lands at the land offices."

The bill was read. On motion of Mr. RANKIN, it was slightly amended in the 1st section.

The question being on rising and reporting the bill, a debate arose, in which Messrs. RANKIN, of Mississippi, CAMPBELL, of Ohio, COOK, of Illinois, MCCOY, McLEAN, of Ohio, SANDFORD, of Tennessee, CONWAY, of Arkansas, and HENRY, of Kentucky, took part.

Several farther amendments proposed to the bill were rejected, and the bill was reported to the House.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Captain Thomas Staniford," reported the same with an amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, who were instructed on the 12th instant, to inquire into the expediency of so modifying or amending the act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade or fisheries, and regulate the same, so as to exempt all vessels and boats employed in navigating the canals in the State of New York, from the necessity of being enrolled or licensed, and from the payment of tonnage duties, reported, that it is inexpedient so to modify or amend the said acts; which report was read and concurred in by the House.

Mr. NEWTON, from the same committee, reported a bill to allow the bounty to vessels employed in the cod fisheries, in certain cases; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. LONG, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act of the present session, authorizing the executors of John B. Mebane to collect certain arrears of tax, as to authorize the said executors to collect arrears of internal duties.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House, entitled "An act concerning the invalid pensioners," with an amendment. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act in addition to the acts relative to the election of President and Vice President of the United States;" and a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Colonel William Duane;" and a joint resolution fixing the time for an adjournment of Congress; in which amendments, two bills last mentioned and resolution, the Senate ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to alter the times of holding the District Court in the District of Missouri," was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the President of the Washington Canal Company, of their receipts and expenditures, during the last year, made in obedience to the requisitions of their charter; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. LONG, of North Carolina, moved that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act for the relief of John B. Mebane, as to include in its provisions, internal duties as well as direct taxes, to be collected by his executors.

The motion was agreed to.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. LONG, on the subject of post routes, was taken up. He explained the object of the resolution, which was opposed by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, in a few remarks.

Mr. LONG then modified his resolution by omitting all but the following:

"Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to lay before this House a statement of the amount that would be saved by discontinuing certain unproductive routes, as proposed by the bill reported by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; likewise the amount that might be saved by having one mail instead of two, on all routes where there are now two mails a week."

Mr. COCKE and Mr. REED opposed the resolution, and, at the motion of Mr. MCCOY, it was laid on the table.

ADDRESS OF NINIAN EDWARDS.

Mr. McDUFFIE offered the following:

"Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to furnish the President of the United States with a copy of the memorial of Ninian Edwards, recently presented to the House, containing certain charges against the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. McDUFFIE said, that he regretted that the subject had been presented to the House at all; but, since it had, he thought the facts should be submitted to the President of the United States, that he might take such course as he may deem proper in this matter, it being a dispute between his own officers.

Mr. SAUNDERS accorded in the propriety of the resolution, and suggested an amendment, that the President be informed of the organization of a committee, by this House, to investigate the case. This course, he said, would not surprise the President. If the President should choose to recall Mr. Edwards, he would have it in his power to do so. He might be permitted to say, that the course of Mr. Edwards was not the same as that pursued towards Mr. Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, in 1794. Mr. Giles called for information, and boldly offered and supported his motion, and did not throw charges into the House, and leave them to pursue them if they could. The same course ought to have been pursued by Mr. Edwards in this case, instead of which he has departed hence on his way to a foreign station, and thrown his charges back upon those he has left behind.

Mr. WEBSTER said, he hoped he might be excused for making a single remark, without going farther. It was obvious that the committee, which had been appointed, had no time to make any progress in investigating the charges of Mr. Edwards, at this session. He hoped the House had confidence enough in the committee to agree to the motion he should now make, which was, to defer acting upon this motion until to-morrow morning. With this view, Mr. W. moved that the motion lie on the table.

This course was agreed to, without a division.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The engrossed bill making appropriations for the fortifications of the United States, was read a third time.

Mr. COBB moved that the bill be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions so to amend it, as to reduce the total sum appropriated for the present year to $400,000; and supported the motion by a speech, in which he insisted that the system of defence, to which this bill has reference, had never been adopted by the Government of the United States. It might have been desired by one of the Departments, but had received no sanction from Congress. He wished to have the whole system spread out before the House, and to know its form and extent. He at present knew little or nothing about it—and he should oppose all appropriations, at least for new works, until Congress had opportunity to investigate and decide upon the eligibility of the general plan.

Mr. LITTLE moved to amend the motion by striking out 400,000 and inserting 500,000.

Mr. COBB spoke in explanation.

H. OF R.

Fortification Bill.

APRIL, 1824.

Mr. LITTLE replied, and advocated the propriety and necessity of permanent works of defence. During the late war, more money had been expended in temporary works, now useless, than all that had since been appropriated to the erection of the large and valuable works that have been erected. He thought, in the present state of the Treasury, it was perfectly proper to proceed with the system of defence which had been commenced.

Mr. TRACY, advocated the amendment, and contended that, in general, $500,000 was as much as could advantageously be applied to this object, within a year. He replied to the argument of the gentleman from Maryland, drawn from the last war, which, he insisted, would go to show the propriety of a great standing Army, and an immense Navy. This branch of expenditure should be restricted, as well as other branches. If so large a sum was indispensable for Fort Jackson, and the fortification at Mobile Point, let it be taken from other parts of the plan. If these sums were granted now, more would probably be asked for next year, &c.

Mr. OWEN spoke in reply—and contended that it was bad economy to grant the sums necessary for completing these works, in such small parts at a time, as to delay their completion, and expose what was already done to loss and injury, by standing still, and going to partial decay, &c.

Mr. STEWART was in favor of the amendment. Granting $500,000 would be proceeding as we have heretofore done, gradually increasing the sums appropriated. If more was given, it would possibly lead to a wasteful expenditure. The best preparation for war was, to preserve the credit of the country, and reduce its debt.

Mr. MERCER went into a recapitulation of what had been done by Government in relation to the plan of general defence. Congress had formerly thought an annual appropriation of $800,000 expedient. He thought the amount should approach that sum still as far as the state of the country and of the Treasury would allow. He referred to an attempt, once made, to reduce the standing army to two thousand men. General WASHINGTON had suggested, as an amendment to this plan, a proviso that the enemy should never invade the country with more than two thousand men. He thought a similar proviso ought now to be inserted: that no nation should declare war against the United States within twenty years; the period some gentlemen proposed for completing the defences of the country. Mr. M. adverted to the experience of the last war, and stated what had happened at Norfolk. He concluded that the interior had an equal interest with all other parts of the country in the defence of the coast, as going to render less necessary the services of the militia, &c.

Mr. LITTLE withdrew his motion.

Mr. TRACY renewed it, and Mr. COBB accepted it as a modification.

Mr. CONDUCT moved to amend the motion by striking out the clause for instructing the committee, and leaving the question simply on a motion for recommitment.

Mr. COBB objected to this amendment.

Mr. McLANE opposed the recommitment, and stated that there never had been any settled rule or ratio of appropriation for fortifications determined by the practice of the House, but the sums voted had always been governed by the exigency of each year. He went into a history of the several appropriations which had been made, explained the necessity of the present appropriations, and replied to some of the objections urged against them.

Mr. WOOD opposed the notion of being restricted to an annual sum for appropriations for this object. The object of expenditure was a definite one, but how much should be given in each year, must depend on circumstances. He dwelt on the distress on the coast occasioned by the approach of an enemy, and argued that this was the chief danger to which the country was exposed in war. He stated the condition of New York harbor, and reprobated the idea of abandoning the new work proposed for its defence. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia aimed at an abandonment of the system of defence altogether.

Mr. COBB replied, and further insisted on the ground he had before taken; and he read extracts from documents to support his argument. He did not understand, and could not discover, what was the plan on which we were now proceeding. No war was impending; and he thought that Congress was not bound to adopt every magnificent scheme that should be suggested by any Department of the Government. He saw no limit to the expenditure; for he did not know where the plan stopped. Every extension of the plan of fortification, necessarily involved an increase of the Army, and a proportional augmentation of the national expenses. There was another bill on the table for arming the fortresses. If both should pass, the appropriation this year, for fortifications, would exceed $700,000. Once begun, the works must be gone on with and completed. He was not opposed to all systems of defence, but wished that Congress should have the modification of the system.

Mr. FULLER thought that the views of the gentleman from Georgia should have led to a different course. He was surprised he would attempt so small a measure as the cutting off $100,000 from an appropriation of $600,000. He contended that the system had been laid before Congress in a series of reports, and, by appropriations thereon, Congress had given it so much sanction as amounted to an adoption of it. He insisted that confidence must be reposed by the different departments of the Government in each other, and by a Congress of one period in that of another. He stated the caution with which surveys had been made; the waste and loss which would ensue from temporary erections, &c. The appropriations had been continued, by the good sense of this House, from year to year, and he hoped this would not be the period at which they were to be suspended.

Mr. MCCOY went into a history of what had already been done by Congress, and referred to the useless works on Dauphin Island; the loans which became necessary from too great expenditures on these objects, and the subsequent reduction of the public expenditures, &c.; and he called for the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. DUFFEE remonstrated, at some length, against the House retracting what it had yesterday deliberately done. He insisted on the wisdom of measures of defence even in an economical view, and particularly on the expediency of the measures proposed by the bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE declared the motion now offered to be the same which the House had yesterday rejected by a vote of nearly two to one, viz: whether the new works at New York and Rhode Island shall be commenced? He trusted, as no new argument had been adduced to-day, no new result would be obtained.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the motion of Mr. COBB to recommit the bill, &c., as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen of Massachusetts, Beecher, Brown, Buchanan, Buck, Buckner, Campbell of Ohio, Cary, Cobb, Cocke, Conner, Culpeper, Edwards of North Carolina, Findlay, Foot of Connecticut, Forsyth, Gatlin, Gazlay, Hall, Harris, Henry, Hooks, Johnson of Virginia, F. The question was then put, Shall the bill pass? It passed in the affirmative.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The joint resolution from the Senate fixing a time for the adjournment of Congress—15th May next—was twice read.

Mr. ROSS moved to refer it to the joint committee yesterday appointed on the part of this House to determine on what business shall be taken up at the present session, and at what time the two Houses shall adjourn.

Mr. ALLEN opposed the commitment, remarked at some length on the evil of prolonged sessions of Congress, and adverted to the early adjournment of Congress of 1816, when a compensation was substituted for a per diem allowance, and the arduous duties which that Congress had nevertheless accomplished, &c.; and he called for the yeas and nays on the question of commitment.

Mr. WRIGHT was opposed to an early adjournment, while important business remained undone, and objected to a decision upon the resolution whilst a joint committee, appointed to consider the subject, had not yet reported, &c.

Mr. MCCOY inquired whether it was in order to subject a resolution from the other House to a committee consisting in part of members of the House which had already passed upon the resolution.

The CHAIR pronounced it to be in order.

The question was then taken on the commitment, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Bartley, Beecher, Breck, Brown, Buchanan, Burleigh, Cady, Campbell of Ohio, Cary, Cassidy, Condict, Crafts, Craig, Duffee, Eddy, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Ellis, Farrelly, Findlay, Foote of New York, Frost, Gatlin, Gazlay, Hall, Harris, Hayden, Hayward, Hemphill, Henry, Holcombe, Jenkins, Johnson of Virginia, F. So the resolution from the Senate was referred to the joint committee yesterday appointed on the motion of Mr. TAYLOR.

And the House adjourned.

H. OF R.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

APRIL, 1824.

THURSDAY, April 22.

Mr. FULLER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made a report on the petition of Benjamin King, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill from the Senate "for enclosing the burying ground of Christ Church, Washington Parish," without amendment; which was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDOLPH wished to move to reject the bill; but, in this stage of the proceeding, the motion was not in order.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to authorize the building of lighthouses, light vessels, and beacons, therein mentioned, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ALEXANDER, of Virginia, submitted the following, which lies one day:

"Resolved, That the President be requested to cause to be laid before this House the proceedings of a court martial lately held at Norfolk, for the trial of Lieutenant Beverley Kennon, of the United States Navy."

The amendments made in Committee of the Whole to the bill "for correcting errors in entering lands at the land offices," were read and agreed to by the House, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ADDRESS OF NINIAN EDWARDS.

Mr. FLOYD, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Ninian Edwards, vindicating himself and accusing Mr. Secretary Crawford, pursuant to instructions of the committee, communicated the following minutes of its proceedings, viz:

"The committee, to whom was referred a communication from Ninian Edwards, report the following minutes of their proceedings to the House of Representatives:

APRIL 21, 1824.

Present, all the members of the committee.

Voted, That the committee ought to proceed to make inquiry into the matters contained in the said memorial, and connected therewith.

Voted, That, for the purpose of such inquiry, the attendance of the said Ninian Edwards upon the committee, to be by them examined, is requisite; and that his attendance be accordingly ordered.

Voted, That the chairman do inform the House of the foregoing resolutions of the committee; and inasmuch as it is suggested that the said Ninian Edwards is about to leave the United States on foreign diplomatic service—

Voted, That the chairman do move the House that information of said communication, of the votes of the House thereon, and of the foregoing resolutions of the committee, be communicated to the President of the United States."

The latter proposition having been put into the form of a motion by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, and the question being upon agreeing thereto—

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, said, he had the honor, a day or two ago, of submitting a motion to the House on this subject, the object of which he had not an opportunity to explain, in consequence of a call for the question of consideration. The object I had in view, said Mr. F., was the same as that which the committee seem to have had in contemplation in their report of this morning. I understand this to be, to prevent any collision between the orders of the Executive branch of the Government and those of the Legislative. I understand the committee to have determined on calling Mr. Edwards before them to ascertain what he has to say upon this subject, in addition to what he has stated in his memorial. As a matter of courtesy, that being the case, it is proper for the House to give notice of the fact to the President of the United States, that the individual in question might not seek to escape, under the plea of Executive orders, from the investigation which he has himself asked of this House to institute. The object of my motion was the same with that now before the House, and it appears to me that the form of mine was more proper than the form of that which has been submitted. What interest has the President of the United States in knowing what are the votes of any committee of this House? All that is necessary for him to know is, that this House has taken up the subject for investigation. We do not ask from him any thing to enable us to exercise our rightful power in this matter, and our motives for acting are therefore of no importance to the due information of the Executive. The simple announcement of the fact is sufficient. Under these impressions, Mr. F. moved to strike out all the above, after the word "Ordered," and insert, in lieu thereof, his motion, in the following words:

"That the President be officially informed that this House has ordered an investigation of the memorial presented to this House on the 19th instant by Ninian Edwards, lately appointed Minister to Mexico; that the said Ninian Edwards may be instructed not to leave the United States before that investigation has taken place."

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, said, as the course pointed out by the committee would attain all the objects which the gentleman from Georgia had in view, he did not see why the change should be made. If the gentleman will attend to the terms of the proposition before the House, said Mr. R., he will see that there is nothing in it which, in the smallest degree, compromises the proceedings of this body; that we are acting by our own inherent power; that it is not proposed to call on the Executive Department, though a co-ordinate branch of the Government, for any ancillary aid. We are acting by our own virtue and power; but, having done so, we have thought it proper to advise the Executive branch of the Government, that he might take such order on the matter, in his own exclusive sphere, as to him may seem fit and proper. And what more can we do? I hope the amendment will not be adopted, but that we shall decide on this motion, and give to the chairman an opportunity to make a further motion, which he is authorized by the committee to make.

Address of Ninian Edwards.

H. OF R.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said, it was true that, on a former occasion, when the gentleman from Georgia presented his motion, he (Mr. T.) did call for the question of consideration upon it. The reason why he had done so, was, that the subject had just been referred to a committee without any special instruction. The first question, it was apparent, which would present itself to that committee would be, Does the memorial contain sufficient matter to justify proceeding in the investigation of its contents? That question had not been, in any manner, decided, when the gentleman from Georgia offered his motion. It was not until last night that the committee came to the determination that it was proper that they should proceed in their inquiry. This, Mr. T. said, was necessarily a previous question to be determined. For, if the committee had been of opinion that the subject was not, for any reason, fit to be inquired into, it would not have been proper to give to the President the intimation in question. After the committee had decided the preliminary question, the next step was to require the attendance of Mr. Edwards. The House will perceive that the committee propose to apply to the Executive for no power, but to notify him of the decision requiring the attendance of Mr. Edwards, as a fit regard for that comity and respect which is due from this House to a co-ordinate branch of the Government. Mr. T. believed that the notification of both these decisions of the committee was necessary, for the purpose of apprising the President of the reasons of this House for requiring the attendance of an individual who was known to be absent on diplomatic services, &c.

Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, did not see that any difficulty was presented by this question to the House. Here, said he, is a communication referred to a committee of this House, in the course of investigating which, the personal attendance of an individual, understood to have been recently despatched on a foreign service, is found to be necessary, and is required. All that the committee aim at, therefore, is to inform the Executive of so much as to show that business before us requires the personal attendance of one whom he has despatched, or is about to despatch on foreign diplomatic service. This is all that is proposed by the resolution now before the House.

Mr. KREMER, of Pennsylvania, rose, and observed that, before he voted on this question, he must know whether the committee can wait for the return of the person proposed to be sent for. He knew not, for his own part, where Mr. Edwards was to be found. The session was now near its close, it would be unnecessary to send for him, if, when he came, the House had adjourned, or the committee was not prepared to go on. If we do send to Wheeling, when our messenger gets there Mr. E. will be gone, and we shall be pursuing him from town to town nobody knows how long.

If it was in order, he should move that the resolution lie on the table.

The motion to lay the subject on the table was decided in the negative, by a large majority.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, said, the objection he had to the matter now before the House, would apply as well to the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia, as to the recommendation of the committee. He could perceive no necessity for the further interposition of the House, and it might be improper to call for it. We have referred the memorial to a committee, said he, with what propriety it is not for me now to say, and have vested that committee with full power to send for persons and papers. We could give no greater power. Under the authority already possessed, the committee were authorized to send for this individual, without our interference, and he thought they should do so. If the public character of the individual rendered it improper to compel his attendance, without the interference of the Executive, it would be competent for the committee, without applying to this House, to request such interference. He had some experience of parliamentary proceedings, and he believed it unprecedented for a committee, vested with full powers, to call upon the House to do what might be as well done without their aid. He could easily conceive, that a subject of no great magnitude, in itself, might be clothed with much artificial importance, by such proceedings; and he saw no propriety in the committee reporting the journal of their private proceedings, from time to time, to this House. He was averse to the repeated agitation of the subject in this manner, to the prejudice of other business, by the daily or weekly report of the journal of the committee's proceedings. He desired a full and prompt investigation; the prompt the better; but he thought the committee had ample power over the subject, and he hoped the House would not be called upon to act unnecessarily in the business.

Mr. CUTHBERT, of Georgia, referring to the intimation, as he understood it, of the committee, that the presence of Mr. Edwards was so necessary that the investigation of the charges made by him could not go on without his presence, said he thought there could be no such indispensable necessity for the presence of Mr. Edwards here. The House would perceive, he said, that any individual, intending to do a serious mischief to another, might select a particular moment to prefer charges against another, and, by abandoning his position, preventing an investigation of his motives as well as his charges, leave an erroneous impression on the public mind. It was desirable that the accuser should be where he places his accusation; the common sense of mankind shows that the accuser ought to abide by the consequences of his accusation. But, if he flies from that responsibility, the investigation should not, therefore, be delayed. Such delay would be to furnish the individual with an opportunity of doing all the mischief he desired. Unless it could be ascertained that the individual in question could be brought to this place within a reasonable time, it was desirable, it appeared to him, that the investigation of his charges should not be delayed until he could be sent for.

Mr. WEBSTER replied to the gentleman from Delaware, as to the report made from the committee. It was certainly no unusual thing for the chairman of a committee to make a motion in this House, by the instruction of the committee; and, if a portion of the minutes of the committee were coupled with it, he did not see that that would alter the case, as to the expediency or propriety of the practice. With respect to the suggestion, which had been made, that sending for Mr. Edwards would procrastinate the inquiry, the gentleman from Georgia was not to suppose that the committee was going wholly to suspend this investigation, to wait for anybody's attendance.

Mr. McLANE, still fully impressed with the correctness of the view which he had taken of this matter, moved to recommit the report.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he hoped the motion for recommitment would not prevail; and he rose for the purpose only of calling the attention of the House to a fact, that the select committee have acted by the authority and in the name of this body, and that, whether gentlemen think that Mr. Edwards ought to be brought before the committee or not, the writ is now on its way; that it will be served upon him; and that he will be brought here, whether we vote in one way or another, on this question. In case this inquiry is to be prosecuted, said Mr. R., I cannot consent to act, on that committee, except by the imperious mandate of this House, without the presence of the informer. The committee having first resolved that this inquiry should be prosecuted—that the informer should be brought before the grand jury, have reported the fact—for what? That the House, being one of the co-ordinate branches of this Government of ours, should communicate to the other co-ordinate branch, that which, in courtesy, the other branch ought to be put in possession of. What do we ask of the President? To aid us to bring this Minister before us? No; we need no authority from him. We will, in despite of any man in this land, have him before us. If, indeed, he shall have made his escape from the country, we cannot follow him to Mexico; but, any where short of the Balize, the warrant of this House is as high authority as any known in this land, and, as such, I trust it will be supported. If I had thought that, in the act of that committee, the privileges of this House, the privileges of the American people in their Representatives, had been compromised, no consideration that man can name, would have induced me to give it my sanction. It was at my motion that the order was passed to bring the accuser before us. I hope the House will proceed as proposed. The committee have maintained the authority of this House, which I never will surrender, and have, in their report, acted to the Executive with that comity and urbanity which, when it shall cease to prevail between the co-ordinate branches of any Government like ours, must throw every thing into confusion.

Mr. COOK, of Illinois, said it had been, and should be, his course, pending this subject, to abstain from saying any thing in relation to the merits of it, and to abstain from exhibiting any thing like feeling in relation to it. In his opinion, the course which the committee had pursued, on this occasion, was a proper one. The Executive had probably given its orders to this individual, and his actual position might not be so well known to any one as to the Executive. Mr. C. thought it was probable that, before any process could reach him, he would have left Illinois, and might have reached New Orleans, and the information communicated to the Executive might be effectual to answer the end of the process of this House reaching him. Mr. C. concluded by repeating that he would not trust his feelings on this occasion, for he wished to suppress them, so far as to speak on the merits of this controversy, &c.

Mr. FORSYTH asked if he had understood the gentleman from Illinois rightly, when he informed the House that this person was now on his way to New Orleans, and about to pass thence from the United States?

Mr. COOK said that he had so stated, presuming it to be the fact.

Mr. FORSYTH said it was only what he suspected. The Parthian throws behind him his poisoned arrows as he retreats, and then flies beyond the reach of pursuit. But, Mr. F. said, he could not fortunately leave the United States before the process of the committee could reach him. The vessel which was to have the honor to bear him out, had not yet left the navy yard at this place, and, as he would scarcely venture to sail without the protection of the guns of the nation, he could yet be overtaken.

Mr. COOK said that, when up before, he had intended to suggest, that the vessel which was destined to carry Mr. Edwards to Mexico, was yet at this place; that by this vessel, information could be given to him of his presence being desired here; and that the only, at least most probable way, in which the process of this House could reach him, and he could be recalled for the purposes of this House, would be by means of this vessel.

Mr. FLOYD said that the committee had thought it necessary that this individual should be present during the examination of his charges. They were perfectly aware that the authority with which they were invested by the House, was sufficient for all the purposes of bringing him here, and, in the course which they had pursued, had no object but to give the President of the United States, in a respectful manner, information of the course which it had been thought proper, by the committee, to pursue; and he hoped the opposition to it would be withdrawn.

Mr. McLANE said he was not anxious to embarrass the proceedings by the motion which he had made, under the conviction, in his own mind, that the President ought not to be called upon to do what the House has the perfect power to do. He was anxious for this investigation to go on. He thought, with the gentleman from Virginia, that the informer on this occasion ought to be present; but he thought, also, that the whole matter was already within the power of the committee. To save trouble to the House, however, he would withdraw his motion for recommitment.

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, said the House had given the committee all the powers which it possesses in relation to this matter. The question is now, whether it is necessary to call upon the House to aid the committee to carry its powers into execution. The committee have all the powers of this House on the subject, and have certainly the same power to communicate the fact of their proceedings to the President, that this House has, and on the same principle on which they would have power to ask information from him.

Mr. FORSYTH said that he had not offered his first motion on this subject (that which the House refused to consider) before this House had referred the inquiry into the subject to a committee, with power to send for persons and papers. It appeared to him, he said, at the time he made the motion, that such a proceeding was absolutely due, in courtesy to the Executive. Perhaps, he said, he had some little feeling on this subject, arising from the difference of the manner in which his proposition, and the nearly similar one of another gentleman, had been received. He saw no necessity, however, for pressing his amendment, though he could not see any occasion for all this particularity on the subject. In deference, therefore, to the wishes of several of his friends, whose opinions he always respected, he withdrew his motion for amendment.

The question recurring on the report of the Committee—

Mr. FULLER, of Massachusetts, said, he was rather sorry that the gentleman from Georgia had withdrawn his motion, because it was perfectly free from any ambiguity, which the proposition of the committee was not. If the amendment had prevailed, however, he could not have voted for this reason: He was one of those who hoped, the other day, that the motion for printing the memorial would have prevailed, and that he should thus have been enabled to judge of the necessity of the presence of the accuser. At present, he said, he did not feel himself competent to decide whether his presence was necessary or not. He, for one, moreover, was not willing to notify the President that the committee thought the interposition of the authority of the House necessary, because the committee are themselves competent to do it, and, if they think proper, it is their duty to do it. There was another consideration on this subject, which Mr. F. thought must occur to the mind of every one. Is it possible, is it probable, at any rate, that Congress will remain in session for two months to have the presence of this gentleman? It would take a month to give notice to this individual, another month to get him here, and after he got here, the investigation of the case by the committee would not occupy less than two or three weeks. A full investigation of this case, Mr. F. hoped, would take place at the next session. Under the present circumstances, he saw no occasion for giving information to the President of the opinion of the committee.*

Mr. BARTLETT, of New Hampshire, said, he was desirous of understanding rightly what was the object of the motion before the House. If he had a correct view of it, some other gentlemen who had spoken had not. It had been suggested, that there was not time to send for this person, and that the House ought not to give this notice to the Executive, because by so doing it would commit itself. Those questions, said Mr. B., are not now before the House. The House has confided the question to a select committee; that committee has decided it, and it is a question no longer to be discussed. I do not understand the resolution as it is understood by one gentleman, as being intended to give facility to the execution of the power which the committee have undertaken to exercise, but as intending this, and nothing more: that this person, whom the committee have sent for, who, they have said, shall come here, and who, I have no doubt, will come here, is a person whom the President, with the consent of the Senate, has ordered on service to a foreign Government. Some time ago, we gave to the President power to appoint Ministers to certain Governments, whenever he should think it expedient to do so. We have, by the act of our committee, temporarily revoked that power so far as he has exercised it in this particular instance. He has said, that Ninian Edwards shall be Minister to Mexico; we have said, that he shall not go. If the United States have great interests at stake in Mexico, and it is necessary we should have a Minister there, it is proper that we should inform the President that the person whom he has appointed for that purpose we have recalled. If the President sent him, and we, in the plenitude of our power, ordered him back, is it not necessary that the President should be informed of the fact? It had been suggested, that the committee has the power to communicate this information to the President. My opinion, said Mr. B., is, that they have not. They have not the power to communicate directly with the President on the subject, but they have the power to give information on the subject to this House, of which they are the organ, and, the information being so

*WASHINGTON, 23d April, 1824.

Messrs. Gales & Seaton: You will oblige me by correcting an error in reporting, in your paper of this morning, the remarks made by me, respecting the investigation of the charges in Mr. Edwards's memorial. In stating the impropriety of protracting the session of Congress for several months, to examine Mr. E. personally, I observed, "that the committee ought immediately to proceed in the investigation; and that, if his presence should be found to be necessary, I hoped the examination, as far as he was concerned, would be made at the next session."

I by no means intended to express the opinion that the investigation ought to be deferred, being clearly of the opinion, that no time or means, within the power of the committee, ought to be neglected.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant, given, the question now is, whether it be proper to give it to the Executive. If the appointment of a Minister was necessary, it continues to be so. If it was necessary a month ago, no change of circumstances having occurred, the interest of the country now equally demands that a Minister proceed directly to Mexico; in which case it might be necessary for the President, on receiving this information, to designate some other person for this station, &c.

Mr. BUCK, of Vermont, made a few observations, the import of which were, that it was not material whether this information were given to the Executive by the committee, or by a vote of this House—so that whether the present proposition was agreed to or not, appeared to him to be of little importance.

The question was then taken on the report of the committee, as above stated, and it was agreed to, almost without a dissenting voice.

Mr. FLOYD then moved that the Clerk of this House be directed to adopt measures to expedite the printing of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon which the said communication is founded, and that the said communication, with its accompanying documents, be printed; which was agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Mr. FORWARD postponed his motion to take up the bill "laying duties on sales at auction" till Monday next.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, in the Chair,) on the following bills, viz: "A bill granting to the Territory of Arkansas the right of pre-emption to certain quarter sections of land;" "A bill changing the mode of surveying the public lands on any river, lake, bayou, or water course, in the State of Mississippi and Territory of Arkansas;" and "A bill granting to the counties of each State and Territory of the United States, in which the public lands are situated, the right of pre-emption to quarter sections of land for seats of justice within the same."

Considerable discussion took place on amendments to these bills, in which Messrs. MOORE, of Alabama, WICKLIFFE, OWEN, WHIPPLE, LETCHER, MCCOY, and RANKIN, took part.

Finally, the bills were ordered to a third reading.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CONDUCT in the Chair,) on the report of the Committee of Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, unfavorable to the petition of Richard G. Morris.

Mr. BASSETT, of Virginia, moved to reverse the resolution reported by the committee, by striking out the word "not."

The report was read.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, suggested the expediency of farther proceeding in the consideration of this affair.

Mr. BASSETT pronounced the whole report to be deceptive—the case had never been thoroughly or fairly examined.

Mr. TAYLOR explained.

Mr. BASSETT resumed, and went at length into the illustration and defence of the claim of the petitioner, referring occasionally to documents in support of his statements.

Mr. LITTLE, chairman of the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, spoke in reply.

Messrs. P. P. BARBOUR and WRIGHT advocated, and Messrs. WHITTLESEY, LITTLE, and MCCOY, opposed the amendment; and the question being taken, it was negatived by a large majority.

The Committee then rose, and reported their agreement to the original report—

And the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 23.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Colonel William Duane," reported the same without amendment; and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was recommitted the bill to provide for the sale of lands conveyed to the United States, in certain cases, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment; and it was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. ALEXANDER, in relation to Lieutenant Kennon's case, was taken up, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HAYWARD, the Committee on the Public Buildings were instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing three of Capellano's marble busts of Washington, to be placed in the public buildings, under the direction of the said committee.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, viz:

An act supplementary to an act approved on the 3d of March, 1819, entitled "An act providing for the correction of errors in making entries of land at the land offices;"

An act changing the mode of surveying the public lands on any river, lake, bayou, or water-course, in the State of Mississippi, and Territory of Arkansas;

An act granting to the counties or parishes of each State and Territory of the United States, in which the public lands are situated, the right of pre-emption to quarter sections of land, for seats of justice within the same; were, respectively, read the third time, and passed.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In conformity with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of yesterday, I have received a copy of the proceedings of the committee to whom was referred a communication from Ninian Edwards, lately appointed a Minister Plenipotentiary to Mexico, in which it is decided that his attendance in this city, for the purpose of being examined by the committee, on matters contained in the said communication, was requisite. As soon as I was apprized that such a communication had been made to the House, anticipating that the attendance of Mr. Edwards might be desired, for the purpose stated, I thought it proper that he should be informed thereof, and instructed him not to proceed on his mission, but to await such call as might be made on him, either by the House, or its committee; and, in consequence, a letter was addressed to him to that effect, by the Secretary of State.

JAMES MONROE.

APRIL 23, 1824.

The Message was read, and laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. LEFTWICH, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BRENT in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Mary James." The report of the Committee of Claims on the case having been read, the bill was reported to the House without amendment, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. STERLING in the Chair,) on the bill "to alter the judicial districts of Pennsylvania." The blanks in the bill were filled, and it was reported, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. LATHROP in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Isaac Collier and others;" and on the bill "allowing bounties to persons employed in the cod fisheries, in certain cases;" which bills were reported without amendment, and ordered to a third reading.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to authorize masters of vessels, in certain cases, to clear out at the custom-house of Petersburg, or that of Richmond;" was read the third time, and passed.

PRE-EMPTIONS—PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. WHIPPLE, from the Committee on Public Lands, who were instructed by resolutions passed by the House, on the 31st December, 1823, the 2d and 23d of January last, to inquire into the expediency of granting pre-emption rights in the purchase of public lands, in certain cases, and to whom was referred the petition of Hardy Doyal and George Caperton, and the petition of L. C. Davis, made a report thereon; which was laid on the table.

The report is as follows:

Before advertng to the particular cases embraced by the resolutions and petitions referred, the committee deem it proper to make some general observations on the subject of pre-emption grants, as connected with the general policy of the Government in relation to the public lands.

By reference to the various laws on the subject of pre-emptions, it will be perceived that, where the United States have acquired territory where settlements existed at the time of the acquisition, the persons having made such settlements have been permitted by the Government to retain their lands by paying therefor the minimum price, subject to a reasonable limitation as to the quantity to be retained.

In cases where territory has been acquired from foreign Powers by treaty, this privilege has been extended to the period in which the United States took the actual possession of the ceded territory. Some modifications of these principles have, at times, and under particular circumstances, existed, but the main principle has been generally adhered to.

The committee are of opinion that an extension of these principles would be injurious to the Government, as well as to those who may hereafter become the purchasers of the public lands, and probably to those, also, who may venture to settle upon Government lands without authority hereafter.

It cannot be perceived by what principle persons having no color of title should, after lands on which they have settled were known to belong to the United States at the time of making such settlement, claim the pre-emption right to such lands.

Should the Government sanction applications of this nature, an inducement would be offered to persons of an enterprising disposition to anticipate, in every quarter, the Government in its sales of the public lands, and to settle upon and improve the most valuable tracts of land, which they would claim at the minimum price, whenever such lands were brought into market by authority of the United States.

Purchasers of land finding themselves prevented from acquiring good lands, would abstain from purchases, and resort to illegal settlements, in the hope of obtaining that at the minimum value, which they could not obtain at fair and open sale.

Thus, a competition would be excited among a certain description of our population, to locate themselves upon the public lands without much regard to lines or boundaries, and with very little respect for the rights either of the Government or their Indian neighbors.

When it might become necessary for the Government to offer for sale the tracts on which these settlements had been made, the persons interested would find arguments at hand, in their poverty and distress, and the situation of their families, to show why they should be permitted to retain their homes and their improvements.

Abuses like these would necessarily attract the attention of the Government, and induce Congress to adopt rigorous measures to repress them, by which many who had thus precipitately made unauthorized settlements would be deprived of their labor and again be compelled to begin anew, thus losing the labor of years.

A system of indulgence to those who trespass by making unauthorized settlements upon the lands of the United States, after those lands are known to be the property of the Government, would, in the opinion of the committee, be productive of much perplexity to the Government as well as of injury to those concerned in the purchase and settlement of the national domain.

The committee will now proceed to consider the several resolutions and petitions referred to them, which relate either to pre-emption rights or to indulgences prayed for by those who have made unauthorized settlements upon the public lands.

By the resolution of December 31st, 1823, the committee are "instructed to inquire into the justice and expediency of granting to actual settlers in that part of the State of Louisiana, lying east of the Mississippi and island of New Orleans, a right of pre-emption to public lands, in the same manner, and for the same period of time after possession thereof by the Government of the United States, as was granted to such settlers in the late Territory of Orleans, after possession thereof as aforesaid."

H. OF R.

Pre-emption—Public Lands.

APRIL, 1824.

It will be perceived, by reference to the act of Congress of April 12th, 1814, that pre-emption rights were granted to actual settlers in that part of the State of Louisiana west of the river Mississippi, up to the date of said act, that is, to the 12th April, 1814.

The United States took possession of this portion of the State of Louisiana on the 10th of December, 1803, consequently, settlers for a period of eleven years after the possession of the territory of Orleans by the United States, had the right of pre-emption of the lands on which they had settled secured to them.

In that portion of the State of Louisiana which lies east of the river Mississippi and Island of New Orleans, a different rule was adopted.

The Government did not get possession of this portion of the ceded territory until the Autumn of 1810; prior to which time it was under the Government of Spain, consequently, settlers in this portion of the territory had the right of pre-emption secured to them by the act of 1814, only for a period of four years after the possession by the United States.

The resolution, therefore, contemplates extending to all who had made settlements on the public lands of the United States, in the portion of the State of Louisiana east of the river Mississippi, up to the year 1821, the right of pre-emption of the land on which they have settled.

The committee deem it inexpedient to extend the right of pre-emption in this manner.

The act of the 12th April, 1814, extended equally to all portions of the State of Louisiana, and if any inequality existed in the situation of the people of different sections of the State, this circumstance ought not of itself to be made ground of claim upon the Government. Those who reside east of the river Mississippi and Island of New Orleans, had, by that law, the right of retaining their lands at the minimum value, although they had settled on them without leave of the Government, four years after the lands were, by solemn transfer and formal possession, known to be the property of the United States: the Government has, therefore, treated these settlers with great lenity and indulgence; and if some of their neighbors have, by the peculiarity of their situations, derived greater benefits from the act of April 12th, 1814, the committee cannot, on this account, be induced to deem it proper to sanction the principle that persons ought to be encouraged to settle upon the public lands for ten or eleven years after they are known to be the property of the United States. It may, however, be doubted, whether the act of 1814 has not operated nearly equally upon the settlers on the public lands within the State of Louisiana. It was well known by the people, that the whole territory acquired by the treaty ceding Louisiana to the United States, would ultimately fall under their Government, and there can be little doubt that many settlements were made within the territory in anticipation of this event, hence, the time of taking possession of different portions of that tract of country, could produce very little inequality with respect to those who had pre-emption rights granted them by the act of the 12th April, 1814.

By the resolution of January 2d, 1824, the committee are instructed "to inquire into the expediency of granting the right of pre-emption to all persons to mill seats on public lands, where the same may have been actually improved as such by them."

It will be readily perceived that, if the Government should sanction a principle of this kind, these valuable appendages to the public lands would be universally taken up and occupied to the great injury of the Government, and with no advantage to those who may wish to purchase public lands, except to the favored individual.

The committee are therefore of opinion, that it would be injudicious and that it is inexpedient to adopt such a provision.

By a resolution of the same date, the committee are instructed "to inquire into the expediency of granting to actual settlers prior to the 1st of July, 1820, in the State of Alabama, the right of purchasing, by pre-emption of at least one quarter section of land, embracing their family residences."

The committee refer to the general observations in the commencement of this report, and again repeat that they can see no sound reason for permitting persons who have knowingly made unauthorized settlements on the public lands, to have and enjoy peculiar privileges and indulgences; they are therefore of opinion that the adoption of such a measure would be impolitic and inexpedient.

By a resolution of January 23d, 1824, the committee are instructed "to inquire into the expediency of reviving the law of the 25th March, 1816, relating to the settlers on the lands of the United States."

This act, as will be seen by reference to it, provides that persons settled on the public lands of the United States, may, upon application to a register, recorder, or marshal, or to such person as either of them may appoint, be permitted to remain on such lands, provided the applicant shall sign a declaration, purporting that he or she has no claim to the lands on which he or she may be located. Books are to be kept and a registry of the applications and permissions is to be made, and such forms prescribed as the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States may direct. The persons availing themselves of the provisions of this act are to be considered as tenants at will, and to obligate themselves not to commit waste, and to yield quiet possession when the lands shall be sold by the Government.

The committee can see no good reason for renewing this law, which has been continued in force until the 3d March, 1819, a period of three years.

Those who had located themselves on the public lands prior to, and until the 3d of March, 1819, have had opportunity to avail themselves of the benefits of this act, and those who have since that time made unauthorized settlements on the vacant lands of the United States can have no just ground of complaint, if left to the ordinary operation of the laws relating to such persons.

To revive the law of 1816, would be to hold out inducements to settle on the public lands, under the expectation, that until such lands were sold, the persons making settlements would be permitted to cultivate and improve them for their own profit and benefit. Were the Government to grant these facilities, it is easy to perceive that no regard whatever would be paid to the regulations of the laws forbidding unauthorized settlements upon the public lands.

The experience of the Government would lead us to conclude, that the final request of these settlers would be for pre-emption rights, or at least to be permitted to retain their crops. But the committee trust that enough has been said to show the indefensible nature of this proposition; they will therefore dismiss it.

APRIL, 1824.

Penelope Denney.—Alvin Bronson.

H. OF R.

The petition of Lewis C. Davis was referred to the committee on the 26th January, 1824. He states that he purchased a quarter section of land in the State of Alabama, for which he gave fourteen dollars per acre, that he is unable to pay for it and was compelled to relinquish it, and prays to be permitted to re-enter the land at the pre-emption price. There appears to be nothing in this case to entitle the petitioner to particular favor, and the committee see no cause why he should not be subjected to the operation of the laws and regulations of the Government relative to such cases.

The petition of Hardy Doyal and George Caperton, of Alabama, referred to the committee on the 27th January, 1824, states that the petitioners have erected a gristmill on the public lands and cleared a farm adjoining it; that they have expended their whole property in the enterprise; they therefore pray to be permitted to take a certain quantity of land including their mill at the pre-emption value, and that the Government should grant them a credit of six months from the issuing of the patent.

The committee deem it unnecessary to enter into detailed reasoning to show the inadmissibility of this proposition. It is sufficient to remark, that it is in direct contravention of the policy which it is believed the Government ought to pursue, for the purpose of putting a stop to unauthorized settlements on the public lands.

PENELOPE DENNEY.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CONDUCT in the Chair,) on the bill "for the relief of Penelope Denney." Several documents were read. The question being still pending from a former sitting, in January, to amend the bill, by providing the support of Mrs. Denney from the Navy Pension Fund, instead of the Treasury of the United States, a debate arose, in which Messrs. CAMBRELENG, FULLER, WOOD of New York, WARFIELD, and BUCHANAN, took part.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to strike out the enacting clause—and the debate was then farther continued by Mr. FULLER, Mr. BUCHANAN, Mr. CAMBRELENG, Mr. LIVINGSTON, Mr. WARFIELD, and Mr. SHARPE.

In this debate, the merits of Denney were not disputed, nor the wants of his mother, but it was objected to the bill that it introduced a new principle in the pension laws of the United States, by providing for parents; the present laws only making provision for widows and children; and it was further argued that, if given at all, the pension should come out of the Treasury of the United States, and not out of the Navy Pension Fund. That fund, consisting of contributions of prize money, was, at its creation, pledged to a class of persons to which cases of this kind did not belong, and it would be a breach of public faith to touch it.

The question was then taken on striking out the enacting clause, and decided in the negative—ayes 58, noes 63.

The question then recurring on striking out the clause of the bill which provides to pay the pension "out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States," and inserting, in its place, "the Navy Pension Fund," the debate was resumed by Messrs. BRECK, CAMBRELENG, FULLER, HAMILTON, and BUCHANAN; and the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 89, noes 58.

The bill was then reported to the House; the amendment was agreed to, and the question being on ordering it to a third reading, Mr. BRECK called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. METCALFE then moved to lay the bill on the table, which was negatived—ayes, 50 noes 83.

The yeas and nays, on ordering the bill to a third reading, were then taken, as follows: Yeas 62, nays 98.
